In conclusion, Mr. President, and so that my colleagues will have a better idea as to the importance of this joint resolution, I ask unanimous consent to have set forth at this point in my remarks, the letter addressed to me by Mr. Drury on May 6 of this year; comments on that letter by the Department of the Interior and by the National Science Foundation; and letters objecting to the proposed dredging from scientists throughout the world.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letters will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 218) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to establish the Cold Spring Harbor Marine Biological Reserve, introduced by Mr. MURRAY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

The letters presented by Mr. MURRAY are as follows:

DRURY & HYMAN,
ATTORNEYS AT LAW,
Garden City, Long Island, N.Y.,
May 3, 1960.

Hon. JAMES E. MURRAY,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MURRAY: Knowing of your great interest in the conservation of our natural resources, and your dedication to preserving America's preeminence in the world of science, I am calling your attention to an imminent threat to one of this country's unique and irreplaceable natural resources. The destruction of this resource would represent an irreparable blow to a scientific venture which has been carried on for 70 years to the plaudits and with the cooperation of renowned scientists throughout the world. If we permit this destruction, our country will stand disgraced in the eyes of the thinking world.

I refer to Cold Spring Harbor, located on the north shore of Long Island, intersected by the boundary between the town of Oyster Bay, Nassau County, and the town of Huntington, Suffolk County. This harbor has situated in it a sandbar on which the Long Island Biological Institute, an affiliate of the Carnegie Institute, has been conducting scientific research. This research, which includes basic cancer research, is made possible by an unusual natural phenomenon where fresh and salt water commingle under circumstances making this place one of the great breeding grounds for unicellular marine life. Many eminent scientists from all parts of the world have been and are identified with the work being done there.

In August of 1959, with a minimum of publicity and without consultation with any of the scientists located at Cold Spring Harbor, the town of Oyster Bay entered into a contract with the United States Dredging Corporation, of 39 Broadway, New York, N.Y., giving the dredging company the privilege of dredging lower Cold Spring Harbor for a period of 2 years with a further option of 2 more years.

The present officials of the town of Oyster Bay have been aware of the interest of scientists the world over in preserving the harbor for research purposes. They have seen fit to suppress from the public all knowledge of the protests registered with them.

I have recently become aware of the protests of these eminent scientists through copies which were filed with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, who unfortunately do not have the jurisdiction to prevent the dredging. I enclose for your information photocopies of the protests of these eminent scientists which were obtained from the Army.

I am sure that if your committee will look into this situation, you will find the facts to be as I have described them and you will agree that it would be a shameful tragedy if this unique natural resource were to be so shortsightedly destroyed. Surely our Government puts a higher value on a scientic treasure house than it does on a few thousand cubic yards of sand and gravel which can easily be had elsewhere.

Senator MURRAY, I respectfully and urgently ask that you look into this situation as quickly as possible and that you introduce legislation which will declare this unique area a National Marine Biological Reserve, to be forever protected by our Government and used solely for scientific research. Such legislation, compensating the town of Oyster Bay for its loss and guaranteeing the perpetual intergrity of this scientific resource, would not only mean a great deal to our own people, but would be hailed by scientists throughout the world as a truly enlightened step on the part of our Government.

Sincerely,

JOHN J. DRURY.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D.C., May 20, 1960.

Hon. JAMES E. MURRAY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MURRAY: This is in reply to your inquiry of May 6, 1960, pertaining to the letter of John J. Drury of Garden City, Long Island, protesting the proposed dredging of Cold Spring Harbor. You ask for information on the scientific value of the Cold Spring Harbor area and how it might be affected by the dredging.

As you may know, two laboratories are located at Cold Spring Harbor; these are the Department of Genetics of the Carnegie Institute, and the Biological Laboratory of the Long Island Biological Association. The former has been located at Cold Spring Harbor since 1904; the latter was founded there in 1890 and is the second oldest biological laboratory in the United States. Both are internationally famous for their work in genetics, particularly in human genetics.

Although the research of the permanent staffs of the two laboratories has been principally in the field of experimental genetics, the Laboratory of the Long Island Biological Association has been host over the years to many visiting scientists who have been interested in marine ecology. As a result, the flora and fauna of the inner harbor and of the sand spit separating it from the outer harbor have been thoroughly studied, and the distribution and abundance of the bottom dwelling organisms have been charted in great detail. These records now extend over a 70-year period.

We agree with Mr. Drury that dredging the sand spit and deepening the harbor will cause changes in the ecology of the area and may make the area unsuitable for the studies that have been carried on in the past. Our knowledge of Cold Spring Harbor is very limited, however, since most of our work in this region, which has been concerned with shellfish biology, has been conducted on the Connecticut side of Long Island Sound. We suggest that Mr. Drury contact the superintendent of marine fisheries, New York Conservation Department, 65 West Sunrise Highway, Freeport, Long Island, for detailed information concerning the possible effects of the dredging on Cold Spring Harbor.

Please let us know if we can be of any further assistance in the matter.

Sincerely yours,

ROSS LEFFLER,
Assistant Secretary.

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, D.C., May 19, 1960.

Hon. JAMES E. MURRAY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MURRAY: This is in response to your inquiry of May 6 concerning scientific resources and activities at Cold Spring Harbor, Long Island, N.Y.

Cold Spring Harbor is the location of two establishments that have been most important in biological research and training in this country since the late 19th century. They are the biological laboratory of the Long Island Biological Association and the Department of Genetics of the Carnegie Institution of Washington. These two institutions, which are closely affiliated with each other (for many years they have shared the same director), are situated on about 80 acres of land beside the bay at Cold Spring Harbor.

The biological laboratory and the Carnegie Institution's Department of Genetics have been a vital force in the development of biological sciences in this country, particularly, in recent decades, with respect to the science of genetics. Members of the resident staffs of these institutions conduct basic research the year round, and each summer leading biological scientists from the United States and foreign countries assemble there to conduct research, teach, and be taught in the course program, and participate in symposia and discussions. The summer programs also serve the community and the public; nature study courses are offered to groups of children, and a nature study workshop is conducted for elementary school teachers.

Biological research at Cold Spring Harbor has extended into various fields. The natural history of this area (water of the bay and adjacent land) was studied intensively in the early days of the establishment. Ecological studies predominated from the latter part of the 19th century to about 1930. On the other hand, an emphasis came to be placed on work in the genetics of various experimental organisms—corn, jimson weed, fruit flies, and especially in recent years microorganisms (bacteria and bacterial viruses, or bacteriophages).

Research in genetics at Cold Spring Harbor has made very substantial contributions to our understanding of the hereditary basis of variation in plants and animals. It has also led to important practical applications in agriculture and medicine. The first hybrid corn was produced at Cold Spring Harbor, having been derived as a consequence of basic research in the quantitative genetics in corn conducted by George H. Shull in the first decade of this century. During recent years Dr. Miloslav Demerec, who has been the director of both the biological laboratory and the Carnegie Institution's Department of Genetics, has made remarkable contributions to the manipulation and control of microorganisms. During the Second World War Dr. Demerec increased the yield of the antibiotic penicillin by the mold "Penicillium" by exposing the mold to X-rays and selecting high yielding mutant types. He has also investigated the phenomenon of resistance of bacteria to antibiotics and other chemical agencies used to control them. He has shown that genetically resistant bacteria arise occasionally by mutation and are favored by applications of antibacterial substances, tending to increase in numbers when such agencies are employed. On the basis of this information he has recommended that chemical treatments designed to control and eliminate pathogenic bacteria should employ several different chemicals at once (multiple chemotherapy) to avoid the selection of resistant types, since the likelihood of bacteria resistant to each of several different chemical agents is so small as to be negligible. Such a procedure is now being put into practice.

Publications on the scientific achievements of the Cold Spring Harbor laboratories are exceeedingly numerous and scattered in many scientific journals. However, some such papers have been published in series of volumes prepared at Cold Spring Harbor itself. During the first few decades of this century a number of Cold Spring Harbor monographs were issued, devoted largely to ecological studies in the area. Some representative titles from this series are listed in the accompanying bibliography. In more recent years the annual Cold Springs Harbor Symposium on Quantitative Biology has led to the publication each year of a volume of papers from the symposium. The titles of these symposia and volumes are likewise given on the accompanying sheet. A copy of the 1958–59 annual report of the biological laboratory is also enclosed and will give some idea of recent scientific activities at Cold Spring Harbor.

Because of the high quality of the biological research at Cold Spring Harbor, the National Science Foundation has made grants for support of research there, has provided funds for the publication of symposium volumes, and has recently provided a grant for the rehabilitation, renovation, and enlargement of facilities at the biological laboratory.

Sincerely yours,

ALAN T. WATERMAN,
Director.

LETTERS WRITTEN BY SCIENTISTS TO THE TOWN BOARD OF OYSTER BAY, OR MR. BURNS, IN REGARD TO THE DREDGING OF INNER COLD SPRING HARBOR

FOREIGN COUNTRIES

1. Dr. D. G. Catcheside, professor of microbiology, University of Birmingham, England, September 28, to Mr. Burns:

"I was shocked this morning to receive news of your township's intention to extend the dredging activities in the inner basin at Cold Spring Harbor to the area in front of the Cold Spring Harbor Biological Laboratory. The dredging on the easterly side near to the spit has already done serious harm. The extension of the activities would be disastrous to the value of the area for teaching and research. I am more than surprised to hear that the project has the approval of the New York State Conservation Commission.

"I do not wish to burden you unnecessarily with a further recital of the special scientific and teaching value of the area in question, about which you must undoubtedly know. I would only say in this connection that it is an area which, if it were in this country, our nature conservancy would take very active steps to preserve."

2. Dr. O. E. Lowenstein, professor of zoology, University of Birmingham, England, September 30, to Mr. Burns:

"I was greatly perturbed to learn that the excellent ecological conditions existing in the inner harbor adjoining the Cold Spring Harbor Biological Laboratory are in danger of being disturbed, if not destroyed, by dredging operations. I would consider such an event as a first order catastrophe in the world of international biological study and research. This unique habitat is well known among biologists the world over, and its preservation is of overriding importance. Too many such natural laboratories fall victim all over the world to population pressure and commercial exploitation. We in this country at present are in danger of losing such a unique nature reserve to an atomic power station, and we are trying to do our utmost to save it.

"May I therefore implore you to do all you can to prevent the loss of Oyster Bay to scientific biology."

3. Dr. P. Koller, Staff member, the Chester Realty Research Institute of the Royal Cancer Hospital, and professor at the University of London, September 28 to Mr. Burns:

"I learned today of your proposal to start dredging operations in Cold Spring Harbor. Such an operation would be an act of vandalism.

"Your locality is known throughout the world of science as a center of investigation into fundamental biological problems. I myself have greatly benefited from working in your town. The collection of material for study is unique and rendered even more important by the work which has been so far accomplished. Will your administration destroy all this?

"I appeal to you, sir, to think no more of dredging in Cold Spring Harbor—the advancement of science is an infinitely more praiseworthy objective."

4. Dr. R. Latarjet, director of the Institut du Radium, Pasteur Institut, Paris, France, September 29, to whom it may concern:

"As a fellow of the French Government, I worked during 1 year at the biological laboratory, Cold Spring Harbor, and have stayed there several times since. These experiences have very much influenced my scientific career, as those of many scientists throughout the world. At that place, I found and gathered intellectual and technical seeds which I was able to sow later on in my country for the benefit of French science.

"In my opinion, Cold Spring Harbor is one of the most incentive places in the world in the field of modern fundamental biology. It owes this privilege to the spirit and the skill of its staff members, and to its unique location. This location brings to the scientist the most quiet and fertile environment he may wish, and also very fruitful circumstances, as far as soil, waters, and climate are concerned.

"It would be harmful to biological research to spoil this environment."

5. Dr. C. H. Waddington, professor, University of Edinburgh, Scotland, September 30, to Mr. Burns:

"I have recently been sent some papers concerning the proposal to dredge the mudflats in the bay opposite Cold Springs Harbor Laboratory. I think that biologists throughout most of the world will be horrified to hear of this suggestion. The Cold Spring Harbor Laboratory is extremely widely known throughout Europe, and indeed throughout the whole biological world. There is a saying that a prophet is not without honor save in his own country, and it may be that the local community at Long Island does not fully realize the honor which the existence of this laboratory brings to your small township. The very high reputation which the laboratory has earned depends, of course, mainly on the quality of the scientists who work there, but an essential factor in their achievements has been the availability of a quite exceptional fauna of animals in the adjacent bay. These facilities would be irreparably damaged if the bay were dredged. I do feel that the reputation of the Cold Spring Harbor Laboratory is so worldwide, and its services to the scientific community of all countries have been so large, that there are valid reasons why the dredging of the harbor should be regarded as a matter of not merely local concern. I very much hope it will be found possible to reconsider this decision."

6. Sir F. M. Burnet, director, W. & E. Hall Institute, Melbourne, Australia, September 29, to Mr. Burns:

"As one who has on several occasions enjoyed the privilege of working or attending biological meetings at the Cold Spring Harbor Laboratory, I should like to add my voice in support of Dr. Demerec's efforts to prevent irremediable damage to the inner basin of Cold Spring Harbor by dredging."

7. Dr. Leo Sachs, head, section of genetics and virology, the Weizmann Institute of Science, Rehovoth, Israel, September 30, to Mr. Burns:

"It is with great surprise that I have just heard that there is a possibility that the harbor adjacent to the biological laboratory of the Long Island Biological Association may be subjected to dredging activity. As you no doubt know, the work of the biological laboratory has been, and still is today, amongst the finest that is being carried out in the field of biological research, and the harbor in question provides unique facilities unequaled in any other part of the world. By carrying out such an alteration to the harbor, you would therefore be responsible for incurring a great loss in the development of biological knowledge. I therefore find it difficult to believe that such a suggestion was even thought of, since I am sure you yourself are aware of the great prestige which has accrued both to Cold Spring Harbor, and to the standing of scientific work in the United States as a whole as a result of the work that has been carried out at the biological laboratory.

"I am sure, therefore, that you will understand why it is essential to leave the facilities of the biological laboratory undisturbed."

8. Dr. Michael J. D. White, professor of zoology, University of Melbourne, Victoria, Australia, September 30, to Mr. Burns:

"Having had associations with the Long Island Biological Association and the Department of Genetics of the Carnegie Institution of Washington that go back as far as 1937, I was deeply distressed to learn of the proposed dredging of the inner basin at Cold Spring Harbor. I lived in Cold Spring Harbor for two periods of 6 to 7 months in 1957 and again 1952, so that I am quite familiar with the area. The many activities of the Long Island Biological Laboratory, ranging from natural history studies at one end of the scale to the most modern types of fundamental biological investigations at the other, have made this organization a world famous one. Its annual symposia, attended by outstanding scientists from all over the world, are of the utmost significance in the development of scientific ideas.

"Already at the time of the 1958 symposium, which I attended, the operation of a dredge in the harbor constituted an unpleasant nuisance. Now, I gather, a much larger scheme is proposed involving the destruction of the whole ecological habitat of the inner harbor.

"I sincerely hope that you will not proceeed with this scheme, which would render many biological investigations impossible in the future. Undisturbed habitats are needed for many types of ecological investigations. Year by year, the systematic destruction and degradation of these natural habitats goes on. I have lived to see the gradual disappearance of the great brushlands of south Texas to make way for truck farming and I have seen the last few acres of virgin prairie in Missouri threatened by highway developments. It is not only the scenic areas of the western States which should be preserved for posterity. A rather smelly mudflat, a few acres of sand beach, may be just as important, scientifically. My own work on phenomena of heredity in natural populations of animals depends on observations made at the same locality, over a period of years. This sort of investigation is basic to an understanding of 'what makes natural populations tick'—that is to say what determines the abundance of one species, the scarcity of another, the appearance of sudden plagues of pest species, etc. But work of this kind depends entirely on undisturbed habitats, unchanged over the years by destructive activities.

UNITED STATES

1. Dr. Lawrence H. Snyder, president, University of Hawaii, Honolulu, Hawaii, September 29, to Mr. Burns:

"I have just learned to my great dismay that the administration of the Oyster Bay Township has under consideration the dredging of the inner harbor of Cold Spring Harbor. As the president of the University of Hawaii and as a past president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, I would like to enter my strong protest against this project of dredging. The very favorable natural environment for biological research which exists at Cold Spring Harbor would be ruined if the dredging operation goes forward. I have spent several summers at Cold Spring Harbor and I know the region well. I am also quite aware of the international reputation which your township and Long Island enjoy because of the worldwide appreciation of the biological laboratory. I am sure that careful consideration will convince you that you would be doing a disservice to your township and to science in general if you were to continue with the proposal. Please, in the name of science and all scientists, give careful consideration to the abandonment of the proposal to dredge the inner harbor.

"With best wishes to you and your colleagues."

2. Fairfield Osborn, president, New York Zoological Society, New York, October 1, to town board:

"We would like, through this letter, to register an urgent protest against the proposed program of the dredging of the inner harbor at Cold Spring.

"The township of Oyster Bay possesses, as one of its outstanding assets, a scientific institution of unusual importance. The influences of the work of the biological laboratory extend not only throughout our own country but literally throughout the world. The science of marine biology, allied as it is with oceanographic research, is becoming of ever greater importance, as evidenced, among other things, by the International Oceanographic Congress held here in New York under the auspices of the United Nations last month. The continuity of the work of this eminent laboratory, which depends to a large degree upon material from and observations upon the inner harbor, would be drastically if not fatally affected by the proposed dredging program.

"Under the above circumstances, our institution conveys through this letter our great hope that this dredging program will be abandoned."

3. Dr. J. Schultz, chairman, division of biology, the Institute for Cancer Research, Philadelphia, October 1, to Mr. Burns:

"The information has just reached me of the proposed dredging of the inner harbor adjacent to the Biological Laboratory at Cold Spring Harbor. As a biologist, I find this most disturbing; what it means is the loss of an area of wild life which has been under study for a considerable period of time and whose continued investigation should be encouraged rather than impeded. There are few places in which it is possible to carry out long term studies of this kind. Surely, a larger view of the interests of the community as a whole would provide for the maintenance of this unique locale, taking care of the recreational facilities elsewhere.

"The value of the worldwide reputation of the Cold Spring Harbor Biological Laboratory for the community of Oyster Bay is, I am sure, not unrecognized by its residents. One can hope that a proper civic pride will manifest itself by furthering rather than hindering the valuable work at the laboratory."

4. H. L. Carson, professor of zoology, Washington University, St. Louis, Mo., September 28, to Mr. Burns:

"Perhaps it has surprised you that the proposed dredging of the inner harbor at Cold Spring Harbor should produce such a strong series of protests from scientists.

"What appears to most persons as an unimpressive mud flat is indeed quite the opposite—it is a natural area which has been under continual, painstaking, and detailed scientific study for many years. The nature of these studies, dealing as they do with populations of sea and harbor life, are long range; destruction of these populations by dredging would result in a tragic loss of valuable information which could not ever be replaced or done over again, even if it were possible to get the manpower to do it. This type of study is the specific kind of work that I do; it takes many years to find out the really important things.

"I am sure, Mr. Burns, that, as a man in public life, you hear many protests; in fact, I guess you get them every day. I would like to point out, however, that this particular protest is of a different sort than most. We scientists who wish to inform you on the value of these sediments at Cold Spring Harbor are not being guided by emotion, prejudice, sentimentality, or some selfish interest involving money or property. I, for instance, have only been to Cold Spring Harbor briefly on several occasions as a scientific visitor at the laboratory. My interest and motive in writing to you is my fear that something that I know to be of great scientific value will be destroyed because its great worth has not been emphasized.

"I understand exactly your position in this matter. I do not see how you may become informed on such matters unless those who feel they know are willing to write you. Part of the trouble is surely that really important scientific work is often not spectacular and usually does not make the headlines. We scientists often have difficulty getting across the nature of our work to people who are not involved. I hope that you will bend every effort to prevent a great scientific loss at Cold Spring Harbor."

5. Dr. A. S. Fox, professor, Michigan State University, East Lansing, Mich., September 30, to Mr. Burns:

"Word has just reached me that Oyster Bay Township has contracted for the dredging of the inner basin at Cold Spring Harbor. As a biologist who has made use of the research facilities of the Long Island Biological Association and the Carnegie Institution at Cold Spring Harbor, I would like to urge that the contemplated dredging not be performed.

"For reasons which must be known to you, the inner harbor constitutes a unique ecological setting which has attracted the attention of biologists for many years. I have myself brought groups of students to Cold Spring Harbor for summer work, as have many others from all parts of the world. As a result of these labors of so many years, the biological habitat of the inner harbor is one of the best understood in the world and consequently are of the most favorable for further study. Dredging would forever destroy its value for future work, and would indeed destroy the value of much of the work performed in the past.

"I am certain that the township of Oyster Bay would want to avoid such a tragedy. The scientific resources of our country are more valuable than ever before, and all citizens are interested in their preservation."

6. Dr. B. H. Brattstrom, instructor, Department of Biology, Adelphi College, Garden City, N.Y., September 28, to Mr. Burns:

"I have just received notice of the fact that the town of Oyster Bay has contracted to dredge out the harbor adjacent to the laboratories at the Cold Spring Harbor Biological Association and the Carnegie Institute of Washington. As a research scientist, a biology professor, and as a resident of Long Island, I wish to protest this action.

"The sandspit and mudflat environment at Cold Spring Harbor is not only unique, but the most extensively studied mudflat area, probably in all the United States. It is used as a standard for comparison, and scientists all over the world (see model of cross section on display, Invertebrate Hall, American Museum of Natural History, New York City). I use this area—the only one like it on the island—both for courses in natural history of the vertebrates and field biology (the latter sponsored by Adelphi and taught at Cold Spring Harbor). The fieldwork in these courses is carried out under a permit to me by the New York State Department of Conservation.

"With the great amount of shoreline owned by the town of Oyster Bay, the limited (if at all possible) access to this bay (by Huntington Township, I don't see how the town of Oyster Bay can control dredging through Huntington Township property and back into theirs), and the important scientific and educational aspects of the inner bay and sandspit, it not only seems absurd but a disservice to future generations, as well as our own, to alter or destroy this area."

7. Dr. Vernon Bryson, professor of microbiology, Rutgers University, New Brunswick, N.J., October 2, to Mr. Burns:

"On a recent visit to Cold Spring Harbor I learned that dredging operations have been planned at the sandspit area. Since I worked at the Cold Spring Harbor Laboratories from 1942 to 1955, I have more than a casual interest in the maintenance of this important center of biological research. Dr. Demerec has doubtless described in general terms the significance of the studies which can only be performed in the few remaining suitable sites which have not been despoiled by man. I can remember particularly the work done during the war by Dr. Warmke at a time when certain imports had been cut off from Japan. Although the exact nature of this project may still be confidential, I can state that part of the experiment required using animals as tests for drugs. These animals (fishes) were easily obtained in the then unpolluted and natural environment of the inner harbor. The example cited shows that beyond the interest of scientists and citizens surrounding the laboratory—and their children—in the abundant wildlife or the region, there are occasional highly practical demands for work which could not be accomplished in the same manner even in the largest and most elaborate laboratories in New York City.

"One of the peculiar facts about the balance of nature is that any disturbance of this balance may have unforeseen consequences. I sincerely hope that the monetary gain that might come to the township through permitting the dredging to be done will not obscure the more important result of such an operation: possible impairment of the delicately balanced and virtually unique plant and animal life whose worth is unfortunately better known to scientists the world over than it is to some of the local townspeople.

"Please accept these remarks in the friendly spirit in which they were written. I am sure that as supervisor you will understand that the issue is an important one."

8. Dr. G. Ledyard Stebbins, professor of genetics, University of California, Davis, Calif., October 1, to Mr. Burns:

"My attention has been called to the proposed action of the Oyster Bay Township to dredge the inner basin of Cold Spring Harbor, behind the sandspit. I write this letter of protest because this is a matter of vital concern not only to the citizens of your community, but to biologists all over the world, including many who will be studying our science in future decades. The laboratory at Cold Spring Harbor is one of the most renowned in the world: in fact to many biologists Cold Spring Harbor is a name as famous as Wood's Hole, Harvard, or even New York and Hollywood. The eminence of this community of scientists is due not only to their individual abilities and to the organization which has enabled them to attract every year visitors of renown from all parts of the world; it resides also in the unique position of Cold Spring Harbor as a center for the study of marine and estuarine life. If this resource is destroyed, one of the priceless heritages of your community will be gone forever. I hope that you and your associates in the administration of the affairs of your township will realize the responsibility which you owe to the world of science, and prevent this disaster from taking place."

THE AMERICAN MUSEUM OF NATURAL HISTORY,
New York, N.Y., September 21, 1959.

TOWN BOARD,
Oyster Bay, N.Y.

DEAR SIRS: We have been greatly disturbed to learn of the proposal to dredge the inner harbor of Cold Spring Harbor. As you know, the Long Island Biological Association at Cold Spring Harbor has developed an outstanding international reputation for the great work it has been carrying on since its establishment in 1890. Many of its valuable investigations are made possible by the environmental conditions of the inner harbor, which include the extensive mud flats and shoal areas.

Because of the long period of time covered by the observations of the laboratory any disturbance to the harbor area would mean irreparable disruption of the studies. There are few areas in the world today where similar opportunities are available for such studies. The thought of sacrificing this unusual situation for the benefit of a few boating enthusiasts would seem to be entirely unreasonable.

The town of Oyster Bay can take great pride in having one of the really great biological research laboratories located within its boundaries. It can only be hoped that members of the town board are aware of this important asset to the community and will not do anything to handicap its activities.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES A. OLIVER,
Director.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CONNECTICUT,
DEPARTMENT OF ANIMAL GENETICS,
Storrs, Conn., September 25, 1959.

Mr. JOHN J. BURNS,
Office of the Supervisor,
Oyster Bay, N.Y.

DEAR MR. BURNS: It has come to my attention that Oyster Bay Township has recently awarded a contract to a commercial gravel company for the dredging of the harbor near the biological laboratory of the Long Island Biological Association. I am writing this letter to urge that steps be taken to cancel this dredging contract.

The area in question has long been known and treasured among scientists here and abroad for its quite extraordinary wealth in marine life. The opportunities are very rare to find in one locality abundant supplies of organisms that are of great importance for scientific research. It this unusual situation which has provided a solid foundation for the value of the biological laboratory and which has attracted large numbers of investigators to it. Dredging operations would inevitably destroy the existing natural balance and would, as a consequence, put in question the future value and very existence of the biological laboratory.

The officials of Oyster Bay Township evidently could not be expected to appreciate the scientific implications which dredging would bring about. In calling attention to it, I feel confident that scientists will be unanimous in urging you to seek a way by which this scientific disaster can be averted and by which the future usefulness of the biological laboratory can be protected. I am certain that all scientists will be grateful to the township officials for their cooperation.

Yours sincerely,

WALTER LANDAUER,
Professor of Genetics.

DEVELOPMENT OF LATIN AMERICA AND RECONSTRUCTION OF CHILE—AMENDMENT

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I submit an amendment, intended to be proposed by me, to the bill (S. 3839) to provide for assistance in the development of Latin America and in the reconstruction of Chile, and for other purposes, the administration's proposed Latin America assistance program. This amendment would provide for the establishment of the Americas Cooperative Bank.

The Americas Cooperative Bank Act establishes a program of assistance to the 20 American Republics that will be immediate, effective and continuing and conducted on a businesslike basis.

The program would be initiated through an existing agency, the Export-Import Bank of Washington, which has sufficient financial authorization to meet the needs of the program.

Under the act a cooperative bank would be established in every American Republic which wishes to join in the program. An Americas Cooperative Bank would not be restricted in its loaning powers except as determined by its own board of directors.

It could make loans to: Individual farmers, farm groups, homesteading organizations, either governmental or private, small businessmen, large businessmen, other banks or loan firms, and builders of either homes or business places.

Government agencies for such purposes as new, expanded or improved public utilities; new, expanded or improved health, education and welfare institutions or programs; or, any other governmental functions determined to be for the betterment of the country's citizens or economic position; communications operations, either by government or private enterprise, transportation operations, either public or private, scientific development, either private or public, shipping and other trade facilities, either private or public.

The loans would be made in either dollars or the currency of the participating country, but loans could be repaid in either currency. Interest rates and terms of the loans would be determined by the directors of each bank.

Creation of each cooperative bank would be through the joint purchase of stock by the participating country and the Export-Import Bank. Each country may purchase with its own currency any portion of the stock of the Bank and the Export-Import Bank of Washington would purchase the balance with dollars.

The individual bank directorship would be proportioned by the ownership of the stock. The cooperative bank may sell stock to private individuals, corporations or other entities.

Each cooperative bank may, at any time, retire the Export-Import Bank stock by purchase of the stock in dollars.

Each cooperative bank will bear the name of the participating countries, for example the Brazil-United States Cooperative Bank.

Provision is made in the act for the Export-Import Bank to use up to $1 billion of its existing loan authorization to make purchase of the stock in the cooperative banks.

The Export-Import Bank would not be required to pay interest to the U.S.

Treasury for the funds used in the Americas Cooperative Act. However, any dividends from the Americas Cooperative Banks would be paid into the Treasury of the United States up to an amount equal to the interest charged against the other operations of the Export-Import Bank.

Through the use of loan repayments and interest each cooperative bank will create a revolving fund which enables the bank to continue its helpful operations indefinitely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and appropriately referred.

The amendment was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage of employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I shall suggest the absence of a quorum, because I assume that various Senators desire to speak; and I hope that those who do will be notified by the attachés of the Senate, and will be told that their presence is desired, because we are ready to transact the public business.

So, Mr. President, I now suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FRANK B. NICHOLS

Mrs. SMITH. Mr. President, one of the most illustrious sons of the State of Maine has passed on to his greater reward. His passing is mourned by Maine and its citizens. He was a giant in the field of journalism, having been a charter member of the Associated Press.

I speak of the late Frank B. Nichols, of Bath, Maine, who was not only an outstanding journalist himself, but whose family is one of the first families of journalism not only in Maine, but outside of Maine.

The Portland Press Herald of August 13, 1960, had an editorial which expresses the feeling in Maine very well, and I ask unanimous consent that it be placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Maine newspaper family lost a senior member Friday with the death of Frank B. Nichols, for 63 years publisher of the Bath Daily Times.

Wooden sailing ships crowded the wharves and anchorages of the Kennebec River city when he became owner of the Bath paper. While he became owner of the Brunswick Record in later years and was associated with the Biddeford Journal Publishing Co. at one time, the Bath Times always seemed to be Mr. Nichols' paper. The tall, quick-moving figure was as much a part of the Front Street scene as the wide window of his firm's business office.

Names made news, Mr. Nichols would remind his staff, and in a small city the people were interested in the names of their neighbors, what they were doing, whether it was a trip to Europe or a day's shopping in Portland or a weekend in Boston. And the reporter who checked these activities at the railroad station at train time was sure to win approval. But time moved and even as the ships had left the river so too did the trains also disappear.

Frank Nichols served his State as a member of the Governor's Council, he served his community by scores of civic activities and in a dozen different business roles. He served his profession as head of both the Maine Daily Newspaper Publishers Association and the Maine Press Association. But most of all he served it by making the name of his newspaper an honorable one for 63 years.

In his death there is the passing of an era in Bath for together with the late Harry C. Webber, managing editor of Mr. Nichols' paper for so many years, there was an aura of permanence, of indestructibility, for whatever befell the community these two could remember equally difficult times and the manner in which the city survived them.

The Maine newspaper fraternity will miss Frank Nichols no less than will Bath's Front Street.

DEATH OF PAUL CUNNINGHAM

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on behalf of my senior colleague [Mr. O'MAHONEY] I announce to this body with profound sorrow the death of the immediate past president and director of public affairs of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers (ASCAP), on Sunday, August 14.

Paul Cunningham, a songwriter and a member of ASCAP since 1921, was well known to literally hundreds of Members of Congress.

He was persevering and courageous in his efforts to promote the welfare of his fellow music makers. Modest in demeanor, he was tireless in bringing to the attention of the Congress matters concerning copyright legislation and protection of musical property of composers, authors and publishers.

I know I express the feeling of his many friends in the Senate of the United States when I transmit our profound sympathy to Mrs. Cunningham and the society which he represented.

Services will be held Wednesday, August 17, at St. Patrick's Cathedral at 11 a.m.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a biography of the late Paul Cunningham.

There being no objection, the biography was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Paul Cunningham, well-known songwriter and author, was born in New York City on January 25, 1890. He became a member of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers in 1921 and a director in 1945, a position which he continued to occupy at the time of his death. He was secretary of ASCAP from 1951 to 1953, president from 1956 to 1959, and director of public affairs since 1959.

Educated in the New York public schools and at Manhattan College, Mr. Cunningham became interested in theatricals and songwriting through staging college shows. After taking his degree of bachelor of arts in 1914, he became a member of the writing staff of the Harry Von Tilzer Publishing Co. During that time he wrote many songs with Mr Von Tilzer, including several interpolations for the Ziegfeld Follies. Subsequently, he joined M. Witmark & Sons, the music publishing company, as a staffwriter. During this long association, he wrote many songs in collaboration with such composers as Ernest R. Ball and other staff composers connected with the firm.

During his writing career with M. Witmark & Sons, Mr. Cunningham, together with his wife, formed what soon became a headline vaudeville act (Cunningham and Bennett). This team not only played the Keith circuit for many years, but also wrote, directed and produced for this circuit many stage presentations. In 1928, Mr. and Mrs. Cunningham played the music halls in England and the Continent. While in Europe, Mr. Cunningham wrote several songs for the English public. As vaudeville producers, Cunningham and Bennett developed a number of actors who later became important stars of stage, screen, and radio, including Emmanuel List, later of the Metropolitan Opera, and Ona Munson, who made her first major success in the motion picture "Gone With the Wind."

Among the well-known composers with whom Mr. Cunningham has been associated are Sigmund Romberg, Joe Burke, Abel Baer, James Monaco, Sammy Step, Peter DeRose, Earl Carroll, Vaughn Monroe, John Jacob Loeb, Ira Schuster, Leonard Whitcup, and others.

Among Mr. Cunningham's hundreds of songs are: "I Am an American"; "Please Take a Letter, Miss Brown"; "From the Vine Came the Grape"; "Thank the Lord for This Thanksgiving Day"; "Have a Smile for Everyone You Meet"; "Coronation Waltz"; "All Over Nothing at All"; "Men of Steel" (official song of the United Steelworkers of America); "The Shores of Tripoli"; "That's How I Believe in You"; "You Can't Make a Fool Out of Me"; "Piggy Wiggy Woo"; "Hats Off to MacArthur"; "Four Buddies"; "Dakota"; "Harriet"; "All for Love"; "Give a Broken Heart a Break"; "I Do Better Up in the Mountains Than I Do Down by the Sea"; "From the Cradle to the Cross"; "Never a Day Goes By"; "Hold Me Just a Little Longer, Daddy"; "It's a Beautiful Day"; "The Bible on the Table and the Flag Upon the Wall." Songs written for the Ziegfeld Follies include "If It Wasn't for You"; "Baby Love"; and "Chateau of Love."

DIABETIC WOMAN ASKS FOR MEDICAL CARE PROGRAM

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, recently a 70-year-old diabetic woman wrote me, telling me that medical assistance is necessary if she is to eke out a bare existence and continue to live in her community near her church.

I ask unanimous consent that her letter be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR SENATOR: I am a diabetic, and that disease has to be checked frequently by a doctor besides the insulin, test tablets, needles, and other things that a diabetic needs to keep check of their blood sugar.

I get a social security check of $69 a month but after I pay my rent of $45 a month and go to the doctor, and pay for my medicine, you can well imagine that I do not have money left to buy any clothing or ever go to any amusements.

I have been babysitting a little, but I am 70 years old, and that is a real hard job for one of that age. The only way I have been managing is my one son has helped me a little, but he has a large family, and it makes it hard for him.

I live in an upstairs apartment, and there are two flights of stairs I have to climb to get up there. I like my apartment so I want to live here. It is handy to my church.

NEW YORK TIMES PLEADS FOR SOUND HEALTH INSURANCE PROGRAM BASED ON SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on Saturday the Senate Finance Committee rejected the social security approach to a health insurance program for the aged. I hope that we can make an all-out fight to reverse this position, or, if this should not be possible, I would prefer to defer this issue until January rather than freeze out the eminently sound social security approach forever by precipitate action at this session.

That distinguished oracle of conservative opinion on domestic matters—the New York Times—just yesterday spoke out again in support of the soundness of the social security approach to health insurance for the retired. I think this is entirely consistent with the general philosophy of the Times of enlightened, prudent, financially responsible, cautious progress on national welfare programs.

As the Times writes:

This would not differ in principle from the protection now given against the loss of earnings due to disability. And, as in the entire OASI program, no handout by the Government would be called for. The relatively small additional levy needed to meet the costs would not be paid by the taxpayers but by those directly concerned—the workers themselves (59 million now) and their employers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOCIAL SECURITY'S 25 YEARS

Twenty-five years ago President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed the Social Security Act—then said to be the most comprehensive piece of social legislation ever enacted. His signature was a symbolic endorsement of the end of rugged individualism as a dominant American ideal and of the growing conviction that the American people should have protection against the hazards due to the changing fortunes of the national economy—changes which no individual, no matter how rugged he may be, can do anything about.

It was the suffering of the American people in the dismal thirties, through no fault of their own, that brought about this change—and with it the Social Security Act.

When President Roosevelt signed the bill he called it "a cornerstone in a structure which is being built, but which is by no means complete. * * * What we are doing is good but it is not good enough." Time has borne him out. The act has been an evolving social organism.

The old-age and survivors insurance program is the best known and most important feature of the act—benefits for retired workers, their families and also their survivors. Only 4 years after it was passed Congress began a series of major amendments which have widened the coverage of OASI and increased its benefits. In 1956, for example, protection against one of the hazards of illness was added—the wage loss due to permanent and total disability. In spite of opposition to these changes no serious effort has ever been made to rescind any one of them.

In addition to the OASI program the act provides for grants from the Federal Treasury to the States for assistance to the needy aged and disabled and for dependent children. Such grants are also made to cover the administrative expenses of the Federal-State unemployment compensation system.

Obviously, however, the Social Security Act is not good enough yet. The next 25 years will surely see improvements and expansions such as those of the last quarter-century—wider OASI coverage, increased benefits and the strengthening of the Federal-State unemployment compensation system. The most likely and immediate is an extension of the act to cover some of the costs of health care for the aged.

This would not differ in principle from the protection now given against the loss of earnings due to disability. And, as in the entire OASI program, no handout by the Government would be called for. The relatively small additional levy needed to meet the costs would not be paid by the taxpayers but by those directly concerned—the workers themselves (59 million now) and their employers.

SENATE SHOULD APPROVE FTC'S KINTNER AND ANTITRUST BICKS—FIGHTERS FOR ECONOMIC FREEDOM

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I hope that in the relatively few days we have this session the Senate can act on as many truly qualified nominations as possible. I say this fully realizing the heavy and serious problems our leadership faces.

The Democratic Party and its leadership in the Senate has a record of excellent cooperation with the administration in honoring its appointments to office by Senate confirmation. In many cases I think we have been too willing to cooperate in accepting nominations to administrative positions. I have opposed some nominations our leadership and the Senate have approved.

Today I am taking a contrary course. I am taking the extraordinary position of speaking out on the floor of the Senate to plead for two Eisenhower administration nominations at this time because I have ascertained that, unless there is a change in the present situation, neither of two eminently well-qualified men is likely to be confirmed. The nominations of both will die with sine die adjournment in a few days, and the country will have lost two men who are more than competent and gifted public servants. These are men who have uniquely distinguished themselves in fighting for economic freedom—at a time when recruiting public officials is very difficult, and when it is particularly hard to retain in public life the man who has the ability to fight for the public interest against vested special interest and to win the fight.

To be specific, I am distressed that our own Democratic Party in the Senate now seems unlikely to vote to confirm the renomination of Earl Kintner as head of the Federal Trade Commission and of Robert Bicks as the Department of Justice's antitrust chief during this August session.

Both of these men have been vigorous champions of free and honest competition. Both have done dramatically successful administrative jobs. Both are vehemently opposed by monopolistic big business.

I have been a frequent critic of the Eisenhower administration and many of its appointees; but the administration deserves a solid pat on the back for the fine performance of these men.

If the Democratic Party, with its 66-to-34 majority in the Senate, rejects these two nominations, how can we square our action with our assertion in our platform a short month ago in Los Angeles when we proudly asserted as the fourth right of man "the right of every businessman, large and small, to trade in an atmosphere of freedom from unfair competition and domination by monopolies at home and abroad?"

Chairman Kintner has taken vigorous charge of the Federal Trade Commission, which was created primarily to fight for clean and honest competition in the interests of the small businessman and the consumer, and he has done a first-class job of putting it to work after a decade of idleness. He has done this in 14 short months.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Small Business of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I have been repeatedly impressed by the hard-hitting action taken by the FTC under Kintner's direction for small business, and by the warm response of small businessmen all over the country to him. He has vastly stepped up the antitrust action of his agency. Since he became Chief of FTC, it has issued twice as many antimonopoly complaints as in the preceding year. And no one has done a better missionary job of arousing the independent business community to the values of free and honest competition all over the country.

Robert Bicks has put more drive and energy into the antitrust division than it has seen in a long, long time. The complaints of the giants of American industry have been loud and long against Bicks. He is a man of rare intellectual capacity and of legal competence which has been demonstrated over and over again against the best brains big money can buy. He has been that rare and invaluable man in a modern rapidly growing industrial democracy like ours: a successful trust buster.

I say this although I have vigorously disagreed with Bicks over Fair Trade proposals. I still think he is wrong and I am right on this matter. But in spite of this important disagreement, I am, of course, in far more fundamental agreement with him on the necessity to make a constant fight for economic freedom, and Bicks has been leading that fight and winning it.

For the Democratic Party to reject these appointments would be foolish politically and tragic for the national interest.

BIRTHDAY FELICITATIONS TO SENATOR KUCHEL

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, 1 year is equal to one journey of the Earth around the Sun. Today the Earth has completed 50 journeys around the Sun since our very distinguished assistant leader, the minority whip, the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], came upon this Earth.

I know nothing which so well attests to a sense of fixity, stability of purpose, character, and spirit, than to recite the fact that 50 years after that great event he still resides in the town where he was born. This is a fluid age, when people move from one place to another, but he lives where he was born, in the town of Anaheim, Calif.

On his 50th anniversary I wish to salute him for the great citizen, the great Senator, the great public servant he really is. I could very well salute him and compliment him, but I think I would prefer to compliment the people of California for their vision, their perspective, and their sense of selectivity, in choosing him to represent that great Commonwealth in this deliberative body.

So, my friend, today on your 50th anniversary, I salute you.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I was frankly dumbfounded to realize that my leader was speaking about my good friend from California, Senator KUCHEL. I simply cannot attach 50 years to that young face and that very agile and accurate mind. I think, Mr. President, more than anything else it shows what Arizona's water can do to a Californian. [Laughter.]

Above that, I wish to sincerely add my congratulations to my very close friend, TOM KUCHEL, for attaining 50 years and for the great service he has rendered California and the United States. My prayers are that, while he may not be in this body when the next 50 years roll around, he will be happily engaged in whatever pursuit he may follow at that moment. If I had my wishes I would wish it to be here. His service is extremely unique, in that he is devoted to the Senate and devoted to the people of the United States. He is unique, in that he is a Senator one can easily get along with, even though occasionally there are small disagreements.

I value the friendship which has existed between TOM KUCHEL and myself and his wife and my wife above all the friendships I have established in Washington, D.C.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, before I yield to the majority leader, never could I testify to an occasion of this kind without feeling a deep sense of nostalgia. With humility, and profoundly, I utter the sentiment, "Oh, to be 50 again."

I now yield to the majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, all of my life I have had a very healthy respect for the young. It seems, as I grow older, that political events and personal experiences increase that respect for young men.

I join the minority leader in congratulating this distinguished young man who happens to be the deputy minority leader. I know of no Member of this body who is held in more affection by more people, or who deserves it more. He and his lovely wife have been friends of mine and of my family since he first came to this body.

As the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] has so eloquently said, TOMMY KUCHEL will permit small disagreements at times without becoming ugly about them. I believe the Senator from Arizona is correct when he refers to small disagreements on that side. I have had some big disagreements with the Senator from California, but I have found that we can disagree without being disagreeable.

I take pride in his friendship. He is always diligent. He always puts his country first. He is a very fine representative of this body. I wish he were on our side of the aisle. Once in awhile he comes over here, for which I am duly grateful. I know of no man in Congress who is more aware of his duty, or who more consistently performs it well than the distinguished Senator from California. I wish him many happy returns of the day. To him and his lovely wife I wish the best of everything.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I now yield to the distinguished and profound Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I thank the minority leader for those words. I shall try to hold him to them on future occasions.

Let me briefly add my congratulations to my colleague from California. We work closely together in leadership meetings of the Republican Party, in political policy meetings, and elsewhere. He is always frank. He is always clear in expressing how he feels about problems that face us, and he never hesitates to express his view. I think he is an example of what a happy home life and a sound public career can do to keep a man young, and I am confident that both the domestic side of his life and his public career will continue to be happy for many years to come.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, every legislative body must be graced by one who properly undertakes the role of Nestor, the wise and omniscient person of antiquity. So I yield to the Nestor on our side of the aisle, the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY].

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, if I had the faculty of expression of my good friend from Illinois, I am sure that I would be glad to strew flowers as he has bestowed them upon my good friend from California.

California has produced many great characters for the Senate and for the country, but somehow or other there is something unique about this man KUCHEL. He and I engage in a little German conversation on the side once in a while. I realize that while Arizona water has made a contribution to the welfare of the Senator from California, I believe also California fruit and Wisconsin cheese have made their contribution also in building this fine character. I join in all the fine things that have been said about him.

The first wonderful thing about him is that he is so genial. No matter where I see him or meet him there is the smile of friendship.

Then, of course, he is a man of definite ideas. There is no question about that. He disagrees at times with some in his own party, but that only shows that he is a man of conviction.

So I am delighted to join my colleagues on this happy occasion in felicitating the senior Senator from California, and wishing for him and his wife many more years of service to his State, his Government and the people of this country, and many more years of good life, which will make his service more valuable as the years pass.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to my old friend and compatriot of House of Representative days as well as Senate days, the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS].

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I too would like to add my salutations to my very dear friend, the senior Senator from California, who is, I presume, exhibit No. 1 in proof of the fact that the waters of Ponce de Leon's Fountain of Youth are not exclusively limited to the State of Florida. Certainly there is something in California, too, that would enable this young man, with such wide experience, to look so young and to be so vigorous at what today is becoming a very young age, 50 years old.

One of the very pleasant aspects of serving in the U.S. Senate is the privilege of serving with TOM KUCHEL, whose humor is always marvelous and never failing, and whose dedication to his job is always inspirational. His friendship is appreciated by many Senators. I wish for him and his lovely wife many happy years in the future, and many more birthdays to come.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The distinguished Senator from Arizona uttered the allegation a moment ago that the vitality, vigor, and youth of our distinguished friend from California is in large measure due to Arizona water. Whether Colorado water has contributed to this vigor, I do not know, but I yield to my amiable and distinguished friend from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Illinois; otherwise I would have had to ask the Senator to yield on a matter of personal privilege, because there is no question about the fact that the wonderfully youthful appearance of our friend and colleague is due in no small part to the salubrious mountain waters that trickle down from Colorado into the Colorado River and terminate in Los Angeles. Today I particularly wish to recognize his birthday and to pay tribute to him on achieving this mark. I know he will have many more, because he shows no signs at this point of even beginning to slow down.

As a tribute to him, I think many of us will remember him for his devotion to his committee work and his duties in the Senate, to which he brings a quality which all Senators remember. When things become too tight and too tense and others become a little too serious, he has the very happy faculty of pulling out of his hip pocket or somewhere in the deep resources of his mind a funny story, which probably is very close to the point being discussed, and which lessens the pressure, thus enabling everyone to get back to work.

TOMMY, I wish you a happy birthday, and wish you and your lovely wife many years of happiness.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I recall on one occasion campaigning in the district of my esteemed friend from northern California [Mr. ENGLE]. That was long ago. I believe Shasta County was a part of the congressional district of the junior Senator from California. I tried to be kindly and restrained at that time. I am sure now that the great Central Valley portion of California must have contributed to the well-being of my esteemed friend and associate. So I yield to the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE].

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, I appreciate the statement of the Senator from Illinois and his yielding to me on this occasion. He did appear in the congressional district which I represented for a number of years, speaking, I believe, on behalf of my senior colleague from California. However, the distinguished minority leader did me no harm, and evidently he did the distinguished senior Senator from California great good.

At the risk of extending this birthday greeting into what might be called by the press a filibuster against the minimum wage bill, I take the time to express personally my good wishes to my friend and colleague from California on his birthday and to wish him many happy returns of the day. He and I have known each other for a long time.

I knew him when he served in the State Senate in the California Legislature. I knew him when he was comptroller of the State of California. I knew him, of course, not only when I was in the House and he was in the Senate, but also as his colleague in the Senate. He has been an easy colleague to work with. We have such vast problems, representing 15½ million people, that the two of us are few enough as we stand shoulder to shoulder in these controversies affecting California, even sometimes to the extent of trying to get a little water for southern California, so that those people may still drink, believing, as we do, that water for people is more important than water for land.

I am glad that TOM KUCHEL has lived these 50 years, and that he will live another 50 years, because he will continue to contribute the kind of service, the kind of knowledge, and the kind of intelligence for the State of California that he has contributed in his public service. I congratulate him on his birthday, and I wish him many happy returns of the day.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut with the observation that I do not know whether my esteemed friend from California was getting ready to launch an effort in the direction of having California get four, six, or eight Senators, as distinguished from other States. If so, I am sure that my distinguished friend from Connecticut and I would have to look at such a proposal with a dim eye.

I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I reply in the affirmative to the last observation of the Senator from Illinois especially if we had another Senator from California with the vigor of the two Senators California already has in this body. I am glad that I came into the Chamber to hear the accolades of affection and approval which were being extended to our beloved friend from California.

TOM KUCHEL and I came to the Senate together, almost 8 years ago. Since then his friendship has been one of the rare privileges I have enjoyed, and which I regard as one of the highest amongst the very great treasures which have come to me as a Member of the Senate. His wit, his humor, his enthusiastic approach to our problems, especially since he has been minority whip, have added greatly to our effectiveness on this side of the aisle.

I am glad to join my friends in congratulating him on his 50th birthday, and in wishing him many happy returns of the day.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am not sure whether the benign influence of the great Empire State has made some contribution to California. I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, it seems incredible that our very dear friend from California has lived half a century. He looks so youthful, so vigorously youthful, that it does not seem that 50 years could have elapsed since that fortunate day for California and for the country when he drew his first breath of life.

All of us enjoy serving with TOM KUCHEL. He has been extremely kind and helpful to me as a new Senator and has always been glad to extend a helping hand.

Unfortunately, New York can claim nothing in his upbringing. He has probably never drunk the waters of our rivers. I am not sure whether he has traversed the areas of our State, the beautiful up-State areas, and has visited the great city of New York, one of the world's foremost intellectual, financial, and spiritual centers. Nevertheless, we welcome TOM KUCHEL in New York at any time. We will be glad to see him. His humor, his pleasant manner, and his diligence in the performance of his duties, are very much admired by all of us. I am very glad to extend my felicitations to him on this day, as well as to his lovely wife, who is such a great help to him in his work, and whose good company all of us very much enjoy.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. As the smokestacks continue to rise on the landscape of California, it has a great deal in common with the great industrial State of Pennsylvania. I am sure the Senator from Pennsylvania has something to offer on this occasion.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, in paying tribute to the Senator from California, TOM KUCHEL, I should like to say that Pennsylvania indeed has a very close connection with California, because so many of our people in the past few decades have adopted the advice of Horace Greeley to go West. Senator KUCHEL's State next year will get three more of our Representatives in Congress. Therefore, our connection is quite direct.

I also wish to pay tribute to his lovely wife, and to wish TOM KUCHEL many happy returns of the day. He is graced with the gift of tongues. He not only speaks English very well, but speaks Spanish equally well, and somehow never manages to to get in dutch with anyone. This bilingualism is a characteristic which brings him into very close touch with the Spanish-speaking citizens of California.

So, Mr. President, I join heartily in wishing TOM KUCHEL many happy returns of the day.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I now yield to the Senator from New York. He is a great colleague of ours. As populations increase in such proportions, who shall say that one day in California may not in numbers eclipse the great Empire State? So I know that the distinguished Senator from New York will have some appropriate sentiments to express.

Mr. JAVITS. First I should like to wish TOM KUCHEL, my favorite amigo, a very happy birthday. I extend these wishes not only to him, but also to his wonderful wife, whom all of us know so well.

Second, I wish to warn him that New York will move heaven and earth to see that it is not eclipsed.

This brings me to the serious note I wish to utter. We opened this Congress with some differences of opinion on this side of the aisle, which happily turned out very constructively both for the Republican Party and for the country. I found in that experience a nobility of character and tremendous integrity in Senator KUCHEL, which is as pure as man may feel, and is one of the blessings of serving in this body where a man's character is so clearly revealed as men work together so constantly.

Standing, as you do, at the summit of your experience, in the very middle of it, TOM, you have every right to reflect with deep gratification and great happiness upon the fact that you have measured up in the eyes of your colleagues more than fully as a U.S. Senator, a position the most august gift within the power of our people, other than the Presidency and Vice Presidency; and that you have won, as I know you have, so much affection from your colleagues, with your very warm personal character. On your 50th birthday, we know that this is not done with mirrors, but is done with the application of character, and you have earned every bit of the regard of your colleagues.

Mr. HRUSKA rose.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, my friend from California, if he flies west from Chicago, can look down on a portion of the terrain of this country and say to whoever sits next to him, "We are now flying over the great Commonwealth which is the home of my good friends, ROMAN HRUSKA and CARL CURTIS, from the State of Nebraska."

Mr. President, I now yield to the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I thank the minority leader for yielding to me in this fashion. I think it would not be amiss to have another voice from the midlands heard on this auspicious occasion, and to add my good wishes and congratulations to those already expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Illinois, and others.

I wish we could say that the great waters from Nebraska found their way over to the State of our good Senator from California. We cannot quite say that. We are separated by the Rocky Mountains, which makes it impossible for us to follow that plan.

However, we want to testify to the vigor and the enthusiasm with which the distinguished senior Senator from California has served as our whip, as our assistant leader. We are greatly benefited by that in Nebraska, as are all other States of the Union, as well.

Not too long ago it was observed that the wife of the senior Senator from California is possessed of youthful appearance, sweetness, and graciousness. It was suggested that perhaps one reason for that is that living with the senior Senator from California is not too difficult, inasmuch as he is not home very much. That was said in jest, I am certain; but if it were not said in jest, the reason why the senior Senator from California is not home very much is his great devotion to his duties in the Senate. We who are his colleagues certainly can testify to that.

Not only that, but I know of no man who is more devoted to his family. Mrs. Hruska and the Senator from Nebraska have often been favored by the hospitality and generosity of the senior Senator from California and his fine wife. We can testify to their very excellent character.

So I join in the compliments and the congratulations of the day, and echo the thought of the distinguished junior Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE] that at least another 50 years we hope will be added to the lifespan of our beloved colleague.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Illinois to yield to me.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, from Vermont to California almost the entire width of the Republic is encompassed. I yield with pleasure to the distinguished Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Illinois. I felt it was my duty to raise a warning. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA], should be a little more cautious about expressing the thought that California might have difficulty in getting any Nebraska water. Californians are a very ingenious people, and need only be given time.

However, I concur in everything which has been said in praise of our colleague from California. If I may paraphrase an old saying, "If there is anything else nice they haven't called him, he is it."

Mr. President, I join with other Senators who have complimented the senior Senator from California on reaching the age of 50 without looking more than half that age. If he looked any younger, they probably would be running him for President. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, probably no greater contrast can be found than that between the snowy peaks of Alaska and the golden sunshine of California. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Alaska.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I am so happy to be here on this occasion to join in the well deserved tributes to our good friend, TOM KUCHEL. He is one of my favorite Senators. We have many things in common. One is that we both share in the admiration of one very great American who as Governor of California had the wisdom, the perspicacity, and the vision originally to appoint Senator KUCHEL to the Senate, and has since that time become the great Chief Justice of the United States.

We have many other things in common. Senator KUCHEL was from the start a dedicated supporter of statehood for Alaska and Hawaii. We share affection for our neighbors to the south—the Mexican people. I could go on almost indefinitely, but to pay our minority whip a truly adequate encomium would be so time consuming that I might be suspected of filibustering; and that is a charge I do not wish to incur.

So, my congratulations go out to you, TOMMY KUCHEL, 50 years young. That is wonderful. As was said long ago by a much higher authority, "A little child shall lead them." In these days, when youth has come forward in our Nation and taken the leadership, it is wonderful to see one of such tender years in so important a position carrying on in it in so able and statesmanlike manner, and with so much future to look forward to for more effective and devoted public service not only for his great home State of California but for the entire Nation.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, once I met a very precise and distinguished lady, to whom I mentioned the name of the State of Iowa. She said, "I should correct you. Where I come from, we call it Ohio." So I yield to the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished minority leader. I should like to add a word of devotion to the tributes being paid TOM KUCHEL of California, and to express my congratulations.

My young colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], and I are truly envious of you, TOM KUCHEL, in attaining the youthful age of 50 years. When we think of how old we really are, we know that you must have before you many happy and fruitful years. In our belief, we feel sure that 50 years more is not asking too much.

Seriously, Mr. President, when I first came to the Senate, one of the first Senators with whom I became acquainted was the distinguished senior Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL]. He is my idea of a fine public servant. I think I may truly say that he is one of my favorite members of the Grand Old Party, of which I am a member. On many issues we think alike and have voted alike. I am happy to congratulate him.

TOM KUCHEL has manifested great friendship toward me. I am proud to record him as my sincere, personal friend. I know that he has a fine future ahead in the service of his country. He has made a magnificent record as a U.S. Senator from California.

All of us in the Senate today wish TOM KUCHEL godspeed and success in whatever he undertakes.

Mr. PASTORE addressed the Chair.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I have not had a Latin book open in 60 years—perhaps 50 years. However, I think that on this occasion I could use the expression "multum in parvo"—"much in little." Small as Rhode Island may be territorially, we must acknowledge how much she has contributed to this body. It is with real delight that I now yield to the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PASTORE. I thank my colleague and friend from Illinois. I cherish the opportunity to express a word of felicitation to my good friend from California, TOM KUCHEL, whom I am accustomed to call "amigo" on the floor of the Senate. I think there are few Members of the Senate who are more personable than the senior Senator from California. He has a way about him. As a matter of fact, I like to put it this way: He is very "simpatico"; he has a way with people. He has sympathy, yet he is very gracious.

Speaking of Latin, I think I could best say to my good friend, TOM KUCHEL, and his beloved family: "Ad multos annos."

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, many have been the occasions when I visited the hills of West Virginia, always to carry the gospel of my party, but always with restraint where my friend, with whom I served so long in the House of Representatives, was involved. So I yield to the distinguished senior Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I am most grateful for the warmth the distinguished minority leader used in the statement he just gave. He knows how I cherish his friendship; and I need not say more, because our friendship has been kept green since 1933, when we came here as Representatives in the 73d Congress.

Mr. President, I could speak at length about my personal affection for Senator TOM KUCHEL; but I shall only embrace the meaningful tributes which have been expressed. I wish for him and for his loved ones continued health and happiness, and in his duties here the full measure of success to which he is justly entitled.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, what has been uttered on this floor today is, in essence, the testimony of affection, esteem, and love that we bear for our distinguished friend, Senator KUCHEL, of California. So we salute him.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I should like to join in paying tribute to the distinguished assistant minority leader, Senator TOM KUCHEL, of California. I do not know anyone who excels him in always being in a most cheerful mood and in being ready at all times to do something for his friends.

He has won a very warm spot in my heart on many occasions, particularly on one occasion when I had an opportunity to visit Los Angeles. Without my knowledge, the able and distinguished senior Senator from California arranged for someone to meet me at the airport and to take me about the city. That and many other courtesies which he has extended to me have earned for him an exceedingly soft spot in my heart. In fact, Mr. President, despite the strength of my democracy, if I were to become a resident of California, I would certainly be subjected to a most severe temptation—for the first time in my life—to vote for a Republican.

Mr. MANSFIELD subsequently said: Mr. President, I regret that I was not present in the Chamber earlier today to join with my colleagues in congratulating my counterpart on the Republican side, the Republican whip, the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], on his 50th birthday anniversary.

The reason for my absence was the fact that we have been holding hearings in the Foreign Relations Committee on a much needed and essential aid program for Latin America, which the administration has proposed for the consideration of that committee. I want the Senate to know, however, that I think we are extremely fortunate to have a man of the caliber of TOM KUCHEL occupying the position he does and performing the work which is part of his function in this body. He is a man of great integrity. He is a man of tolerance and understanding. He is an extremely good and capable Senator. And I not only wish him luck and extend my congratulations on this his 50th birthday, but I express the hope that 50 years from now he will still be around, doing the kind of job he has done for the people of his State and the Nation.

We are delighted TOM KUCHEL is with us to make these many contributions. We wish him continued success in the years ahead.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will my friend yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I would have preferred to have this birthday anniversary go unnoticed, although I must say I am made happy by the felicitations which my friend and leader, EVERETT DIRKSEN, of Illinois, and my other friends on this side of the aisle and on the other side, have expressed.

My membership in the Senate, however long or short it may be, has been one of the most moving and thrilling experiences in my life; and I am most grateful for the friendships I have made with my colleagues.

So I simply wish to say—since it is no longer a secret that this is my birthday, and since my beloved family is in California, and I am here for the moment alone—although my Belgian shepherd dog, Duke, is giving me a bit of companionship—that I thank all of you from the bottom of my heart for your friendship and your very gracious and kind thoughts. Next to my family and the friends I have been able to make in my life, the Members of the Senate continue to enrich my days, and for that I am more grateful than I can say.

DR. HUGH H. BENNETT, FATHER OF SOIL CONSERVATION

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, no remarks can adequately pay tribute to the distinguished life of Dr. Hugh H. Bennett, the quiet, effective native North Carolinian who died on July 7, 1960. Born on a farm in Anson County, N.C., he saw in his youth the urgent need for soil conservation. It was as a soil scientist, following his graduation from the University of North Carolina, that he began a record of public service to this Nation and the world, a record that has put his name at the forefront of the great North Carolinians and Americans of this century. Of the many articles on the life of Dr. Bennett, I have selected one from the Milwaukee, Wis., Journal which was republished in the Winston-Salem, N.C., Journal of July 28, 1960. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SOIL IS HIS MEMORIAL—A TAR HEEL'S FIGHT AGAINST EROSION

(By R. G. Lynch)

Great men usually are memorialized in stone or metal but the earth itself is being carved into a memorial to Hugh Bennett. His name is revered wherever men till the soil.

Fifty years ago, as a young man, Bennett saw that precious topsoil was washing away from cultivated slopes throughout the United States. Other men before him had observed this erosion but it was he who realized its threat to the Nation's food supply.

Before he died recently at Burlington, N.C., Bennett saw soil conservation become a policy of his Government. He saw cultivated slopes bearing the curved lines of contour plowing, strip cropping and terracing, and he watched the development of long green belts of grass waterways which are saving millions of tons of topsoil.

Because Bennett was a hard crusader, nearly 2 million farmers and ranchers, about half of the Nation's food producers, are carrying out his ideas on soil saving. Most of these growers have basic conservation plans for their land, prepared with the aid of the Soil Conservation Service (SCS), which he founded.

At least 50 other nations have established similar programs. Every year representatives of foreign countries come to the United States to study our soil conservation program and get help from the SCS. Bennett went to some foreign countries to help them get started.

BENNETT CUP

Sao Paulo, largest state in Brazil, observes his birthday every year with a soil conservation day. The year's progress is reviewed and "taca Hugh Bennett"—Hugh Bennett cup—is presented for the best conservation achievement.

Louis Bromfield, the author, an early convert to soil conservation on his Ohio farm, wrote a book, "Big Hugh, the Father of Soil Conservation," published by Macmillan in 1950. He called Bennett "one of the greatest benefactors since the beginning of (American) history."

Bennett's message was that "poor land makes poor people." In a reference to Bennett in "Out of the Earth," Bromfield wrote that poor people "are the victims of the poor, monotonous, unbalanced diets induced by poverty and still more profoundly by the deficiencies of food grown upon originally poor soils or soils depleted by poor agriculture, which fail to make available to plants, animals and people the residual mineral elements absolutely vital in a sound nutrition.

"An improved agriculture, making these minerals available or replacing them where they are really lacking, means not only higher economic status, less ignorance, prejudice and intolerance, but better physical specimens endowed with energy, active brains and inquiring minds."

Hugh Bennett spent a good deal of his life walking around farmland and died, so to speak, with hayseed still in his hair. With all of his traveling and writing, he still found time for a warm family life. In recent years his home was at Falls Church, Va., near Washington, D.C., where he lived with his wife, Betty. They had a son and daughter, both grown up.

Bennett liked nothing better than to shed his coat and walk around with farmers in shirt sleeves and galluses, as he did on his last visit to Wisconsin. That was in 1955, for the dedication of a roadside marker commemorating the Nation's first soil conservation project in the Coon Valley watershed, near La Crosse. He came to this State often and spoke in Milwaukee about 10 years ago.

The steep slopes and erodible, wind deposited soil of western Wisconsin badly needed conservation practices. Now, because of Bennett's work as a crusader, it is called "the show window of soil conservation."

TAR HEEL BORN

Bennett was born April 15, 1881, on a North Carolina farm where his father used crude terraces in an effort to prevent topsoil from washing away. He was graduated from the University of North Carolina in 1903, with a chemistry degree, and a few weeks later was working as a soil surveyor for the now defunct Federal Bureau of Soils.

He is credited with the first true soil erosion survey in history, in Louisa County, Va., and with identifying sheet erosion. This almost imperceptible loss of soil from gentle slopes is recognized as the most dangerous kind. It is easier for farmers to see and do something about gullies and rivulets on steeper slopes.

For 20 years, Bennett plugged away, trying to sell soil conservation to his superiors, to farmers and farm leaders. He had remarkable tenacity, showmanship, writing ability, and the knack of speaking effectively to any kind of audience. His pamphlet, "Soil Erosion a National Menace," brought approving comments from a few farm editors in 1928 and an invitation to appear before a House committee in Washington.

There his talk about erosion and methods of dealing with it led to an appropriation of $160,000 for soil erosion investigations, the first congressional recognition. Ten experiment stations were authorized, including one at La Crosse in which the University of Wisconsin cooperates. Demonstrations there have convinced thousands of farmers of the need to save soil, and improved conservation methods, including crop rotations, have been developed.

Congress followed up in 1933 by creating the Soil Erosion Service in the Interior Department, with Bennett as Chief, to put the experiments into practice on farms. Coon Valley, project No. 1, began within 3 weeks.

But it took the "dust bowl" to give soil conservation its big boost. When clouds of soil from the southern plains darkened the skies all the way to Washington, D.C., in 1934, President Roosevelt called for measures to prevent "another Sahara desert." Congress responded by creating the Soil Conservation Service. Bennett moved back to the Agriculture Department as the SCS's first Administrator and took with him 39 projects under way and plans for many more.

Now he had full scope for his remarkable talents. He built up a scientific and technical agency from scratch, made missionaries of his men, sold soil and water conservation to skeptical farmers and won increasingly large appropriations from Congress.

When he retired as Administrator in 1951, the Service had 14,665 employees, a budget of nearly $60 million, and a watershed program under way.

A JAR OF HONEY

Bennett's congressional committee appearances have become almost legendary. He would lug in anything to illustrate a point simply and effectively—a jar of honey, a 100-year-old fence post, a plow without a moldboard.

In a pamphlet, "And History Is Already Shining on Him," published last year by the American Potash Institute, Santford Martin, Jr., former North Carolina public relations man, wrote:

"It wasn't Bennett's statistics that caught the fancy of Congress; it was his showmanship, his salesmanship * * *. He usually came lugging these devices into the committee room himself, with his hair ruffled, tie twisted, vest half buttoned, and trouser cuffs dragging. But Congress liked it. And so did the people."

Bennett, a 6-foot, 195-pounder, was a hard worker. He wrote five books and hundreds of technical and popular articles and pamphlets. He traveled around the world, observing erosion and advising on conservation methods. He founded the Soil Conservation Society of America, which has grown to an international membership of 10,000. He was a fellow of scientific societies and a member of many other associations.

The University of North Carolina has established the Hugh Bennett Memorial Library of his writings. Ohio soil conservation districts dedicated a granite boulder with a bronze plate as a monument to him.

But no one need go to Licking County, Ohio, to read the plate on the boulder. Any airplane traveler, looking down at the landscape for a few minutes, almost anywhere, will see Hugh Bennett's memorial in the carvings of the earth's face to prevent erosion.

FOREIGN GOODS HURT U.S. TEXTILES

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, on occasions in the past I have undertaken to call the attention of the Senate to the plight in which the textile industry finds itself as a result of the maladministration of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

On August 7, 1960, the Greensboro Daily News, of Greensboro, N.C., published an article entitled "Foreign Goods Seen Hurting U.S. Textiles." The article which was written by David L. Owens, portrays with great clarity some of the injuries being inflicted on the textile industry by reason of the disregard of the concept embodied in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act as originated by Cordell Hull.

As a member of the subcommittee charged with drafting the Democratic platform at the recent Los Angeles convention, I suggested the inclusion in that platform of a plank which pledged the Democratic Party to take action to restore the reciprocal trade agreements concept to the state in which it was envisaged by its father, Cordell Hull. I regret to say that I was unsuccessful in that endeavor.

Mr. President, I have before me a copy of my suggestion. It bears the title "Platform Plank Recommended to the Democratic Platform Committee by Delegate SAM J. ERVIN, JR." I ask unanimous consent that the article published in the Greensboro Daily News of August 7, 1960, and the recommendation I made to the drafting subcommittee of the Democratic platform committee be printed at this point in the RECORD, as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article and the statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Greensboro (N.C.) Daily News, Aug. 7, 1960]

FOREIGN GOODS SEEN HURTING U.S. TEXTILES—BETTER IMPORT CONTROLS STRESSED TO KEEP PLANTS, JOBS IN AMERICA

(By David L. Owens)

Unless the flood of low-cost goods from foreign countries is controlled, America's textile industry will drown.

That warning is being voiced by top men in four leading textile firms.

They say that unless the flood is held back, they can keep afloat only by moving their factories to countries where raw materials are somewhat cheaper and labor is far cheaper than in the United States.

Then, some 2 million American textile workers can kiss their jobs goodby.

Many American manufacturers already have left this fair land—for a fairer deal somewhere else.

And the United States is already exporting jobs, textile leaders say.

What's happening, they say, is that the lack of reasonable quota restrictions on imports from cheap-labor countries is, in effect, causing America to export jobs.

NOT ENOUGH JOBS

And as everybody knows, there aren't enough jobs to go around in the United States as it is.

When the Nation's retail stores can offer increasingly better foreign-made goods at prices lower than American-made goods, the American family is going to buy the cheaper items.

That may sound like a good deal for the American family, but what's it going to do to the American economy when thousands upon thousands of American textile workers are standing in a breadline, eating off American taxpayers?

Surely Japan and Hong Kong aren't going to chip in to help pay Uncle Sam's relief bill. Is that an exaggeration? At the moment, it is, but textile leaders solemnly declare we're heading in that dismal direction more and more every year.

STATISTICAL TOTALS

Spencer Love, president and chairman of the board of Burlington Industries, cautions that folks may see published statistical totals of imports and say they are not too serious a proportion of our total market.

"But to textile-minded people, knowing the rapid growth actualities and potentialities, we need no great imaginations to foresee what will happen," he said.

"In many industries such as ours the latest in both machines and end products can be copied literally overnight; technological progress over decades can be leapfrogged, and with wages ranging from 10 to 12 percent of ours, and raw materials substantially lower, it takes no genius to figure out what can happen in not too long," he declared.

Take this example of what's already happened from E. A. Morris, president of Blue Bell, Inc.:

"Garments imported last year from Japan and Hong Kong, alone, represent the production of 97 plants in the United States with an average of 250 employees per plant," Morris said.

During 1959, he continued, the imports of shirts, trousers, brassieres, gloves, and miscellaneous items from Japan and Hong Kong amounted to around 11 million dozen.

If that number of items had been made in the United States, more than 24,000 employees would have earned more than $50 million making the garments alone, Morris said.

He estimated that if those garments had been made in this country, they'd have had a wholesale value of around $485 million.

Add to that the money textile workers and manufacturing firms would have made if the cloth for those 11 million dozen items had been purchased from American firms, and the money the American farmer would have made if the cotton he grew was used in the manufacture.

Probably the most frustrating thing about the whole situation, textile leaders seem to agree, is that we have laws which would protect the textile industry if the "administration" would see fit to put them into effect.

Another effort to make the folks in Washington see the light will be made Monday by Spencer Love when he talks to the Committee for Reciprocity Information, prior to the group's meeting with the General Agreement on Tariff and Trade organization, world body which seeks to establish tariff agreements between nations.

Thus far, the administration has steadfastly refused to put the protective laws we have into effect, answering to each argument that the United States must help less fortunate countries to get back on their productive feet.

Friendship is nice, but when they start using those protective feet to walk all over you, it is time to stop being quite so buddy-buddy.

Ceaser Cone, president of Cone Mills Corp., believes in friendship, too, but he thinks it's time to draw the line on the import phase of the situation.

GOOD IDEA

He thinks this all for one and one for all idea is fine—if the United States wants to knock down its high standard of living to the level of countries where workers get one-tenth the salary of American workers and little if any job security, social security, and other benefits of the American worker.

Cone said that for years the textile industry, in its fight to get stricter import quotas on textile goods, has been told that the American textile industry held a trump card over foreign goods—superior styling.

Now, he says, the one area left is being pirated by some U.S. firms allied with foreign firms.

Certain companies over here, potential customers of Cone fabrics, take Cone's color cards and cloth samples (which cost Cone a pretty penny to produce) and send them to their agents in Japan and Hong Kong and other low-cost world areas.

The rest is simple—and very damaging to Cone. Designs and colors are copied. Cone's designs are printed on cloth in Japan. Cheap labor there and in Hong Kong cut and sew the cloth into garments to be exported to the United States.

When the garment gets to the U.S.A. it retails for a lower price than an American manufacturer could put on it if the garment had been produced from American fabrics and sewn in American garment factories.

As examples, Cone showed some children's summer shirt and pants outfits in a size 6. The designs and colors in the shirting seemed to be identical to designs and colors on Cone's sample cards.

FOREIGN LABELS

Yet, the cloth had been printed in the Orient and the garments sewn in the Orient and bore tags reading "Made in Japan" and "Made in Hong Kong."

The outfits were purchased by Cone's merchandising men in a department store in New York for $1.17 per set. If made in the United States, each set would have to retail at $1.98 or more for the garment manufacturer to make a profit, Cone said.

"Pirating" designs is not confined to Cone Mills. Spencer Love says the same things happen to his designs, too. "And there's nothing we can do about it," he adds.

Cone says he doesn't blame importers or stores for taking advantage of the opportunity to buy the garments they can sell cheaper.

"We'd like to take advantage of such opportunities to import at lower costs, but here we have a law denying us the right to import raw cotton," he said.

"Raw cotton sells in the world market at 8 cents per pound lower than the law requires us to pay for domestic cotton," he said. "Our cotton cost is around one-third our overall cost, and the 8 cents a pound is about a 25 percent differential, based on 32-cent cotton."

Cone added: "Unless American production is to be protected, we at Cone Mills had better liquidate and go into the distribution business of buying offshore and selling in America."

All the textile men quoted here agree with Robert T. Stevens, president of J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., that the textile industry is not the only one hurt by a flood of imports.

Stevens has said that a few of the industries are stainless steel flatware, transistors, portable and manual typewriters, sewing machines, leather goods including shoes, rubber footwear, glass, radios, toys, candy, wire, nails, pottery, and machine tools.

"All of these industries have felt the lash of cheap imports," he declared.

He asked: "What does Uncle Sam propose to do about it? Are we going to continue to move parts of the arsenal of democracy overseas to exploit cheap foreign labor? If we export Americans' jobs who are the consumers at home going to be?"

Underlining his statements, Stevens said that 50 American companies are moving their production of machine tools to foreign countries—"in order to survive."

"Just think of it," he said. "Fifty American manufacturers of machine tools moving overseas—the very lifeblood of our American industry machine."

Love was asked how his situation could be so bad in view of the fact that Burlington Industries had an outstandingly good year last year.

"It was a good year," he said. "The best in the last 8 years, and this year has been even better. And do you know what that caused? It caused textile imports to more than double. The flood came on us, and now we're on the way back to where we were—and worse."

Love pointed out that profits must be viewed over a period of years rather than over a period of 12 months. Burlington's stock is now selling for about two-thirds the book value, proving that folks who buy stock don't have too much faith in the industry, he said.

Hearing the recognized leaders of the industry saying things like these about their industry, it's no wonder.

PLATFORM PLANK RECOMMENDED TO THE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM COMMITTEE BY DELEGATE SAM J. ERVIN, JR.

The Democratic Party's traditional policies for liberalized and increased world trade on a reciprocal basis are more than ever essential both for the promotion of the American economy and as a bulwark of world peace. For these reasons, we should expand world trade in every responsible way.

In so doing, we should be mindful of the simple truth that the primary objective of our foreign trade and our domestic industry is the building of economic strength and that this primary objective is thwarted in substantial measure by unwise foreign trade practices which inevitably deprive domestic industry of its domestic markets, workers in such industry of their jobs, and investors in such industry of a fair return upon their investment—events which are virtually certain to occur if we import from countries having low-cost production commodities similar to those being produced in this country in surplus quantities.

Franklin D. Roosevelt's great Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, took this truth into account when he formulated the reciprocal trade agreement concept which underlies our party's traditional foreign trade policies. Cordell Hull declared, in substance, that true reciprocal trade between nations involves an exchange of commodities produced by them in surplus quantities, and for this reason the United States should enter into reciprocal trade agreements with other nations whereby the United States would export to other nations its surplus commodities and import from such nations commodities which the United States either does not produce or cannot produce effectively.

Because of its undoubted economic soundness, we should recognize and apply this reciprocal trade agreement concept to the fullest practical extent in our trade with other nations. At the same time, however, we must realize that there is another factor which must be given its due weight in view of the precarious condition in which our world now finds itself. Some of the nations, which are endeavoring to maintain their independence in the face of the threat of Communist aggression or Communist subversion, are dependent upon their export trade for their ability to maintain stable economies and avert succumbing to the threat of communism.

For this reason, it is essential that the export trade of these nations be promoted to the extent necessary to enable them to avert this threat, even at the price of allowing them reasonable proportions of our domestic markets. In devising plans to accomplish this result, we should take steps to minimize the impact of imports received by us from these nations on our domestic economy to the end that American industry, American workers, and American investors may be spared all possible undue hardships.

ARMED FORCES MUSEUM ADVISORY BOARD

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, earlier today the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] and I joined in the introduction of a bill, S. 3846, for the establishment of an advisory board to the regents of the Smithsonian Institution, for the purpose of determining the feasibility, location, and authority of an Armed Forces Museum. The proposed board would be a continuation of a Commission appointed by the President of the United States, more than 18 months ago, and headed by the Chief Justice of the United States, Mr. Warren. Also serving on that Commission were the Secretary of Defense, now Mr. Gates; two Members of the House of Representatives; the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] and myself, from the Senate; and several persons from private life.

The Commission was appointed to study the subject of an Armed Forces Museum. It filed with the President of the United States an interim report; and more recently it has filed its final report.

The final report indicates that in the unanimous opinion of the Commission, an advisory board to the Smithsonian regents should be established by means of congressional action, in order to continue the study and determine the feasibility of such a museum.

The purpose of the museum is not alone to show what the Armed Forces are doing for the security of the country or what they have done in past centuries for its security. The museum would also give some indication of the other values of the Armed Forces, such as in our moral relationships, our social relationships, and our scientific relationships and accomplishments.

So this bill will, if it is adopted by Congress, established an advisory board for the purpose of continuing this study and giving advice to the regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in order that ultimately Congress may consider this problem of establishing in or near the District of Columbia an Armed Forces Museum.

That bill has now been referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration. I hope that the committee will make a report and that the Congress, before it adjourns in September, will be able to pass the bill to establish the advisory board.

DR. MAX LEVINE

Mr. LONG of Hawaii. Mr. President, the people of Hawaii are proud of the public health record of our State, for it is an outstandingly good one. Behind this record is the work of dedicated men and women—scientists, doctors, nurses, technicians, and administrators.

One of the leaders of public health in Hawaii, a bacteriologist who has received national recognition for his outstanding work, recently retired. He is Dr. Max Levine. Dr. Levine was awarded an honorary doctorate by the University of Hawaii in recognition of his contributions to the well-being of the people of Hawaii—and, since health problems transcend all political boundaries—to the well-being of all people.

A summary of Dr. Levine's career appears in the June issue of the Hawaii Medical Journal. I ask unanimous consent to have this article printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALOHA TO DR. LEVINE

(By Satsue Fujishima)

Dr. Max Levine, one of America's eminent bacteriologists retired from his position as director of the bureau of laboratories on February 29 and became a consultant to the department of health.

He was born on April 4, 1889, in Poland and came to Boston, Mass., as an infant. His life is the story of an underprivileged person utilizing the available opportunities in a new country and rising to the top of his profession.

He received a B.S. in biology and public health from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1912 and a Ph. D. in bacteriology and preventive medicine from the State University of Iowa in 1922.

At Iowa State College, where he began his teaching career as instructor in bacteriology in 1913, he became the professor in charge of that department in 1936. There he remained until the outbreak of World War II. He was also a research professor at the Iowa Engineering Experiment Station. He served in World Wars I and II in the Sanitary Corps, A.U.S., and was discharged as a colonel in November 1946.

Dr. Levine has been associated with many advances in the laboratory aspects of public health. During World War I, he developed a medium (eosin methylene blue agar) which is still used for the isolation and differentiation of dysentery and other intestinal disease-producing bacteria from the normal intestinal flora. He was a member of the committees which prepared the 10th edition of "Standard Methods of Water Analysis" and the 4th edition of "Diagnostic Procedures and Reagents." The latter includes recommended techniques for the detection of bacteria associated with communicable diseases.

He developed methods for purification of industrial wastes, particularly those from packinghouses and creameries, which are now standard procedures.

In the field of water purification, Dr. Levine studied the principles underlying the action of chlorine as a germicide—the results of his published studies have influenced the modern practices of water purification and food-plant sanitization.

During World War II, he was associated with the early work in the use of antibiotics, particularly penicillin, and he developed rapid methods for determining the susceptibility of bacteria to penicillin.

In 1947, his former World War II commanding officer (Col. A. R. Thomas, Jr.) who happened to be in charge of the Army laboratory at Schofield Barracks, recommended Dr. Levine to Dr. Wilbar, president of the Board of Health of Hawaii, as especially qualified to organize and lead the bureau of laboratories at the health department. Dr. Levine has been in charge of the bureau of laboratories since its establishment in 1947.

During his tenure here he established one of the dozen or so official Salmonella Typing Centers in the United States, and also a Staphylococcus Phage Typing Center. The latter is one of the few which have been able to maintain their phage strains and stay in business.

He belongs to many professional societies. At the request of the Society of American Bacteriologists, Dr. Levine prepared a 970 page "Compilation of Culture Media for Cultivation of Microorganisms" which was published by the society as volume II of its monographs on systematic bacteriology. He is also the author of over 200 papers on intestinal bacteriology, water and sewage purification, food technology, disinfectants, antibiotics, Hansen's disease, and other subjects.

His textbook "Introduction to Bacteriological Laboratory Technique" was first published in 1927; the second edition (1933) went through 22 reprintings; and the book is now in its third edition (1954).

He has addressed the local medical technologists on a number of occasions and their qualifications were carefully scrutinized by the advisory committee on licensure of laboratory directors and technicians in Hawaii, of which he is chairman. His influence has been widely felt in laboratory activities. He has also addressed numerous meetings of pediatricians and other physicians.

Hawaii is healthier, wealthier, and wiser for having had Dr. Levine here these past 13 years; we regret the necessity for his retirement and are grateful that he can stay on the job as a consultant. On July 1, a testimonial dinner is to be held by his friends to honor this distinguished scientist on his official retirement. Aloha, Dr. Max Levine.

STATUS OF BONG AIRBASE AT KANSASVILLE, WIS.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the national defense requirements—because of rapid development in weapons as well as shifting needs—change from time to time. Regrettably, this often involves great costs, dislocations, and other problems for the people of the country. Not long ago, the Air Force, for example, had procured land for an Air Force base in Wisconsin; because of changing defense requirements, the service—even after investing a substantial sum of money—found it necessary to change its plans for utilizing the area, designated as the Bong Airbase.

We recognize, of course, that we must meet the fundamental needs of our defense.

At the same time, I am also sure you will agree, it is necessary to keep to a minimum—and as possible eliminate—this kind of action, which results not only in cost to the taxpayer but in serious economic dislocations for the people of the local community.

Because of the abandonment of the base for military purposes, the people of my State now face the serious problem of trying to find a public interest utilization of the property.

Following the decision of the Air Force, I have received a great many inquiries and suggestions from individuals and organizations on the ultimate disposal of the property. Reflecting the difficulties involved in such a situation—as well as problems incurred in again finding uses for such a base, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a statement on the status of the base.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

On July 22, 1960, the Department of the Air Force submitted to the Senate and House Armed Services Committees a request for approval of a surplus declaration of the Bong Air Force Base at Kansasville. The request must lie before the committees for a period of 30 days. If no adverse action has been taken by the Congress during that period, the Air Force will then be free to declare the property surplus to Air Force needs and release it to the General Services Administration.

In such an event, General Services Administration has full authority to accept, approve and/or disapprove applications. When they receive the property, however, they must first poll the nondefense Government agencies to see if one or more of them has a use for all or any part thereof.

If no request for the property is made by a Government agency, then GSA may accept applications as follows:

1. The State or any political subdivision or instrumentality of the State can apply for all or any part of the land to be transferred to it at a public benefit allowance (in effect, a kind of discount) according to its utilization.

Applications should be filed with the Government agency concerned, and a copy forwarded to GSA. If the agency approves they will make the formal request to GSA on behalf of the State. For example:

(a) An application for land to be used as a park or recreational area should be made to the Secretary of the Interior.

(b) An application for land for a wildlife refuge should also be made to the Secretary of the Interior.

(c) An application for land for a school should be made to the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(d) An application for land for an airport should be made to the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency.

2. Any tax exempt, nonprofit university, hospital, or educational institution may apply to the Secretary of HEW on the same basis.

If the property is not disposed of as above, GSA has the authority to make a disposal of all or part of the property to the State or a political subdivision or instrumentality thereof, for tax-supported agencies, where such property is to be used for a direct public purpose, and if the estimated fair market value and other satisfactory terms of disposal are obtained.

In these negotiated disposals where the fair market value is in excess of $1,000 a statement of circumstances of such disposal must be submitted to the Government Operations Committees of the House and Senate prior to any sale of the property. This must also lie before the committees for 30 days.

If no sale is contracted by negotiation, then public bids are accepted—either sealed or at public auction, whichever GSA deems better.

Regrettably, the obtainment—and then the release—of the valuable property comprising the Bong Airbase by the Defense Department has been a long, expensive loss to the citizens of Wisconsin.

I sincerely hope that expeditious disposal can now be made of the property in the best interests of our Badger citizens.

NOMINATIONS FOR POSTMASTERS IN WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the State of Wisconsin has 19 nominations for postmasters that seem to be pigeonholed. I have lately written to the chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, calling his attention to the nominations and asking for action. Pursuant thereto, I have issued a release, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the news release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY URGING APPROVAL OF WISCONSIN POSTMASTERSHIPS PRIOR TO ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS

Fortunately, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service has reported—and the Senate has confirmed—22 of the 41 pending nominations for postmasterships in Wisconsin. Regrettably, however, 19 nominations still remain pigeonholed. The inexcusable delay in reporting out the postmasterships—despite repeated efforts to "jar them loose"—reflects seriously upon the efficiency of Congress and creates a hardship for the individual and the involved communities. Congress should serve—not thwart—the interests of the American people.

The history of postmastership nominations has shown that all too often "politicking" enters into the picture—often holding up confirmation for months—and, sometimes, unfortunately, years.

Because of this, Congress, I believe, could well take a new look at its procedures for handling such appointments.

Recognizing the need for approval and confirmation of the remaining nominations prior to the adjournment of Congress, I have urged the committee to take early and favorable action on the following remaining nominations:

STRANGE ANTICS AND SEMANTICS IN WINDUP OF CONGRESS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the American people are somewhat disturbed and concerned at the strangely contratradictory antics and semantics being displayed in the postrecess session of Congress.

Upon reconvening, the President offered a program of 22 points. I think the President was right. What response did he receive? Well, the majority leader asserted that those 22 points were borrowed from the Democrats. That question is debatable, but even if it were true, it would be all the more reason why we should have bipartisan support for the program.

Pursuant thereto, I have issued a release, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the news release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILEY REVIEWS "STRANGE ANTICS AND SEMANTICS" IN WINDUP OF CONGRESS

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican, of Wisconsin, today said, "The American people must be somewhat disturbed and concerned at the strangely contradictory antics and semantics being displayed in the postrecess session of Congress.

"Upon reconvening of the Senate, President Eisenhower offered a constructive, 22-point program, which he felt 'contained much important legislation that cannot await the selection and assembly of a new Congress and administration.'

"In my humble judgment, the President is 100 percent right.

"Now, what was the response from the Senate?

"Promptly after the President's message, the Senate majority leadership claimed it was borrowed from the Democrats.

"According to normal logic, however, this would mean broader, bipartisan support for the program.

"What has it meant in reality? A declaration that only a minimum—not a maximum—program would be considered.

"At the convention, for example, the Democrats loudly stated their undying dedication to enactment of a civil rights program. In Congress, however, they promptly voted to shelve such a bill when introduced by the Republicans. One especially ardent, self-proclaimed 'protector of the rights of man' was quoted as saying that it was 'political sabotage' even to seek to consider such legislation.

"Again, too, the President has urged approval of 40 new judgeships—offering to divide such appointments equally between Democrats and Republicans. The question now arises: Is the Senate ready and willing to take such action? Or, if it adheres to the policy of procrastination—at the expense of speeded-up justice for the American people—would the Democrats be willing to voice, as a national policy, a willingness to handle such matters—if granted the responsibility—in such a bipartisan manner?

"Regrettably, the great patriotic fervor expressed at Los Angeles, however, seems to lose some of its 'zip' on the way to Washington.

"From all signs, the 'great new frontiers' are shrinking visibly. The clarion calls for sacrifices apparently sound better from the 'convention hall' or the 'speaking stump' than from the battleground of Congress.

"The Senate's 'opening week' of the post-convention session should make it crystal-clear to the American people that apparently there is a glaring difference between the Democratic political 'P's'—Promise and Performance.

"Frankly, I wonder what kind of political opiate is being inhaled to give the delusion that the voters will reward this kind of 'big-talk, minimum-action' program with victory at the polls. The American people, I believe, want deeds, not words; action not lame excuses," WILEY concluded.

NOMINATIONS FOR POSTMASTER IN OHIO

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I had not intended to discuss this subject, but in view of the comments made by my distinguished friend from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] regarding the postmasterships in Wisconsin, about which I know nothing whatever, may I say that some years ago, when the late, revered Robert A. Taft was a U.S. Senator from Ohio, and the minority leader of the Senate, President Harry Truman, during a period of 2 years, sent to the Senate nominations for 81 postmasterships in the State of Ohio.

There must have been a few competent, good public servants among the 81, but every one of those postmaster nominations made by President Truman during these 2 years while the late Senator Taft was minority leader of the Senate was denied confirmation. Of course, those nominations were made in the years 1951 and 1952. A newspaper in Ohio said that Senator Taft was resorting to statesmanlike screening of political appointees.

President Eisenhower is the same President of the United States who withdrew the nominations the late revered Senator Taft had blocked. On January 21, 1953, President Eisenhower withdrew all the postmastership nominations made by President Harry S. Truman.

This year no newspaper in Ohio has said that Senator STEPHEN YOUNG has resorted to statesmanlike screening of political appointments. It is a fact that some 62, I believe, nominations have been made to postmasterships in Ohio. Many of our larger cities are involved—Toledo, Dayton, Portsmouth, and others. Those men have been nominated for lifetime positions. Of that number, the junior Senator from Ohio has recommended in writing, that the nominations of some 20 be confirmed.

I may say that every one of the 62 nominees has the endorsement of the Republican county committee of the county in which the municipality is located. Regardless of that fact, after searching investigation by the junior Senator from Ohio, he has recommended in writing the nomination of exactly 20 of them. In one instance, the nomination of Chester Bailey for a lifetime appointment as postmaster in Youngstown, whom the junior Senator from Ohio recommended in writing be confirmed, was confirmed by the Senate. Just before he was confirmed by the Senate as postmaster, Mr. Bailey was endorsed by the Republican county executive committee of Mahoning County, Ohio, of which he was chairman.

Nevertheless, because the junior Senator from Ohio has refused to recommend in writing some 38 other nominees nominated by President Eisenhower, and endorsed by their Republican county committees, and is presently considering 4 others, not one newspaper in Ohio has mentioned anything about statesmanlike screening.

I am not complaining about that, but in every instance I write the facts to those who are complaining, and in some instances to the newspapers who have found fault and complain of petty politics.

Mr. President, the Presiding Officer [Mr. BURDICK], is one who knows the junior Senator from Ohio personally, who knows the junior Senator from Ohio can roll with the punches, and has been rolling with the punches a good many years.

Mr. President, I did not mean to advert to this subject, but I was interested in what my very good friend the senior Senator from Wisconsin had to say on the subject.

I have written to many, many people in Ohio who have written to me upon this subject, finding fault with me. Looking out from the Senate Office Building I can see a memorial which was erected to the late Robert A. Taft, at an expenditure of approximately a million dollars, on public land which has become a part of the plaza.

Certainly, if an humble, first-term junior Senator from the State of Ohio decides to follow the policy and the program adhered to by that revered Republican in Ohio who was known as "Mr. Republican," it seems to me that policy should not be condemned—at least not too violently.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I yield to my distinguished friend.

Mr. WILEY. I have listened with a great deal of interest to what the Senator has said. He does not imply he is making the objection. I can tell the Senator that the junior Senator makes no objection. Consequently, there seems to be no reason for delaying confirmation of the appointment.

I have a letter from the junior Senator, when he was asked if he objected. He said that he had no objection, and had written that to the Post Office Department in respect to each one of these appointments. The situation is not analogous.

I cannot speak as to the sins of those who used to be. The only thing is that I do not wish to have anyone sin now. I should like to have all people carry on in what I think is the right political course. When both Senators agree the men should have the appointments, there should be no shenanigans in interfering with the appointments. In other words, no one else should interfere, if the Senators agree. Is that not a proper outlook?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I completely agree with my distinguished friend from Wisconsin on that subject.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. As I stated before, I know nothing whatever of the situation in Wisconsin. Furthermore, when both Senators from a State agree, I feel it is an important duty of the Senate to confirm the nominations. We should be doing that, instead of wasting time in petty political discussions in this short session, when we have so much to do.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I yield to the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I was interested in the statement of the Senator about the attitude of the Ohio press concerning the action of the late and highly respected Senator from Ohio, Mr. Taft, when it came to screening postmastership appointments under the administration of Mr. Truman. I think it was called "statesmanlike screening."

If the Senator follows in the footsteps of the able and respected late Senator from Ohio in this instance, by "statesmanlike screening" of postal appointments, he is to be commended. If the press of Ohio will not do it, then I think one of our colleagues ought to do it.

The Senator perhaps will be interested to know that when I was elected to the Senate in the election of 1948—I came to the Senate in 1949—in the preceding 2 years the Republican Senators in this body had not permitted the confirmation of any nomination for postmaster in the State of Minnesota. For 2 years those were all held in abeyance, because there was some sort of feeling that the man from New York, Mr. Dewey, would become the President of the United States, and it was the desire to give Mr. Dewey the opportunity to make statesmanlike appointments, so that the statesmanlike screening would have true effect.

I say to the Senator that his position is to be commended, because after the election in November we shall have a new President in January. The junior Senator from Ohio will be able to complete his "statesmanlike screening" and there will be some fine, able, competent, intelligent, public-spirited, civic-minded postmasters on the job in Ohio.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I thank the Senator from Minnesota.

ACCURACY OF STATEMENTS

The following remarks were made at a later day and moved to this point.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I was interested in the statements made from time to time of the necessity to maintain truth and veracity and the necessity to speak up and correct the RECORD without reference to personalities, and I should like to do just that in connection with remarks which were inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by a couple of my colleagues, the junior Senator from Ohio and the senior Senator from Minnesota. This occurred on August 15, and the remarks to which I will refer are found at page 16403, and they are at variance with what the facts are in each instance that I will call attention to.

They are at variance as recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and other Government records on the points involved as recorded in previous years.

Before I proceed to discuss them, I should like to say that no one realizes more than the Senator from Nebraska the dependency which each of us in this body has upon the idea of information being furnished by others for our use on the floor. In the tempo under which we live, it is necessary and it is imperative that we depend upon information which is furnished us and, very often, without the opportunity to check on it, we use it.

Also, I am very aware, as a Member of this body, that so often in debate responses are hasty, sometimes they are ill-advised, sometimes they are not too well thought out, sometimes we say things which do not bear scrutiny in a more deliberate mood.

With that preface, I should like to refer to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio regarding nominations for postmasters in his State.

One more prefatory remark. The remarks were made on August 15. They struck the Senator from Nebraska as not bearing the tone of accuracy.

The following day, after proper research into the subject, I notified verbally both the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Minnesota that I intended to make the statement which I am now making pertaining to this subject. I waited 2 days for them to get on the floor here to make sure that, in all fairness, we could proceed to the matter at hand. Unfortunately, today we were under controlled time until a couple of hours ago, and I felt I should not impose on the time of other Senators for the purpose of bringing this matter up.

The first matter is this, and it appears at page 16403 of the RECORD, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG] speaking:

> May I say that some years ago, when the late, revered Robert A. Taft was a U.S. Senator from Ohio, and the minority leader of the Senate, President Harry Truman, during a period of 2 years, sent to the Senate nominations for 81 postmasterships in the State of Ohio.
> There must have been a few competent, good public servants among the 81, but every one of those postmaster nominations made by President Truman during these 2 years while the late Senator Taft was minority leader of the Senate was denied confirmation. Of course, those nominations were made in the years 1951 and 1952.

Mr. President, the fact is that during those 2 years there was a total of 75 nominations made by the then President, and during the years 1951 and 1952 for the State of Ohio, 74 of them were confirmed by the Senate. One was not confirmed as of the end of that period of time. So I say in that respect the statement was erroneous.

Earlier today the Senator from Ohio came before the Senate, without due notice to the Senator from Nebraska, after the Senator from Nebraska had accorded him the courtesy of advance notice that he was going to bring this question up, and made a correction of his own to the very statement to which I refer. He indicated he was mistaken and that the years were not 1951 and 1952. They were the years of 1947 and 1948.

In that 2-year period there were 48 postmasters nominated for the State of Ohio during 1947, and 28 failed to receive confirmation—a far cry from the statement, even if it were true, as to the year, that no single postmaster during the 2-year period received confirmation by the Senate. It is true, according to the Senator from Ohio, that in 1948, 62 nominations for postmasters in Ohio were received in the Senate, and of those 62, not one nomination was confirmed by the Senate. I still say for a considered statement to be made on the floor with reference to 2 years, as specifically named and with detail and great emphasis, constitutes a mistake to which attention should be called in proper fashion; and I am sure the Senator from Ohio would be the first to want to correct the RECORD; and evidence of that is found in the remarks he made earlier today.

However, I do not want to condone the idea, after giving such advance notice that a correction would be made, that the correction should be made by that Senator without due notice to the colleague who brought up the subject in the first place.

Referring further to the remarks on August 15 made by the Senator from Ohio, I quote again:

> On January 21, 1953, President Eisenhower withdrew all the postmastership nominations made by President Harry S. Truman.

Mr. President, that statement is erroneous, because there is no withdrawal of nominations from the end of one session of Congress to another. If there are any pending nominations at the end of any particular congressional session, they die on the vine, they disappear, they are extinguished, and there is nothing left for the succeeding Congress to work upon until new nominations are proposed.

I suggest that the tenor of the entire statement on the part of the Senator from Ohio perhaps was not the best advised and might be considered to sound considerably in the field of politics which, for some reason or another late this afternoon and early this evening, has suddenly fallen in disrepute, because it is something of a lower order rather than something which is very much in season and as real as life.

At the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], recorded on page 16404 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] seemed to be very eager to make some contribution to the general theme that there was great unfairness as to the handling of the confirmation of nominations for postmasterships in earlier years, and the senior Senator from Minnesota spoke as follows:

> The Senator perhaps will be interested to know that when I was elected to the Senate in the election of 1948—I came to the Senate in 1949—in the preceding 2 years the Republican Senators in this body had not permitted the confirmation of any nomination for postmaster in the State of Minnesota. For 2 years those were all held in abeyance.

Mr. President, I read from a letter dated August 16, 1960, signed by W. E. Birdsall, Director of the Postmasters Division, attached to which letter are exhibits from the States of Ohio and Minnesota, the information that in 1947 there were 23 postmasters in Minnesota confirmed and in the year 1948 20 postmaster nominations were confirmed by this body. That information is likewise to be found in the annual publication entitled "Civilian Nominations" compiled by Mr. Bailey, the executive clerk of the U.S. Senate, who furnished these figures in the initial instance. The Senator from Nebraska took the trouble to confirm by personal reference to the pertinent issues of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the exact confirmations and the dates thereof in each of those 43 instances.

Mr. President, I wish to say again that I am fully in sympathy with any Senator who must depend upon others for the accuracy of information furnished him. Very often we are prompted to say things on the spur of the moment which are things we perhaps would not say if we thought things over a little more and felt that we should have a more factual basis upon which to proceed.

In the interest of correcting the RECORD, in the interest of being fair, in the interest of trying to impart some consistency as between the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the official records of previous years, with reference thereto at the present time, I felt constrained to make the explanation which I have made tonight.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. HRUSKA. I am happy to yield.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I commend my distinguished colleague from Nebraska for bringing these facts to our attention. Of course, the fact remains that the statement has gone out in both of these instances. It is pointed out to have been highly erroneous. It is the charge which makes the news, and it is never possible to follow up by any subsequent statement, because when the facts are brought out they do not seem to have equal news value.

The statements were made that no postmaster nominations were approved. That is a glib statement which can get a good deal of attention.

I commend the distinguished Senator from Nebraska for digging into the facts and for bringing the facts to our attention, in order that the RECORD may be set straight. It seems to me that though we may reach different conclusions among ourselves as to what the facts show, when it comes to stating facts we should be extremely careful to follow strict accuracy.

I do not mean to imply by my remarks that there was ever any intention on the part of either of these colleagues of ours to misinform or to mislead, but this shows the merit, perhaps, of the two-party system, in order that the facts may be brought before us.

I commend my colleague.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I wish to join the Senator from New York, and to repeat the thoughts I have already expressed.

Mr. President, I have not imputed—I do not impute now—I wish to disown any intention of intimating any imputation to either of the colleagues to whom I have referred that there was a conscious misuse of the facts or a misstatement of the facts. That is not in my mind.

What is in my mind is that in cold print, at page 16403 of the RECORD, there are statements made which are not factual. This is the only way we can bring out the facts.

I have only one more comment, Mr. President. This has to do with the idea that in the year 1958 there were 62 nominations from the State of Ohio for postmasterships, none of which were confirmed.

I do not know what was the particular situation in the State of Ohio. I took the trouble to find out what was the overall number of nominations for postmasterships that year, and how many were confirmed. In the year of 1948, 1,373 persons were nominated for postmasterships. Out of that number of nominations, 523 were confirmed, and 20 were withdrawn. The rest of the nominations were pending at the conclusion of the congressional session, adjournment sine die in 1948.

As I say, I do not know what was the peculiar situation in Ohio, but the fact is that there was not a blanket policy which was followed by the congressional majority on that occasion. Apparently there was not, because there were 543 nominations either confirmed or withdrawn during that particular session.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HRUSKA. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The Senator from Nebraska has done a good job in helping to straighten out that which we are sure was an unintentional error on the part of our colleagues.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I will yield to the Senator from Texas, the distinguished majority leader, if I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, because I must leave the Chamber, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Ohio may yield to me so that I may make a very brief statement, and that the Senator from Ohio not lose his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DISPLAY OF DISCOVERER XIII SPACE CAPSULE AT THE CAPITOL TODAY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences, I am pleased to inform the Members that the committee has made arrangements with the Air Force to bring the Discoverer XIII space capsule to the Capitol today, after completion of planned ceremonies at the White House.

As we all know, this capsule is the first manmade object sent into orbit around the earth and brought back safely.

The capsule will be placed on display in room F-41 of the Capitol, starting at approximately 2 p.m. today.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. The display will be at 2 o'clock today?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It will be 2 o'clock today. I thank the Senator from Ohio for his universal courtesy and consideration to me.

EXPLORATION OF OUTER SPACE

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, last week the world witnessed some of the most significant milestones in the exploration of outer space since the Soviet Union put the first sputnik in orbit while we were still earthbound. These achievements offer spectacular evidence of the remarkable progress made by us since that time, less than 3 short years ago.

From the viewpoint of our national security, our position was greatly strengthened with the successful testing of the Atlas intercontinental ballistic missile and the Navy Polaris missile. In improving our only operational intercontinental ballistic missile, we successfully tested a new guidance system and nose-cone material in the Atlas missile on a 5,000-mile flight. At almost the same time, the Navy launched its Polaris missile on a more than 1,000-mile flight and moved closer to the day when it will be nuclear-tipped and installed aboard atomic submarines.

Last Thursday we learned that Discoverer XIII, an orbiting satellite, successfully ejected a space capsule which was recovered from the Pacific—the first time on record that an instrumented capsule from outer space has been successfully retrieved.

That is the space capsule, Mr. President, to which our distinguished majority leader adverted, which will be on display at 2 o'clock this afternoon.

On the same day, Air Force Maj. Robert White made space history when he reached the highest altitude ever achieved by a human being, 131,000 feet, in the X–15 experimental rocket plane. Major White deserves the commendation of the Nation for this important breakthrough in the navigation of space.

Mankind will be forever indebted to those heroic men—many of whom gave their lives in the effort—who have rolled back the frontiers of space.

Mr. President, perhaps the most spectacular advancement last week was the breathtaking announcement that Echo I—a 10-story-high inflated balloon, 100 feet in diameter—was successfully launched in orbit around the earth. This fantastic achievement will revolutionize worldwide communication, and promises, among other things, worldwide telephone and television transmission.

Independent researchers the world over have been invited to share in this exciting new discovery. Our latest venture into space has opened up not only a new field in international communications, but also a new approach to international cooperation.

Mr. President, the exploration of outer space will cost American taxpayers more than a billion dollars this year, and, without a doubt, it will cost many more billions during the years to come. Skeptics have questioned the expenditure of these huge sums on projects other than those involving our national security.

Echo I is the answer to their doubts. It is the first of what we hope will be many achievements which will return our economic investment a thousandfold. History records that Christopher Columbus would never have discovered America on October 12, 1492, had he listened to skeptics of his time who sought to withhold financial support from his venture.

Some day we may be able to measure in dollars and cents the technological and economic returns of space exploration. It will be impossible to measure the return to humanity in the form of better communication between peoples and nations, and thereby, the furtherance of the cause of world peace.

Mr. President, the Nation owes a debt of gratitude to the men and women who have made these achievements possible. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration, under the direction of Dr. T. Keith Glennan, its Administrator, deserves our fervent appreciation. I am particularly proud of the fact that Dr. Glennan is a resident of the State of Ohio, where he was president of one of the Nation's finest institutions of learning, Case Institute of Technology in Cleveland, before assuming his present duties. Dr. Glennan is an outstanding American citizen and a truly dedicated public servant. His leadership in the space and missile field merits our commendation and gratitude.

Since coming to the Senate I have served on the Aeronautical and Space Sciences Committee. I have tried to be an active public servant and take pride in the fact that I have not missed a single meeting of that committee or of the subcommittees of which I am a member. I am particularly proud of the fact that I am serving on this committee under the chairmanship of our distinguished majority leader, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

The Senator from Texas is the first to hold the position of chairman of that important committee. It is my belief that we can attribute directly to him much of the encouragement and support which our scientists and space explorers have received. He was one of the first to realize and acknowledge the vital importance of space to the future of America, and according to information given me, he was the first to propose the creation of the Senate Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences.

The results of his vision were particularly demonstrated last week in the feats of those great scientists who have furthered these advancements in space exploration. I pay tribute to the outstanding leadership of the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. RANDOLPH obtained the floor.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield, without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

CONVENTIONS AND CAMPAIGNS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, what I am about to say is not to be interpreted as reflecting in any way on the candidates of either major parties for the Offices of President and Vice President of the United States. For these men, I have only the highest respect.

My remarks are addressed to the system which we have employed to nominate candidates for the highest offices in the land. This system, as the Senate knows, has a history of about a century and a half. Participation as a delegate—or rather a half delegate—in the Democratic Convention at Los Angeles left me with the conviction that the system is seriously inadequate. The proceedings of the other party in Chicago, as telecast, served only to strengthen the conviction despite the promise of the Chairman of the Republican National Committee to stage a better show than the Los Angeles extravaganza.

I must say that the TV networks did an outstanding job. They went to great lengths to put themselves to enormous exertion to produce good shows. They combed and recombed the delegates and the candidates in an effort to extract every conceivable bit of comedy, pathos, suspense, conflict, melodrama, yes, and even tragedy. Then under the direction of a new class of artists—we might describe them as convention TV impresarios—they wove these elements into veritable spectaculars for the edification and entertainment of the public.

I suspect that the very excellence of the TV coverage has led millions of Americans to question the entire nominating and electing procedure as it now operates. There are, first of all, the obvious questions; such questions as, Who selects the delegates? Why are some delegates worth only a half vote and others a whole vote? Why do some States split their votes and some cast them as a unit? When is a primary not a primary, in the sense of not binding its delegates? Who waves the men and women who wave the signs? Why are sons, if they are favorites, abandoned almost as soon as they are born? What have hoopla and hats pyramided on the heads of more extroverted delegates to do with sober deliberation on the merits of candidates?

Those are some of the obvious questions. There are others, less obvious, but no less important. What do conventions of this kind cost and where does the money come from? Even more, how is it that nominees come into the arena of deliberations with the bulk of the vote totals cemented beyond the reach of deliberation and what goes into this cement? And, finally, Mr. President, what measure of influence do the people of the United States from whom all political authority presumably flows, exert on the selection of candidates?

I do not think it will take very many more TV saturation coverages to bring home to the citizens of the United States that the present system of selecting candidates for the highest offices of the land is grossly inadequate to the needs of responsible self-government in the 20th century.

The truth of the matter is, I believe, that the convention nominating system, in its present form, is an anachronism in American political life. It came into being at another time and in other circumstances to which it was undoubtedly better attuned. It has persisted, in large part, because of popular indifference and because, seemingly, it is easier to go along with things as they are rather than to make modifications or replacements in well-established institutions unless compelled by immense public pressure to do so.

I may be overly optimistic, but I would anticipate that in the case of the present nominating system, the stark revelations of the TV screens may induce the necessary popular pressure. It seems to me, at the very least, that popular revulsion at the sign-waving shenanigans and the assorted hoopla will compel the elimination of these contrivances as well as the "man who" seconding speeches, and, perhaps, even favorite sons. Changes such as these, however, would be largely in the nature of facelifting. They might improve the "image" of the convention system but they will not go to the heart of the problem. The problem, as I see it, is twofold. First, it is to try to equalize the influence of every voter, who desires to particpiate, in the selection of candidates for the party of his choice. Second, it is to increase the opportunity for all potential and serious candidates for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency to be equally considered.

In connection with the first problem, the corrective device which is usually suggested is the national primary. There are many difficulties involved in the use of this device. How, for example, do we keep the number of nominees for the nomination in each party within rational limits? Do we nominate by plurality or majority? How are Democrats separated from Republicans and minor parties and what of crossover voting? Personally, I am persuaded that none of these difficulties is insurmountable. There is a vast wealth of experience on which to draw in the States employing primaries and in the electoral devices of foreign countries. I believe a fair and equitable and practicable national primary can be established if we are of a mind to do so.

Short of a national primary there are many improvements which could be made in the existing convention system, looking to the extension and equalization of popular control over the selection of candidates. It is conceivable, for example, that the selection of State delegations could be limited to two methods. One method might be the State primary conducted on the basis of uniform rules for all States and with the delegates so chosen, subject to the same rules regarding pledges and releases from pledges for particular candidates. A second method might be the State party convention but subject to uniform rules of conduct and pledge as among the several States.

I believe it is reasonably clear in the legal precedents that Congress has the constitutional right to legislate on the conditions of presidential elections. It would seem that Congress has a similar right in regard to presidential nominating systems from which the elections are inseparable. In any event, the possibility of bringing about desirable changes by constitutional amendment is always open.

In regard to the second aspect of the problem, the need to increase the opportunity for all potential candidates to be equally considered, the basic question, to put it bluntly, is money. Even if we assume that the nomination for the Presidency is a race to be run or a prize to be won, then a sense of fair play would indicate the desirability of neutralizing the factor of financing by personal wealth, wealthy backers and pressure groups. But if we view the Presidency and Vice Presidency, as I believe they ought to be viewed, as offices which should seek for their incumbents among the ablest, the most dedicated citizens and permit them to be free of personal obligation to any particular groups or individuals within our society, then all the more it seems essential to neutralize the financial factor.

In this connection, it would be helpful if active presidential nominating campaigns could be limited in time to a period of a month or less. Further, the expenses of bona fide nominees should be borne out of public funds and all personal expenditures by the nominees or on their behalf by other individuals or by groups should be rigidly curtailed. That this approach to financing campaigns is not only theoretically but actually possible is borne out by the experience of others. The United Kingdom, for example, effectively limits election expenditures and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico provides for the reasonable expenses of bonafide political parties out of the public treasury.

Nor can the cost of financing campaigns out of public funds be regarded as a burden on the public. The public, in the long run, may well pay many times over for the privilege of being relieved of the campaign expenditures which are now borne largely by a small group of heavy contributors and purchasers of $100 a plate dinners. There could be no greater safeguard of the public interest and the public purse than to place public officials under full financial obligation to and in the full financial control of all the people of the United States rather than a few. What applies in connection with the financing of nominating campaigns for the Presidency would apply of course with even greater relevance to actual election campaigns and, in all candor, to the election of Members of Congress.

The need is to examine this two-sided problem while the experience of the conventions and the coming election campaign remains fresh in our minds. I would hope, therefore, that the next President would encourage and the next Congress would act through its appropriate committees to give thorough consideration to ways in which we can equalize the voice of all Americans in the selection of candidates and to equalize the opportunity for all candidates to be considered.

SURVEYS INDICATE HEALTH CARE PROGRAM FOR THE AGED IS FAVORED

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the action of the Committee on Finance in reference to medical care for the aged is one that is disappointing to the Senator from West Virginia. S. 3503, which would provide a broad program of medical care for the aged of this country within the framework of the social security system, was brought before the Committee on Finance, but was not given the committee's approval.

Twenty-four Senators, including the Senator from West Virginia, joined in the proposed legislation—S. 3503—which was considered by the Committee on Finance but which was rejected by that body.

Mr. President, for the 16 million senior citizens in the United States this may be the most fateful month of their lives.

In the coming weeks the Senate will debate and hopefully act upon legislation to meet the health needs of the aged and to work toward a solution of the problem which, for thousands of Americans, is a vital matter.

The problem to which I refer is that of meeting the cost of medical care when disability is at its highest point and income is at its lowest for millions of our citizens.

PRESENCE ON THE FLOOR OF EXPERTS DURING THE DISCUSSION OF PROPOSED HEALTH CARE PROGRAMS FOR THE AGED

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. KERR. I am happy to hear the Senator from West Virginia discuss the subject of his remarks just concluded. I am very much interested in what he has to say. I hope to obtain the floor a little later to discuss what the Committee on Finance did in connection with this subject on last Saturday.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Robert J. Myers, of the Social Security Administration, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, be permitted to sit on the floor at my side when I am addressing the Senate on this subject. I ask that he may come on the floor now and wait until I get the floor. I should like to have him on the floor so that I may have access to the information I shall wish to use in connection with my presentation.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I venture to hope that other Senators will be advised that the Senator from Oklahoma will speak on that subject. I hope other Senators will be notified of that fact, because I am sure what he will have to say is very important.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma, relative to his request to have Mr. Myers on the floor—for whom, incidentally, I have respect, and to whose presence on the floor, I am sure, there will be no objection—whether it would be possible also for those of us who are interested in this subject to have an expert sit with us, with whom we may counsel on statistical information which is so vital to our consideration of the subject which the Senator from Oklahoma will discuss.

Mr. KERR. I would assume that any persons for whom the Senator would ask permission to attend on the floor would be persons who occupy official positions with a committee or with a subcommittee. The Senator from Oklahoma has consulted private consultants, but he would not presume to ask that they be permitted to come on the Senate floor; only someone for whose being here there is abundant precedent in situations of this kind.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator, then, would have no objection if we brought to the Senate floor someone who is associated with the staff of a Senator or with a committee or with a subcommittee of the Senate, or from the Social Security Administration?

Mr. KERR. I would amend my request to include such a person for the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I have no particular reason to wish to have anyone given that privilege merely for myself. I have a pretty clear idea what the administration's attitude is toward social security provisions in connection with medical care, and I have a feeling that there are those of us, like the Senator from Michigan [Mr. McNAMARA] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], who have introduced bills of which I have been privileged to be a cosponsor and who may wish to have expert actuaries or expert consultants in the social security field, and who may be associated with the Social Security Administration, present on the floor. I am not at all sure that we should agree to one request, to have an officer of the executive department come to the floor of the Senate—after all, we have a separation of powers in our Government, and such a person has no more right to be on the floor of the Senate than any taxpayer—in fact, a taxpayer would be much more entitled to attend on the floor—unless we have unanimous consent that both sides may have experts on the floor.

Mr. KERR. If the Senator from Minnesota objects to the request, let him say so, and I will withdraw it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will the Senator from Oklahoma broaden his request?

Mr. KERR. I broaden my request to include a member of a department or a committee having to do with this subject, for whom the Senator from Minnesota may wish to ask permission to have him attend on the floor.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I beg my good friend from Minnesota not to press his request, but to let us take this matter up as the situation arises and requires. I have no doubt that requests of a similar nature will be made, similar to the request made by the Senator from Oklahoma. I believe it is a little out of order to make a broad, blanket request that almost anyone can come to the floor of the Senate in connection with this discussion.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Not almost anyone. I was asking with respect to persons related to a Senator's staff, or committee or subcommittee of the Senate, or to one of the executive agencies.

Mr. BUSH. The rules already provide for that. If there is any exception to be made, it seems to me it ought to be taken up at the time as the need arises, and not by way of broad approval.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I would like to say most respectfully that the rules do not provide for it unless unanimous consent is given.

Mr. BUSH. Members of the Senator's staff are included.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes; staff members are included. I spoke of the executive branch of the Government. I wish to be sure that, while we are in this spirit of generosity, we include people from both sides.

Mr. BUSH. I do not believe there would be any question about it. I do think, however, it would be better to let the situation be decided when the occasion arises, and in the same way that the Senator from Oklahoma has made his request. I do not believe there would be any objection to a similar request. I beg the Senator from Minnesota not to stand in the way of the request of the Senator from Oklahoma, because he has pinpointed his request, and I believe it should be agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I do not want to stand in the way of the Senator from Oklahoma. I have a high regard for him. However, I hope that if the request may come on the other side of the question, the same spirit of generosity and expression will prevail. I have no objection.

Mr. BUSH. I assure the Senator from Minnesota that, so far as I am concerned, I shall not object. I shall use my influence with my difficult colleagues on this side of the aisle.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator's observations are usually accurate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—I simply desire to say that I believe the request is appropriate. I can also understand the reasoning of the Senator from Minnesota. However, I shall find it possible—indeed, I shall see to it that my schedule will allow me—to have the opportunity to be in the Senate when the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma presents the material from the Committee on Finance. I shall want to be here and to be helpful. I have no objection to the request.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I shall make one further observation, with the indulgence of the Senator from West Virginia. I appreciate what he has said and what the Senator from Minnesota has said.

I wish to make it quite clear that I shall discuss what the Committee on Finance did and what is the attitude of the Senator from Oklahoma, who was one of the sponsors of the amendment which was adopted, and my reasons for it. I do not advance my proposal as an administration measure, because it is not an administration measure. One of the finest things about it, so far as I am concerned, is that, when apprised of the situation, the representatives of the administration indicated that the administration would approve it.

I think one of the things in favor of my proposal is that it has secured bipartisan support in the committee, and that it has secured what I regard as the approval of the representatives of the administration. As I present it this afternoon, if I am permitted to get the floor for that purpose, it will be on the basis that it is a program for the people which can be approved by Congress, accepted by the President, and made available to the people in October of this year.

I thank the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, has the request been granted?

Mr. KERR. I thought it had been.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request has been granted.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield for a question?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I did not hear the Senator from Oklahoma state the time when he intended to address the Senate.

Mr. KERR. As soon as I can get the floor.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Today?

Mr. KERR. Yes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator from Oklahoma give me his attention, please?

Mr. KERR. Yes.

Mr. JAVITS. There are three alternatives which will be before the Senate. One is that of the Committee on Finance, which I know the Senator from Oklahoma will eloquently explain to us. Another is the so-called Forand-Kennedy-Humphrey-McNamara approach. There is a third alternative, which is sponsored on our side by myself and a number of my colleagues, which represents a general revenues plan. That, too, I believe, will engage the attention of the Senate, and I think quite properly. It has many advantages. As is the case with respect to many such plans, we may ultimately find that what we will adopt will be some blend of all three, and all the votes we can find will be necessary to get something done.

Therefore, I should like to advise the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma that I shall address myself, after he has completed his address, perhaps not until tomorrow, to the third alternative, the so-called general revenues plan; and also to give notice in the RECORD that I, too, shall seek the permission of the Senate—I think the Senator from Oklahoma has given us an excellent precedent—to have someone present from the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, with me on the floor, when, as, and if I may need that kind of help, because the Department is thoroughly aware of all the details. We, too, have tried to work with them, as the Senator from Oklahoma has, and as other Senators have. I am grateful to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. KERR. I thank the Senator from New York for his statement, and I thank the Senator from West Virginia for yielding.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I repeat: This is the time when we can strike back at medieval concepts of charity, and can wield a major blow in behalf of a fuller life of honor, dignity, and physical and mental independence in the retirement years of millions of senior citizens in the United States.

It was my responsibility, as a Member of the House, to have advocated and supported the original legislation which brought the social security system into being, and it seems to me that it would be most fitting for us to pass a measure providing a program of medical care for the aged during this month of August—the month of the 25th anniversary of the 1935 Social Security Act.

Health care for the aged is not a narrow partisan problem supported only by Democrats. Many persons—regardless of political persuasion—approve this proposal to establish a contributory system of insurance through the social security program.

They support the simple, effective idea of paying small premiums during their working years for a paid-up medical policy on retirement.

They want—and are willing to pay for—the pay-as-you-go system which would result in dignified treatment in retirement years.

This, I reemphasize, is not a partisan measure. It is one which has the general approval of all age groups—of the major political parties—and of all regions of the country.

As a concrete statistical example of this assertion, I refer to a survey by Representative WALTER H. JUDD, who reported on 10,368 replies from citizens in the Fifth Minnesota Congressional District to an annual questionnaire. See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 25, 1960, pages 14379–14381.

The House Member states that his district consists of about two-thirds of Minneapolis. He said the questionnaire was sent to every name in the telephone book with an address in the area.

Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that a sampling technique of this type will not bias the response in favor of medical aid for the aged through the use of the social security system. If any bias results, it will tend in the opposite direction, inasmuch as such a poll automatically omits all residents who cannot afford telephones; it especially omits large numbers of the aged who, as a group, have the fewest number of telephones and thus possess a lesser opportunity to influence the results of the survey.

I remind Members in the Congress that this was the preelection sampling technique which, in 1936, predicted the defeat of Franklin D. Roosevelt and resulted in the demise of the Literary Digest.

Representative JUDD's figures indicate that the sample responding had the following breakdown by party affiliation:

	Percent
Republican	50.3
Democrat, Farm Labor	11.5
Independent	28.7
Not indicated	9.5

This, then, was not a group we would consider to be heavily biased in favor of medical care of the aged through social security.

In addition, the question asked in the survey was a very responsible one, emphasizing the need for a tax increase to provide such medical care, phrased as follows:

Do you favor increasing the (social security) tax in order to provide additional benefits, such as: (d) providing insurance against costs of hospital, nursing home, and surgical services for retired persons under social security?

The responses of the group polled—in spite of personal and party predilection—indicated 59 percent in favor; 33 percent opposed; and 8 percent no opinion. Here is the breakdown:

[In percent]

	Yes	No	No opinion
Democratic, Farm Labor	78	15	7
Republican	50	42	8
Independent	66	28	6
Party or politics not indicated	64	26	10

Mr. President, this is not the only example of popular support for this principle. Other surveys are equally emphatic in indicating increased concern for providing hospital and medical care for the aged through social security.

On March 10, 1960—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 5226—Representative FRANCES P. BOLTON reported the results of her 1960 opinion poll in the 22d Congressional District of Ohio, which is generally regarded as a strong Republican district. Her replies from over 16,000 families to the question, "Should the Social Security Act be amended to include the payment of all medical expenses after retirement, the cost to be paid by both employer and employee?" were 60.3 percent in favor; 32 percent against; and 7.7 percent no opinion. Her poll further indicated that the concern on this score was an increasing one. In 1959 her survey showed 48.5 percent favored the proposal. In 1960, those favoring equaled 60.3 percent.

A survey published this year by the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan—nationally renowned for its objectivity—based on a 1956 study, revealed that 55 percent of all adults in the United States "favor governmental assistance in the provision of low-cost medical care." This was the case—not only with respect to 6 out of 10 Americans over 65—but with over half of every other age group—and with nearly 2 out of every 3 families. It was valid for all regions of the country—regardless of race, occupation, or sex.

Democrats in the sample favored such assistance, 63 to 19 percent; while Republicans also were in favor on a margin of 45 to 43 percent.

Mr. President, these sample studies give a concrete basis for the action we should take this month in keeping faith not only with the aged of this Nation, but, also, with the children and relatives who are concerned for them.

Along with 23 other Senators I cosponsored in late June an amendment to the social security bill of 1960 which was passed by the House and referred to the Senate Finance Committee. This amendment would become a substitute for the highly inadequate section in the House measure dealing with medical services for the aged. In adopting the House version of medical care bill, many Members of the House hoped that the Senate would amend the bill with legislation similar to S. 3503.

Mr. President, we should insure that these hopes are fulfilled and that medical insurance for the aged through the social security system will become a reality in this session of the Congress. It is a challenge we can accept with enthusiasm and honor. I trust we shall meet this responsibility.

COAL RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT ACT—PROPOSAL FOR FIELD RESEARCH STATION IN WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a letter which I sent under date of August 12, 1960, to the Secretary of the Interior in reference to his action and the action of his Department in carrying out the provisions of the Coal Research and Development Act. In the letter I set forth that West Virginia, being the principal coal-producing State in the United States, is certainly entitled to a preferential position for the establishment of one or more of the field research stations with respect to coal.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE,
August 12, 1960.

HON. FRED A. SEATON,
Secretary of the Interior,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The Coal Research and Development Act, strongly supported by me, overwhelmingly passed by the 86th Congress, and effective since July 7, 1960, is a statute which provides for an instrumentality capable of being of very real benefit to the coal industry so basic to the economy of West Virginia and of significant importance to the economies of a number of other States.

The office for implementation and administration of this act being within your jurisdiction as the Secretary of the Interior, I commend for your consideration the location of one or more of the field research stations in the southern West Virginia bituminous coal mining area where there are numerous appropriate sites—including the new U.S. Bureau of Mines facility at Mount Hope, where the need for employment and payrolls is of high priority, and where the supply of coal and production and research technicians is more than adequate.

When a Member of the House of Representatives, I sponsored with Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, the Synthetic Liquid Fuels Act. The coal research part of the program under that statute was administered at a U.S. Bureau of Mines laboratory we established at Morgantown in cooperation with the West Virginia University, where I trust other parts of the new coal research and development program also can be fostered and advanced.

West Virginia, the Nation's No. 1 coal-producing State, has an abundance of coal reserves and an oversupply of miners in its labor force under existing economic conditions surrounding the coal industry. New uses and new markets for our coal are imperative as part of the requirements for a health industry so vital to the national security, and as a means of alleviating the distressing surplus of chronic unemployment in West Virginia and other coal-producing States. We look with great hope to the Office of Coal Research and Development within the Department of Interior as an ultimate means to the end of finding new uses and new markets for coal and more jobs for coal miners.

I am sure my colleagues in the Congress from coal-producing States will be as interested as I am in having frequent periodic reports on the progress being made in the establishment of the Office of Coal Research and Development and in the implementation of the act under which that Office and its intended program are created. May we have an initial progress report before the proposed early September adjournment date of the 86th Congress?

Sincerely yours,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
U.S. Senator.

THE KENNEDY-MORSE MINIMUM WAGE BILL

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I oppose the Kennedy-Morse minimum wage bill, as reported to the Senate floor, for two major reasons:

First. Many of the workers whom the bill proposes to benefit would not obtain wage increases; instead, they would lose their jobs.

Second. The Kennedy-Morse bill threatens to extend Federal control to the merchants on Main Street throughout America, and to impose Federal regulation on small business enterprises which are purely local in character.

I favor extension of coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act to more workers in interstate commerce, as recommended by President Eisenhower and as pledged in the Republican Party's 1960 platform. I believe that the amount of increase in the minimum wage at the present time must be carefully considered from the standpoint of the effect it will have upon employment. Under present conditions, it appears that an increase to $1.15 an hour, as provided in the House-passed bill, is as far as we dare go if we wish to avoid throwing many thousands of people out of work.

An increase in the minimum wage and extended coverage under the act must be accomplished without imposing Federal regulation and control on local businesses. Thousands of small businessmen in Connecticut—retail merchants, hotel, restaurant and laundry operators, and others in the service trades—have expressed to me their grave concern that the Kennedy-Morse bill will inevitably lead to such regulation and control. Many believe the very existence of their businesses is at stake.

It is indeed ironic that the Democratic Party's presidential candidate, the leader of a party which professes to be the friend of small business, is leading the fight for legislation which strikes such fear into the hearts of small businessmen in my State and other States.

Under existing law, coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act is given to employees engaged in the production of goods for interstate commerce. The bill authored by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] and the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] proposes to extend the coverage to employees of enterprises engaged in activity affecting commerce under a definition of activities affecting commerce so broad as to cover almost every conceivable form of business or industry.

It is true, as the junior Senator from Massachusetts has pointed out, that a retail or service establishment, or a laundry or drycleaning plant, must have a gross annual volume of sales of not less than $1 million in order to come under the terms of the bill. But who among us doubts that if the standard of activity affecting commerce is once written into law, the dollar amount of sales required for coverage will be progressively lowered over the years? I, for one, do not doubt it. If the Kennedy-Morse bill is passed, and the Democrats control future Congresses, coverage will be broadened until every little business throughout the land is brought under Federal regulation.

Federal action in this field should be limited to establishing fair labor standards for employees who work for enterprises that are substantially engaged in interstate commerce. The States should establish such standards for the employees of intrastate businesses, including retail stores, hotels, restaurants, laundries and other enterprises that are essentially local in their nature.

My own State of Connecticut has been a leader among the States in minimum wage legislation, as in other fields of labor law. The 1957 General Assembly, in which Republicans controlled both the House and Senate by large majorities, raised the minimum wage to $1 for workers in the retail trades, laundries and drycleaning establishments, hotels and restaurants, and canneries. I am confident that our General Assembly will take such action as from time to time proves necessary to insure continued fair and equitable compensation for such employees.

CRITICISMS OF PRESENT SYSTEM OF SELECTING DELEGATES AND NOMINATING THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I was much interested in the remarks made earlier today by the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], the assistant majority leader, in which he said our present system of selecting delegates and nominating the President is an anachronism.

The Senator from Montana is not the only Democrat who appears to be somewhat unhappy with the method of selecting delegates and the way their votes are counted. As evidence on this point, I wish to read a brief editorial which was published only yesterday in the Sioux Falls Argus-Leader, of Sioux Falls, S. Dak. The editorial reads as follows:

POINDEXTER UPSETS DEMOCRATIC CALM

Persona non grata in Democratic political circles in South Dakota at the moment is Joe Poindexter, of Pierre.

Poindexter was a delegate from South Dakota to the Democratic National Convention. Now he says he is so unhappy about the methods employed at Los Angeles by the supporters of Senator JOHN KENNEDY that he will vote in November for the Republican ticket on the national level. To this he appends the statement that it should be remembered that George McGovern is an ardent supporter of KENNEDY.

Republicans, of course, rejoice in this sign of discontent within the ranks of the Democrats. So far at least no delegate to the Republican National Convention has indicated a similar dissatisfaction with the methods or the results.

Governor Herseth, a Democrat, points out that Poindexter has the right to do as he pleases but he indicated he wasn't in favor of his selection as a delegate in the first place.

All of which goes to show that life is rarely serene in political ranks as a campaign grows in intensity.

I submit the editorial for the RECORD as evidence that at least one Democrat in South Dakota is a little unhappy with the operations of the Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles.

SOLUTION FOR COURT DELAYS IS A STATE AND FEDERAL CONCERN

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, the Senate Subcommittee on Improvements in Judicial Machinery recently held a 2-day conference, in Chicago, with American Bar Association officials, representatives of the American Judicature Society, lawyers, judges, and scholars, regarding the problem of delay in the Federal courts. The conference was held pursuant to a resolution, which originated in the Judiciary Committee, and was approved by this body, extending to the subcommittee authority to make a detailed survey of the proceedings of the Federal court system, its fashion of procedure, and other aspects with a view to making recommendations for legislation, if any seemed appropriate, for the purpose of dealing with the problem of congestion in the Federal courts.

At the conference in Chicago it was brought out that the problem is the joint responsibility of the bar associations, lawyers, judges, and Congress. It was decisively demonstrated that the backlog of cases creating court congestion is so closely interrelated in Federal and State courts that the delay problem cannot be solved in either court system unless it is alleviated in both systems at the same time.

To solve the problem of delay in the Federal courts alone, for example, would be partially self-defeating because, if the State dockets remain congested, litigants will naturally file their cases with the current Federal docket whenever there was concurrent jurisdiction. As the backlog in a particular court is reduced, the number of filings is increased correspondingly, and the court never seems able to reduce its burden.

It is therefore gratifying to see State bar associations initiating studies on improvements in judicial administration at the same time our subcommittee is making similar studies of the Federal system.

The Nebraska State Bar Association recently held in Omaha, Nebr., a conference on judicial selection and court administration. Approximately 100 persons attended the conference. The State bar association was represented by experienced lawyers from all points in the State. Others in attendance included members of the press, labor organizations, church groups, PTA organizations, the League of Women Voters, and other lay groups. The judiciary was represented by several members of the Nebraska Supreme Court, district courts, and county courts.

The consensus of the Omaha conference is printed in the Nebraska State Bar Journal for July 1960. It is an excellent report, and outlines practical and immediate steps which can be taken on a local level to tackle the overall court situation. Especially welcome is the news that several lay groups joined with the professional bodies in search of a solution to help solve the overall court congestion problem.

This report will be of interest in every part of the country where persons from all walks of life are vitally concerned with this aspect of judicial administration. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the article published in the State bar journal be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, in order to bring this matter into the Federal sphere, and more particularly as regards the work of our subcommittee, I call the attention of the Senate to an editorial entitled "Spreading Judicial Blight," which was published on August 12, 1960, in the Washington Post. The editorial deals with the question of the necessity for additional judges for our Federal court system. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial also be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONSENSUS OF THE CONFERENCE ON JUDICIAL SELECTION AND COURT ADMINISTRATION, JUNE 9, 10, AND 11, 1960

ACTION PROGRAMS TO ACHIEVE IMPROVEMENT

Throughout all of the discussions it was plainly apparent that those attending the conference feel that some change in our method of judicial selection is needed and should be recommended by this conference.

The plan of the change was discussed generally at every meeting attended, but this report will deal only with the subject assigned—which, stated another way is—how to get the job done.

This phase of the program puts us directly into the field of public relations, and some of the aspects which were stressed are:

1. Right now is the most appropriate time to start on such a program because there is to be a considerable change in the personnel of the courts within the immediate future due to the judicial retirement system now in effect.

2. The education and motivation program must start as soon as possible with the members of the bar and the bench.

3. Public participation must be enlisted at once and various citizens' committees, labor groups, farm groups, civic and professional groups be invited to assist in the drafting of the program.

4. The support of the newspapers, the TV and radio stations, weeklies and all news media is essential to the success of the program.

5. Above all, the whole program and the whole movement must be carefully coordinated so that not lawyers alone, but everybody who should be interested is not only interested but is making a positive contribution.

Three methods of procedure were mentioned:

(a) Initiative and referendum.

(b) Act of legislature.

(c) Consideration by a constitutional convention.

The preference when these three methods were discussed was in favor of the last of the three—consideration by a constitutional convention—without excluding resort to the other two methods as and when they are available.

Respectfully submitted.

EFFECTIVE USE OF JUDICIAL MANPOWER

These recommendations are in reference to the district courts of Nebraska.

1. It is recognized that the district judges duties have become substantially administrative as well as judicial.

2. It is believed that the maximum use of the district judges' time as in the use of pretrial procedure, assignment of cases, duration of the trial day and uniform vacation periods would of itself speed the disposition of cases.

3. It seems that a unified acceptable plan of assignment of judges from one district to another, in the event of a judge's disability or of caseload would help in the present situation.

4. It appears that some redistricting is desirable.

5. It appears further that some additional judges may be required.

6. Some conservative and mutually acceptable plan of judicial administration and supervision of dockets should be considered.

It is suggested that these recommendations together with the complete notes of the reporter be referred to the subcommittee of the judicial council presently considering these problems for its consideration and action.

Respectfully submitted.

JUDICIAL COMPENSATION AND PENSIONS

1. While it is not necessary, nor even desirable to maintain a level of judicial compensation which will attract judicial aspirants in and of itself, judicial compensation should be at a level (a) commensurate with the dignity of the judicial office, (b) adequate to attract from the practice of law able and effective candidates, and (c) assuring an objective and relatively independent attitude on the part of the judge.

2. Judicial compensation is an important aspect of the problem of judicial selection. The adequacy of judicial compensation both current and deferred (pension benefits) bears directly on the problem of judicial selection.

3. The level of compensation for judicial officers in Nebraska is at present on the low side in comparison with (a) judicial salaries in other States and in the Federal system, (b) salaries of other comparable public officers, legally trained and otherwise, and (c) lawyers practicing in Nebraska. While this is not a critical problem at the moment it should receive constant and continuing attention in order to keep up with changing conditions.

4. Some States have judicial compensation systems which are flexible in that the compensation of judges in more populous counties is supplemented from county funds. This procedure should be studied as a possibly desirable one for Nebraska.

5. An adequate judicial retirement program is desirable not only from the view of humane consideration for superannuated judges but also from the view of efficient administration of the courts which in turn will result in economy in expenditure of public funds. Appropriate steps to impress this on the public at large should be considered.

6. The Judicial Retirement Act of Nebraska is making and is expected to continue to make a significant contribution to the adequacy of judicial compensation and to maintaining an effective and alert judiciary. It should be preserved and, in some areas, improved. The Nebraska Judicial Retirement program includes benefits payable in the event of permanent disability. This is deemed a valuable addition to the plan. It includes no provision for survivorship benefits to widows of judges. The addition of such benefits should be considered. The addition of such benefits through an optional joint and survivor annuity at retirement would not increase the cost of the plan to the State.

7. The retirement plan for Nebraska judges is now only partially funded (in the actuarial sense of that term). Whether, in view of the fact that it is applicable to public officers, it should be fully funded or more nearly fully funded is a problem which should receive the attention of interested groups and the legislature.

Respectfully submitted.

JUDICIAL SELECTION AND TENURE

In order to obtain judges of the highest judicial caliber it is necessary that they be selected solely on the basis of merit. Selection through popular election does not appear to be best suited to achieving this end. This is so because, unlike the legislative and executive branches of Government, the judiciary is not, in the strictest sense, a policy-making body but is a group engaged in a highly specialized and technical function. The electorate cannot, nor can it be expected to, judge adequately whether a person is fitted for judicial office.

It is no doubt true that the elective system can be strengthened through the bar recommending certain of the candidates for judgeships as well qualified and widely promulgating these recommendations to the electorate. Nevertheless, judges are still subject to pressures and the necessity of expensive and time-consuming campaigns. Bar support of a candidate does not appear to reduce these pressures significantly. Indeed, many lawyers feel that bar recommendation of a candidate is often misunderstood by the public, and may be an actual hindrance to the approved candidate's chance of election.

The so-called Missouri plan or American Bar Association plan eliminates the undesirable features of the present elective system by providing for the filling of vacancies through appointment by the Governor from nominations submitted by a nonpartisan commission composed of judges, lawyers, and laymen. Yet, the tenure of judges is still subjected to the vote of the people at a noncompetitive election at which each judge must run on his record at the end of his term.

From our discussion with the five panels, we have concluded that both lawyers and laymen attending the conference are overwhelmingly of the opinion that such an appointive plan is in the best interest of the public. It was generally agreed that this plan is the most effective way to express the composite judgment of a group which is best acquainted with those who will make competent judges. In addition, the judicial tenure under the plan is a strong inducement to obtain qualified persons who would be unwilling to subject themselves to the difficulties and insecurity of a competitive election.

There exists the question whether the appointive system of selection should be adopted statewide or only in the most populous areas. It is, of course, true that the need for the appointive plan may not be so pressing in rural areas because, generally speaking, the elective system has produced acceptable judges in these areas. Nevertheless, pressures are present in rural areas, and it is almost universally agreed that the appointive plan is desirable on a statewide basis.

In order to secure acceptance of the appointive system in Nebraska, much more education of the public as to the potential shortcomings of the present system must be accomplished. This can be done only if the bar, and in particular the present judiciary, form a solid front behind the plan and actively work for its adoption.

MAKING EXISTING SYSTEMS WORK

It was very generally agreed that the bar has a duty and an obligation to interest itself in the selection and election of qualified judges of all State courts, although the principal emphasis of the discussion was on the office of district judge. While outstate districts expressed general satisfaction with the caliber of their district judges, it was generally agreed that in many instances the best qualified lawyers in the district do not seek the office either by appointment or election.

It was the consensus of the panels that there are four principal factors which deter the best qualified lawyers from seeking election to the bench:

(a) Inadequate salary.

(b) The necessity for extensive expensive election campaigns.

(c) Insecurity of tenure.

(d) Lack of prestige.

There was considerable pessimism expressed as to the possibility of obtaining any increase in judicial salaries through action by the legislature in the immediate future. Comment was made on the disparity of living costs in metropolitan areas as compared to more rural areas and the possibility of obtaining legislation or constitutional amendment authorizing counties in metropolitan areas to supplement the statutory judicial salary out of county funds.

As to the necessity for extensive political campaigns and the insecurity of tenure, it was generally agreed that this has not been a seriously deterring factor in the past with reference to outstate judicial districts. It has been the experience that vacancies usually occurred through the death of an incumbent judge which resulted in a usually satisfactory Governor's appointment to the vacancy and that the incumbent was usually reelected and reelected without substantial opposition. It was pointed out, however, that vacancies will occur in the future by reason of compulsory retirement of judges under the present retirement program which will generally result in a competitive election for the vacancy. In such instances the most able lawyers may refuse to subject themselves to a handshaking political campaign and the available candidates may or may not be qualified for the bench. Such a situation now exists in three judicial districts and lawyers from those districts were somewhat concerned that the office would go to the most personable and indefatigable campaigner rather than to the best qualified candidate. It was the consensus that the fourth deterrent, lack of prestige, was perhaps particularly noticeable in the Omaha area, although it has not been unknown in outstate districts. Obviously, the prestige of the bench depends on the election of lawyers best qualified to hold the office.

It was the consensus that the bar should actively participate in judicial selection and election in the following ways:

(a) By soliciting and inducing competent lawyers to seek the office.

(b) By recommending to the Governor the names of qualified lawyers when a vacancy occurs requiring a Governor's appointment.

(c) By actively working as individuals or by general bar endorsement in election campaigns.

Two districts reported active solicitation by the bar association to induce competent lawyers to seek office in this year's election with reasonable success.

Most of the districts reported active participation by the bar association in making recommendations for Governor's appointments, which in most instances, although not all, resulted in an appointment from the names recommended.

All districts reported that individual lawyers generally advised clients and friends concerning the qualifications of candidates for judicial office, which was generally effective if confined to those having close contact with the lawyer and valuing his opinion. If used indiscriminately it was felt that endorsement might be harmful by leading the public to think that the individual lawyer had an ax to grind in endorsing and supporting a particular candidate.

While some districts expressed the opinion that a general endorsement of a candidate by the bar association is the "kiss of death," the majority felt that bar endorsements can be effective, especially when civic groups can be persuaded to actively support the bar endorsement. Effective bar endorsements, it was felt, would remove from the candidate's shoulders some of the curse of a political campaign and would tend to reasonably assure the candidate of tenure in office and thereby encourage better qualified lawyers to seek the office.

The feeling that the public will not accept and may even resent a bar association endorsement of a candidate for the bench is apparently based upon the low prestige in which the bar is held in public opinion. It was felt that lawyers, acting in good faith, can best determine the qualifications of candidates for the bench, that the bar as a whole has no personal ax to grind in endorsing one candidate over another and that through a program of education a bar endorsement could be made effective and would result in persuading more qualified candidates to run and in securing their election.

Respectfully submitted.

SPREADING JUDICIAL BLIGHT

If Members of Congress could visualize the consequences of denying the Federal courts the additional judges they have requested, we surmise that the present session would be extended until the judgeship bill were passed. Too often the legislators seem to assume that the chief question at issue in this measure is who will distribute 45 juicy political plums. Actually the question is whether Congress will continue to inflict injustice on thousands of citizens for want of judges to hear their law suits.

In the New York Metropolitan area, for example, it now takes almost 3 years to bring a case to trial in the Federal district courts. Many citizens of small means cannot afford to wait that long to have their legal disputes settled. Consequently they are forced to compromise in a vast number of automobile injury suits and similar cases. In general the large corporations can cope with these delays. Hard-pressed citizens, faced with doctor bills, and the repair of damaged property, are under heavy pressure to agree to sacrifice settlements because, in effect, the courts are closed to them.

The Government, too, pays heavily for this stagnation in the machinery of justice. It loses millions of dollars in interest at 6 percent because of the delay in hearing tax-refund cases, land-condemnation cases, and other suits involving large sums of money. The losses thus suffered by the Government alone are said to exceed the total salaries of all the 45 new judges that the courts have requested.

The failure of the Democratic Congress adequately to staff the courts in recent years has been laid to its reluctance to let a Republican President name so many new judges. That is a flimsy excuse for allowing the machinery of justice to deteriorate, and now it has lost whatever validity it may once have had. President Eisenhower long ago offered to divide the new judgeships equally between Democrats and Republicans if Congress would only vote the authorization. More recently Attorney General Rogers has suggested that the bill be passed to become effective next January 20 so that all the nominations would be made by the next President.

The obvious reason for acting now is to save a year in properly staffing the courts. Even if the new Congress, under heavy pressure from a new administration, should find time to pass a judgeship bill in 1961, it would probably be 1962 before the judges could be recruited and confirmed. With judgeship bills now on the calendars of both Houses, surely the present Congress could afford to stay in session an extra day, if necessary, to remove the spreading blight in the system of justice without further delay.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, has the Senator from Nebraska concluded his remarks on the subject of the need for additional judges?

Mr. HRUSKA. Yes, at this time.

Mr. KEATING. Then will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. HRUSKA. I am happy to yield.

Mr. KEATING. First, Mr. President, I wish to commend the distinguished Senator from Nebraska for the leadership he has taken in the Subcommittee for Improvements in Judicial Machinery.

He has made a great study of this problem, both from the point of view of the need for additional judges and other methods for expediting the business of the Federal courts.

On Saturday I addressed the Senate on the subject of the need for additional judges. I know this is a subject in which he has a deep interest; and I know, from my discussions with him, and his work on this subcommittee, that he agrees with me about the urgency of this problem.

The need for additional judges has been repeatedly emphasized by President Eisenhower in various messages to the Congress. He has put it on the agenda for action at this session. It is certainly one of the problems which, in my judgment, should have our attention here. It should not in any way require long debate or long delay in action in the Senate. It could easily be completed in a part of 1 day. But people of modest means, many of them ordinary working men and women, are suffering today because of the failure to have enough judicial manpower in our courts to handle their cases.

The Senator from Nebraska and I recently visited Chicago, and talked with the Federal judges and others interested there in the administration of justice. There is serious delay in the Federal courts in that area. There is an even worse delay in the U.S. District Courts for the Eastern and Southern Districts of New York where the need for additional judges is very acute.

The initial recommendation of the Judicial Conference for the U.S. Court of Appeals in New York and those two district courts was for 11 additional judges. The bill reported by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary was for four additional judges, and by the House Committee on the Judiciary for five. That addition, of course, would be a very substantial help.

The need is great in many other States. This is certainly, in my judgment, a matter which deserves consideration at this special session.

The President has asked for action on the minimum wage bill which is before us, and it is an important bill. He has asked for action in the other areas in the list which was presented to us by the majority leader. But this is not a sanctified list. There is no particular sacred list of items to be taken up in this session. Certainly the legislation for additional judges to which the Senator from Nebraska has referred is of vital importance and it should not be shunted aside in this session.

I am very glad the Senator from Nebraska has called our attention to this subject and I commend him for it.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a statement on this point?

Mr. HRUSKA. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. I commend the able Senator from Nebraska for bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate, because, if the calendar is correct, this bill has been on the calendar since September 10, 1959; so we have had plenty of chance to consider it this year if the controlling leadership, the Democratic Party, were willing to bring it up.

What the Senator from New York has said can be doubled so far as the State of Connecticut is concerned. Our situation is very serious. Our bar association has petitioned this body several times in recent years to provide for additional judges. We need two additional judges, although the bill on the Senate calendar provides only one additional judge for the State of Connecticut. But my able colleague from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] has joined me in an amendment to the bill asking for two judges, which shows the need we have in the State of Connecticut.

So I am very glad the Senator from Nebraska has pointed out the necessity for getting some action on the bill at this time.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HRUSKA. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. I think that any person who has been familiar with the Federal judicial system, as all of us who are lawyers have over periods of active practice at the bar, is fully cognizant of the fact that we just do not have enough Federal judges; and I commend the Senator from Nebraska for bringing this matter up.

I do not want to take much of the time of the Senate, but I should like to say that in my Commonwealth of Pennsylvania we are short of judges in all three Federal districts. In some areas we are years behind in the work of our Federal courts. While tremendously effective work has been done by the U.S. attorneys and by our sitting judges, particularly in the field of getting caught up in criminal trials, the civil trials lag very far behind. In spite of the best efforts of our judges and the fact that we are using judges who are no longer active, by virtue of their having retired under the Federal system—it has been necessary to call them back—the rights of litigants are seriously delayed. The American Bar Association, meeting here later this month, will undoubtedly have more to say about it. But when we talk about the rights of individuals, I think certainly we must consider the rights of the ordinary litigant. He has no organization to help him. He has no special interest group. He has no lobby. He or she merely has a case before the Federal courts, and he or she must certainly wonder why the Congress of the United States does not help him get the case tried.

When a woman is in the Federal courts to recover damages for negligent action which caused the death of her husband, and where the case has been taken to the Federal courts under the diversity of citizenship provisions, it is small comfort for her to know that somebody in the Senate of the United States has made some reference to this being a patronage matter. Surely, it cannot be a patronage matter under this bill, since the President of the United States has publicly agreed that the judges are to be appointed equally from each political party.

Therefore, those who deny justice by delaying it, those who deny justice by talking in terms of patronage, those who deny the ordinary litigant his or her day in court must assume the blame for their unwillingness, by reason of their own motivations, which I think are not in the public interest. And, meanwhile, our litigants will stand in long queues at the doors of our Federal courts, waiting for justice and wondering why the Congress of the United States has so little interest in their difficult and unsolved problems.

I thank the Senator from Nebraska for yielding to me.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, it was with pleasure that I listened to the comments of the Senator from New York on this subject. He had served long years on the Judiciary Committee of the other body. He is now a member of the Subcommittee on Improvement of the Judicial Machinery. He sat in on the conferences in Chicago to which I have referred. He brought to bear many helpful suggestions with all the force of his years of experience on the subject. I am sure, as we proceed in this work, his counsel and his aid will be of great assistance.

Mr. President, I desire to speak on another subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

THE PASSPORT BILL—A 2-YEAR-OLD "MUST"

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, a few days ago there was discussed somewhat briefly on the floor, at the original instance of the Senator from Ohio, a 2-year-old "must" bill, the bill having to do with the issuance of passports under regulations of the State Department. It is to that subject I should like to address myself for a few minutes.

Until June 16, 1958, the State Department enforced regulations providing that no passport would be issued if the applicant was a member of the Communist Party; was under Communist Party discipline, domination, or control; or if he was traveling abroad to assist knowingly the international Communist movement.

On that day, however, the Supreme Court struck down those regulations as invalid on the ground that there was lack of specific legislative authority for them.

Since that day, the State Department has been compelled to issue passports to hundreds upon hundreds of applicants notwithstanding their clear and well-known records of activity and intended plans in support of international communism and in support of its constant efforts to dominate the entire world, including the United States. By the hundreds they have traveled abroad to further and advance their conspiracy, threat, and program against our national safety and survival.

In spite of their well-known status as soldiers in the Communist army for indirect aggression, our Government is forced to extend to them the protection, convenience, and the dignity of a U.S. passport. It is forced to expedite their travels in foreign countries. And after they have performd their infamous assignments abroad, that same passport serves to gain for them readmission into the very country which they are pledged and bound to subvert and to prepare for delivery into the hands of our enemies.

All this is so because the Congress has failed to enact a law providing for adequate standards and specific authority in the premises.

The list of "must" bills may be long; the time of our session short. Yet there is no measure deserving of more prompt and expeditious action than this one which so closely and vitally affects our Republic.

As a nation we spend more than half of our annual Federal budget to fight a cold war and trying to prevent or deter a hot one. Yet we fail to close the gaping hole torn in our defenses over 2 years ago—a breach which is being joyfully and fruitfully and fully exploited daily by those who are dedicated to the task of betraying our Nation and delivering it into the hands of the enemy.

The importance of free and unrestricted travel to advancement of the Communist cause should be plain to any thoughtful person. Yet there are those who express doubts and who assert that there is no need for this legislation.

Mr. Roderic L. O'Connor, while administrator of the Bureau of Security and Consular Affairs of the State Department, answered the doubters in this way:

We are convinced that the effective functioning of the international party machinery depends to a very great degree on the freedom of many of these persons to travel. Everyone in business today travels almost constantly. You all know that personal contact is an invaluable way of doing business. You all know that the telephone and the mails are not an adequate substitute in carrying on your own business for personal contacts. If this is true of normal business operations, how much more true is it of the enormously complex operation of the international Communist conspiracy.

Imagine, if you can, carrying on a worldwide business where virtually all of your communication must be kept secret. Imagine, if you will, carrying on a worldwide operation, the very essence of which is espionage, subversion, and sabotage.

The necessity for personal assessment, of personal recruitment—indeed of all forms of personal contact—will be obvious to you at once. In an organization of this sort, to hamper the movements of any members of the organization is a crippling blow and puts the operations of the organization under a most heavy handicap.

Mr. O'Connor's remarks were made in a speech he delivered to leaders of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, in Washington, D.C., on November 8, 1958. Among other things, he told of receipt by the Passport Office of 596 applications for passports from persons who have undoubted records of activity in support of the international Communist movement within 5 months of the Supreme Court decision. He described some of the records involved.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from his speech be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, the record of Congress for inaction is a shameful one. There have been numerous and lengthy hearings before several committees. The House passed a bill in the 85th Congress. It passed another one in September of last year.

But nothing came to the Senate Calendar till June 30, 1960, more than 2 years after the Supreme Court decision was rendered.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported S. 2652 at that time. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a description of its provisions be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, despite the pendency of the bill, despite the fact that the subject has been thoroughly explored and is ready for action on the floor, there is still no indication that the leadership of the Senate will take any step to make it the pending business. It should be acted upon, Mr. President. It is long overdue.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at the conclusion of my remarks a summary of the activities of the Congress regarding passport legislation since the Supreme Court decision of 1958.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I wish to commend the senior Senator from Ohio for having spoken on this same subject in the Senate a few days ago, as well as the senior Senator from Georgia, the senior Senator from Delaware, and others.

I urge that others also join in similar expressions so that action will be taken yet this session on this very vitally needed legislation.

EXCERPTS FROM SPEECH OF RODERIC L. O'CONNOR BEFORE VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS

Through several days of hearings I was frequently asked the questions: "Why was it dangerous for American Communists to travel abroad? Why can they do more harm abroad than they can do here? Why, if the mails and the diplomatic pouch are open to these people, is it so important that they be prevented from actually traveling abroad in person?"

These are good questions and I should like to give you gentlemen the answers as I see them.

HOW COMMUNIST CONSPIRACY WORKS

To answer these questions requires an understanding of what the Communist conspiracy is and how it operates. I do not need to explain to this group the aims of the Communists or their political objectives. I should say, however, that the dependence of the Communists on direct armed aggression has in recent years lessened. The emphasis today is on indirect aggression. That type of aggression places a much heavier reliance than heretofore on subversion and espionage and on all forms of political agitation and political propaganda.

The principal instrument of the Soviet Communists for carrying out these tactics of subversion and political agitation abroad is, of course, the apparatus of the international Communist conspiracy. This international apparatus exists in almost every part of the world and is directed and supported from Moscow. It is a vast and complex organization, partly overt and partly covert. Much of its activity is public and can be seen in a variety of forms in every capital of the world.

Perhaps even a more important part of this activity is hidden from view and relies on secret communication and correspondence, on covert financing and on hidden means of resupply. In such a worldwide organization there must be hundreds and thousands, indeed probably millions, of persons in all the countries of the world who have their valued place in the party machinery. A fair share of these persons are here in the United States. Let me tell you about some of the worst cases who have recently applied for passports.

One of our recent applicants was born in Czechoslovakia and is now a naturalized American citizen. It was his job to furnish his contacts in Czechoslovakia with the names of active anti-Communists in the United States whose relatives were living back in Czechoslovakia. What the Czech Government probably did to those relatives would not be hard to imagine.

Another client of our passport office was thought by the Canadian Government to be so dangerous to the public security that the Canadians refused him entry to that country to attend a Communist rally featuring the famous "Red" Dean of Canterbury. Yet your Government is powerless to deny him a passport.

Perhaps one of the hardest cases for us to stomach, and I am sure this group of veterans will agree with me, is that of William Lorenzo Patterson.

Mr. Patterson boasts that he is a Communist. He is the general manager of the weekly Communist newspaper, the Worker. In 1950, when he was visiting his fellow Communists in Hungary and Czechoslovakia, he gave press interviews in which he accused this Government of being a Government of criminals and cannibals. He accused us of using germ warfare in Korea. He repeatedly advocated the overthrow of the U.S. Government. He made a speech in New York City in 1952 in which he is reported to have urged his listeners to write to American soldiers in combat in Korea and to incite them to go over to the other side.

Patterson now wants a passport to go to Europe and to the Soviet Union on "business and pleasure." It is not difficult to imagine what Mr. Patterson's business and pleasure will be. For the United States it will be dirty business. Yet Mr. Patterson travels with our official blessing and protection.

Another case involves a Communist labor leader who went to England some years ago during a strike at the port of London and had to be expelled by the British Government because of his activities as a Communist agent in blocking settlement of the strike. We have now been obliged to give him a passport, a passport which asks the British authorities to let the bearer pass "safely and freely."

You all recall the name Julius Rosenberg, convicted of espionage for the Soviets and executed. The man who recruited Julius Rosenberg into the Communist Party in 1939 has applied for and received a passport since the Supreme Court's decision. Still a party member, his job has been to recruit chemists and other scientists into Communist-dominated organizations.

There is the case of Victor Perlo who has been identified in sworn testimony as a Communist who passed documents from the sensitive wartime Office of Strategic Services to a courier for the Communist apparatus. His application is now under consideration.

WHEN AMERICANS BERATE AMERICA

We have had to give passports to such ardent Communist supporters as Hugh Hardymen and Anita and Henry Willcox, all of whom attended a Commie peace conference in 1952 at Peiping, in Red China, in evasion of passport restrictions. All of them made statements accusing the United States of using germ warfare in the Korean conflict.

Finally, there are the more notorious cases of Earl Browder and Anna Louise Strong. Browder, onetime head of the Communist Party in this country, who had previously been convicted of misusing his passport, promptly applied again in order to renew his international travels. Anna Louise Strong, upon receiving a passport this year, promptly visited her friends in the Soviet Union and despite the passport restriction against travel to Communist China, she went from there to Peiping, where she is still visiting and talking.

These are but a few examples on our list. The list now numbers 596. These people are from every profession and every walk of life. Legally, I cannot show that they are all members of the Communist Party. I cannot prove in a court of law that all, or even a large portion of them, are espionage agents or even trained subversives. However, as a group, they share one thing in common. Most of them are disciplined and obedient to the policies and directives of international communism. Many of them perform the most humble tasks of party organization. We are convinced that the effective functioning of the international party machinery depends to a very great degree on the freedom of many of these persons to travel.

One does not have to be a student of Communist Party organization to realize the truth of what I have said. To illustrate this truth each one of you needs only to think of the organization for which he works. Everyone in business today travels almost constantly. You all know that personal contact is an invaluable way of doing business. You all know that the telephone and the mails are not an adequate substitute in carrying on your own business for personal contacts. If this is true of normal business operations, how much more true is it of the enormously complex operation of the international Communist conspiracy.

Imagine, if you can, carrying on a worldwide business where virtually all of your communication must be kept secret. Imagine, if you will, carrying on a worldwide operation, the very essence of which is espionage, subversion, and sabotage.

The necessity of personal assessment, of personal recruitment—indeed, of all forms of personal contact—will be obvious to you at once. In an organization of this sort, to hamper the movements of any members of the organization is a crippling blow and puts the operations of the organization under a most heavy handicap.

I think once these facts are understood, the reasons for our insistence on the urgent need for legislation to control the issuance of passports to Communists become much clearer.

INTERNAL SECURITY AMENDMENTS

Subsection 4(c) and section 5, respectively, would write into the Immigration and Nationality Act and the existing passport law, respectively, specific authority for denial, limitation, or revocation of a passport in the case of any person where there exists adequate grounds for believing that such person is, or has been since January 1, 1951, a member of, or affiliated with, the Communist Party, or knowingly engages or has knowingly engaged, since January 1, 1951, in activities intended to further the international Communist movement, and where it is also determined that the activities or presence of such person abroad would be harmful to the security of the United States.

Section 5 of S. 2652 also authorizes the Secretary of State to require each passport applicant to submit a verified written statement respecting any Communist Party membership or affiliation since January 1, 1951.

TRAVEL RESTRICTIONS

Section 5 provides further authority for the Secretary of State to limit travel under passports in countries or areas where the Secretary has determined that the U.S. Government is unable to provide adequate protection to persons traveling, due to the lack of diplomatic relations or due to disturbances within such countries or areas, or where the Secretary has determined that travel of U.S. nationals to or in such countries or areas would seriously impair the foreign relations or foreign policy of the United States.

REVIEW PROCEDURE

Section 6 of S. 2652 provides in detail for passport review procedure. It authorizes review of the case of any applicant who petitions for such review within 6 months after his passport has been withdrawn, canceled, or revoked, or his passport application has been denied.

The review provisions include requirements that the applicant shall be given reasonable notice of the reasons for the original action; that the applicant shall have the privilege of being advised, assisted, or represented by counsel; that the applicant shall have a reasonable opportunity to present all information relevant and material to the formulation of a recommendation in his case; that the applicant may testify in his own behalf; that the applicant may present witnesses and offer other evidence; and that a complete verbatim stenographic transcript shall be made of the proceedings on review, which transcript shall be available to the applicant or his counsel.

It is specifically provided that review proceedings shall be conducted in such a manner as to protect from disclosure information which in the opinion of the Secretary of State would affect the national security, safety, and public interest or would tend to compromise investigative sources or investigative methods; but this provision is modified by a proviso that no such information shall be the basis for the denial, withdrawal, cancellation, or revocation of a passport in the case of any applicant unless such applicant has been furnished a statement summarizing such information in as much detail as possible without jeopardizing the national security, safety, and public interest, or compromising investigative sources or methods.

It is further specifically provided that in connection with the review, consideration shall be given to the inability of the applicant to challenge such information, if any, concerning which he has not been advised in full or in detail, or to attack the credibility of information which has not been disclosed to him.

EIGHTY-FIFTH CONGRESS

July 7, 1958: President sent message to the Congress emphasizing need of authority in Secretary of State to deny passports where their possession would seriously impair the conduct of foreign relations or would be inimical to the security of the United States.

July 7, 1958: Secretary of State transmitted draft legislation to the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate, which would provide standards for the issuance of passports, including provisions for denial of passports to persons currently and knowingly engaged in activities in furtherance of the international Communist movement.

July 8, 1958: Senator GREEN (by request) introduced administration bill in the Senate—S. 4110.

July 8, 1958: Mr. KEATING introduced administration bill in the House—H.R. 13318.

July 16, 17, 21, and 28, 1958: Senate Foreign Relations Committee held hearings on passport legislation, including Department of State witnesses. (Passport bills in addition to administration bill S. 4110 then before the Foreign Relations Committee were S. 2770, S. 3998, and S. 4137.)

July 17, August 14, 15, and 18, 1958: House Foreign Affairs Committee held hearings on passport legislation including the Selden bill—H.R. 13760—at which Department of State witnesses appeared.

August 21, 1958: Selden bill—H.R. 13760—favorably reported by House Foreign Affairs Committee (Rept. No. 2684, 85th Cong., 2d sess.).

August 23, 1958: Selden bill—H.R. 13760—passed the House of Representatives and referred to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee (which failed to act thereon prior to the adjournment of Congress).

EIGHTY-SIXTH CONGRESS

Administration decided to back appropriate passport bills directed to the provision of authority for the Secretary of State to deny passports to persons knowingly engaged in activities intended to further the international Communist movement.

January 7, 1959: Selden bill—H.R. 55—introduced and referred to Foreign Affairs. (This bill identical with H.R. 13760 which passed the House in 85th Congress.)

January 19, 1959: President in his budget message for 1960 referred to the need for legislation in the passport field.

April 10, 1959: Department of State commented in support of H.R. 55 but submitted certain revisions to Foreign Affairs.

May 7, 1959: H.R. 7006 introduced by Mr. BENTLEY, which incorporated Department of State revisions in H.R. 55.

July 1, 1959: S. 2315 introduced by Senator WILEY and referred to Foreign Relations (S. 2315 identical with H.R. 7006 and strongly supported by State Department.)

June 26, 1959: President's view that passport legislation essential and urgent reaffirmed to Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

July 13, 1959: Senate Foreign Relations Committee held hearings on passport legislation, including testimony of Department of State witnesses. (Committee consideration included S. 2315 (WILEY), S. 806 (HUMPHREY), S. 1973 (JAVITS), S. 2287 (FULBRIGHT).)

August 5, 11, 12, 18 and 19, 1959: House Foreign Affairs Committee held hearings on passport legislation, including testimony by Department of State witnesses. (Foreign Affairs considered H.R. 55, H.R. 1919, H.R. 5575, H.R. 5948, H.R. 5951, H.R. 5954, H.R. 5956, H.R. 6537, H.R. 2468, H.R. 5455, H.R. 8329, and H.R. 7006.)

September 3, 1959: Mr. SELDEN introduced H.R. 9069 (referred to Foreign Affairs) which was the product of Foreign Affairs Committee consideration.

September 4, 1959: H.R. 9069 favorably reported by Foreign Affairs Committee (Rept. No. 1151, 86th Cong., 1st sess.).

September 8, 1959: H.R. 9069 passed House of Representatives and referred to Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

September 7, 1959: S. 2652—introduced by Senators DODD and KEATING and referred to Judiciary Committee. (This bill was a revision of the Eastland bill—S. 1303 introduced on March 5, 1959.)

June 30, 1960: S. 2652—Dodd-Keating bill—favorably reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee (Rept. No. 1811, 86th Cong., 2d sess.).

Other committee action

December 15, 1959: Senate Internal Security Subcommittee held hearings on Communist use and abuse of U.S. passports. Department of State representative testified.

April 22, 23, 24, and June 5, 1959: House Committee on Un-American Activities held hearings on passport security. Department of State representative testified. HCUA considered H.R. 2232, introduced by Mr. WALTER on January 12, 1959.

April 20, 21, 23, 24, 27–30, May 1, 5 and 15, 1959: Senate Internal Security Subcommittee held hearings on proposed antisubversion legislation. Department of State representative testified on April 29, 1959, as to need for passport legislation. (Subcommitee had before it S. 1303—Eastland bill.)

August 26, 27, and September 1, 1959: Special subcommittee of Senate Government Operations Committee held hearings on the Passport Reorganization Act of 1959—S. 2095, introduced by Senator MUNDT on June 3, 1959. Department of State witnesses testified inter alia as to the need for passport control in the Communist area.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HRUSKA. I am happy to yield to my colleague from New Hampshire.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I join the distinguished Senator from Nebraska in his very commendable effort to secure action on the measure to which he refers at this session of the Congress.

Mr. President, it is inconceivable that we should spend so many hours talking about and should indulge in so much publicity about the defense of this country, about the question of whether we have a sufficient number of guided missiles or a sufficient number of other weapons of various types, yet fail to take action from day to day, from week to week, from month to month, as we have done from January through July, with respect to a matter which is so pressing.

The bill certainly has had adequate consideration in the committees, waiting for the attention of the Congress. The need for such legislation has been laid down by the Supreme Court of the land. As I say, it is inconceivable that Congress should not take the necessary action in order to have control over this vital arm of the defense of our country and all for which it stands.

I hope that the majority leadership in the Senate, which brought us back for this "rump session," and which has complete control over the calendar, will give us an opportunity to vote on the bill. I commend the Senator from Nebraska for having brought it to their attention.

Mr. HRUSKA. I thank the Senator for his very generous remarks.

I wish to observe also, Mr. President, that within 48 hours this country will start to receive press dispatches and reports concerning the trial of Mr. Powers in Russia, for a single expedition of espionage which did not quite make the grade. There were several hundred flights before that, and they got by in splendid shape to accomplish the purposes for which they were designed.

Notwithstanding the many protests which are going to be heard as to the type of trial Mr. Powers is going to get, notwithstanding the fact that this incident involved only one mission in espionage, we in the Congress from day to day are considering measures which will fritter away not only the substance of our taxpayers but also many of the rights and liberties which the people have heretofore possessed on the local scene, while we disregard and fail to act on very important things, such as trying to close the door to hundreds of these people who are traveling abroad to further and to advance their ideas of how to promote the causes of international communism.

It is going to be very difficult for the people of this country to understand why such action is not being taken under the circumstances and why this particular legislation, important as it is, is denied the consideration and the expeditious action to which it is entitled.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HRUSKA. I am happy to yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I am very happy that the distinguished Senator from Nebraska has brought this subject before the Senate. This bill was reported by the Judiciary Committee, as I remember, without a "no" vote.

Mr. HRUSKA. That is correct.

Mr. KEATING. It was unanimously reported by the subcommittee to the full committee. It was introduced on a bipartisan basis by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], and myself. It goes beyond the passport question, as the Senator knows. It clears up two or three of the legal situations which today are inexcusable. A person who commits treason or some other subversive violation of the law in this country is, of course, punishable by our laws. But if he commits such a crime in a foreign country, there is nothing that we can do about it here. The bill clears up that situation, as has been forcefully requested by the Attorney General. The bill clears up the anomalous situation created by the decision of the Supreme Court that it was a violation of law to enter into a conspiracy to organize the Communist Party originally, but not when the case involved a cell of the Communist Party.

I do not criticize the decision. I do not know. I think one can argue either way, so far as the actual legal situation is concerned, on the law as it has been enunciated. But certainly the present situation cries out for correction by the Congress, and a restatement is required if the law was incorrectly stated before. We need a restatement of the legislative intent to make those who enter into a conspiracy to form a unit of the Communist Party as much subject to our laws as those who originally formed the Communist Party, all of whom are exempt now because the statute of limitations has run.

Finally, the bill deals with the passport question. It may well be that the language of the passport provision of the bill could well be improved upon. This subject calls for all kinds of judicial review, and, in my judgment, appropriate protection of those who might be denied a passport improperly. It permits a court review of the action of the Secretary of State, but if further protection is needed, well and good. I would certainly not oppose greater protection. I have the impression that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] would not oppose it, but certainly we should not give the out-and-out Communists of this country the privilege of traveling abroad to spread their poison against our country and the privilege also of going abroad for further instruction in espionage activities, without the Secretary of State being able to do one thing to prohibit such practice. We are placed in a completely untenable position, and the Secretary of State should have some power in the premises.

I personally do not like some of the bills that have been drawn which have provided that if the Secretary of State feels that issuance of a passport will militate against our foreign policy, he may deny such passport.

I think that language goes too far, but I think he should have the power to deny a passport to an outright Communist in a case, for example, in which he knows the purpose of a man's proposed visit to a foreign country is to learn better how to overthrow our Government. It is an impossible situation. I can think of nothing requiring more prompt action. It has been requested and pleaded for by the Secretary of State and the Attorney General, and I commend my friend from Nebraska for calling attention to the need for this legislation.

Mr. HRUSKA. I thank the Senator from New York. The decision referred to was rendered by the Supreme Court on June 18, 1958. Before the expiration of 3 weeks, on July 7, as soon as the decision could be printed and the matter researched, there was a message from the President of the United States—to the Congress in which he made this bill a "must" bill which it still is, even though over 2 years have expired since that designation was originally given to it.

On the following day our present colleague in the Senate, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], then a Member of the House, introduced a bill in the House on this very subject. It was the administration bill on the subject, and it was on the basis of that bill that the House committee reported a bill which was approved by the House. That procedure was repeated again earlier this session, and we still find ourselves at a stalemate.

I call the attention of the Senate to that occurrence because when the Senator from New York speaks on the subject, it is with the voice of real authority, because he has interested himself in it from its very inception.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further step of clarification?

Mr. HRUSKA. I am happy to yield.

Mr. KEATING. There has been some criticism of this bill. Sincere and well-meaning people can have differences of opinion. My personal preference is for the terms of the House bill rather than the provisions of the bill as reported by our subcommittee and authored by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] and myself. Again, sincere people can differ in their preference. But certainly my plea is for action in the premises. It is necessary that we have prompt action to put an end to what is now an intolerable situation.

Mr. HRUSKA. Would the Senator from New York agree, however, whatever differences of view exist, that the scope of this legislation is sufficiently restricted so that legislators, men acting in good faith in the other body as well as in this body, would get together and draft legislation which would satisfactorily achieve the mission to which we have directed our attention.

Mr. KEATING. I do. I feel furthermore that one reason for preferring the House language is a practical one at this stage of the proceedings. If we were to accept the language of the House, it might obviate the necessity for a conference and expedite the procedures. The House bill circumscribes the authority of the Secretary of State somewhat more than does the bill which has been unanimously reported out of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Nevertheless, it is important to progress in this direction, and action is necessary.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HRUSKA. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. I think it is particularly important that the powers given to the Secretary of State in this matter be carefully circumscribed. For that reason it is possible, as the junior Senator from New York said, that the House bill may be preferred. But I think we should be extremely careful as to the powers we vest in the Secretary of State to decide on the denial of passports, because the denial of the right of people to move freely around the world is the denial of a very substantive right.

I recall that approximately 15 years ago an estimable lady who was the head of the Passport Division refused a passport to a lady who wished to visit her home country. The refusal was solely on the ground that she, the Director of the Passport Division, thought the lady was too old. I think the applicant outlived the head of the Passport Division involved. In any event, she survived for 12 or 13 years more, and was very happy, after 2 years of hard work on the part of her Representative in Congress, that she was allowed to visit her home country.

Those are petty and minor powers exercised by someone clothed with a little brief authority.

I do not believe that anyone in the State Department ought to have the right to say that he will not let anyone else go abroad for some reason which strikes him as important. Congress ought clearly to define the reasons, and the reasons should be limited to the national interest of the country, and that limitation of power should be narrowly construed.

Mr. HRUSKA. I did not go into the substantive provisions of the bill. I inserted in the RECORD a description of the bill. All of those contingencies are taken into consideration and provided for. I assure Senators that they will find that to be the fact when they go into this subject.

Mr. SCOTT. I am delighted to hear that that is so. I compliment the distinguished Senator from Nebraska on his excellent presentation.

Mr. KERR obtained the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a few minutes, without my losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE PEACE CORPS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, since introducing my Peace Corps bill—S. 3675—on June 15, 1960, I have received a "tidal wave" of mail praising this program. My office has gotten more mail on the peace corps than on any other foreign policy subject. Out of the hundreds of messages, there has only been one letter which has opposed the bill.

The mail supporting the measure reconfirms my belief that there is a rich strain of idealism and humanitarianism in the American people which is only waiting to be harnessed.

John Bewick, who just graduated from Yale University, wrote me:

I believe that the present college generation will respond to the challenge of aiding needy nations if they are but given the opportunity. For example, 24 Yale students applied to the African-American Institute to teach in Africa.

Another letter which praises this effort to enlist our skilled and dedicated young people to go to the underdeveloped areas to help teach basic agricultural, industrial, and sanitation techniques, as well as to participate in literacy training, comes from an Air Force major who writes:

I have spent the last 18 years of my life in the Armed Forces of the United States. My oath "to defend the United States against all enemies, foreign or domestic, so help me God," weighs heavily upon me at this time. The world, instead of being drawn closer, is drifting further apart.

In the past, our purpose in fighting wars was to preserve the American society. I feel it is extremely doubtful that we can emerge from our next conflict with anything that resembles an organized society.

I believe that your bill will prove to be a monumental step forward in preventing a thermonuclear holocaust. I pray that it will be passed quickly and the Peace Corps organized rapidly.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from several letters I have received on this subject be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I feel that a peace corps to assist in underdeveloped areas is in keeping with the spiritual heritage which is ours in this fortunate and happy land.

IVA OLIVER.

DENVER, COLO.

I have just read in the Minneapolis Tribune your proposal for a youth peace corps. I think your ideas for this project are outstanding. Not since the inauguration of the point 4 program have we had such a sensible, realistic, and effective program to win the real struggle we are involved in today * * * the battle to win men's minds by demonstrating the true virtues of a democratic system.

MYLES SPICER.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

There is a really desperate need for programs like this and the Youth Conservation Corps to capture the enthusiasm and idealism of young Americans.

FRANK WALLICK,
Wisconsin State AFL–CIO.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.

A great woman has said that she is not so sure that political reforms will be effective if the politicians who present them do so for the wrong reasons. I believe that you are presenting this bill for the right reasons and that it may make an incalculable difference.

ETHEL ZIEGLER.

BOULDER, COLO.

This is America at its best—America offering literacy to the downtrodden instead of just guns. Unless we do something like this, I am sure it will not matter whether this great Nation goes on. For sharing with the world the knowledge that this is a bountiful universe which gladly yields its bounty when the secrets are known has become our bounden duty. These are not secrets to be kept. Inexorable laws are now at work that demand we share what we know, not just the material goods that we possess.

INTEREST RATE POLICIES

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, recent action by the Federal Reserve Board lowering the rediscount rate from 3½ percent to 3 percent indicates that our money managers are having some second thoughts about the tight money, high interest rate policies which have been pursued consistently for the past 7 years.

The tight money policies of this Republican administration have fattened bank profits at the expense of consumers and small business, at the expense of homeowners and farmers—and I expect the people of America will remember who is responsible for these tight money policies when they go to the polls in November.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that three recent articles from the Washington Post about the Federal Reserve Board cut in the rediscount rate be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The first, entitled "Discount Rate Cut by Four Reserve Banks," and the second, "Motives Behind the Rate Cut," appeared on August 12. The third, "Credit Policy Changes Linked to Past Excesses," appeared in the Post on August 15.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Aug. 12, 1960]

EFFECTIVE TODAY: DISCOUNT RATE CUT BY FOUR RESERVE BANKS

The Federal Reserve Board took another major step toward easing credit yesterday by approving a reduction in the discount rate of four Federal Reserve banks from 3½ to 3 percent.

Its action is effective today. The new discount rate—the interest the Federal Reserve charges on loans to commercial banks—was authorized for Federal Reserve banks in New York, Cleveland, Richmond, and Kansas City.

The Board normally would follow up its action by authorizing a similar drop in the discount rate of the eight other Federal Reserve banks.

A drop in the discount rate usually means a reduction in the interest rate commercial banks charge on loans to businessmen and consumers. This would be in line with the Board's policy of gradually making more credit available to borrowers.

The Federal Reserve's discount rate was lowered from 4 to 3½ percent in June. That action was regarded as an answer to slackening business activity and dwindling inflationary pressures.

The last time the discount rate was as low as 3 percent was in the spring of 1959. During the 1958 business recession, the rate was lowered to 1¾ percent to stimulate economic activity and borrowing.

The administration's tight money, or high interest rate, policies long have been a target of Democrats, who have charged that they enabled banks and other large lenders to enrich themselves at the expense of commercial and personal borrowers.

Defenders of the policy have replied that the high rates are necessary to combat inflationary pressures.

A spokesman for the Board said the new 3-percent rate should make enough credit available to meet legitimate credit needs. But he said the latest reduction was essentially a technical adjustment to market needs.

[From the Washington Post, Aug. 12, 1960]

MOTIVES BEHIND THE RATE CUT—SOME SEE POLITICS IN FED'S POLICY

(By Frank C. Porter)

The motives behind the Federal Reserve Board's authorization of a cut in the rediscount rate from 3½ to 3 percent at four Federal Reserve banks yesterday will be hotly debated on Wall Street today.

The burning question: Was the action a technical adjustment to market rates, as the Fed said it was, or did the fine hand of election-year politics enter into the decision?

The Reserve Board could point to the near collapse of Treasury bill rates earlier in the year to support the adjustment theory. In June the Board dropped the rediscount rate, the amount of interest member banks pay on loans from the Fed, from 4 to 3½ percent after Treasury bill yields fell two full points. Even at 3 percent the rediscount rate is considerably above the roughly 2¼-percent rate on Treasury bills that has prevailed lately.

But others see the Reserve Board in an all-out assault upon the bank prime rate, the interest that commercial bankers charge their biggest customers with the best credit rating. All other business borrowing costs are scaled upward from the prime rate.

The whole direction of the Eisenhower administration's monetary policy in the past 2 months has been toward easing credit, ostensibly to counter what Prentice-Hall calls the slow petering out of the 1958–60 business boom. In addition to the rediscount rate cut in June, the FRB reduced stock margins from 90 to 70 percent last month and added an estimated $3 billion to bank lending power earlier this week by cutting some reserve requirements.

But the bank prime rate hasn't budged. Bankers still insist they are fairly well loaned up, they still haven't enough funds to satisfy all their customers' demands at present rates.

The further cut in the rediscount rate puts it two full points below the prime rate, an historically high spread. After the Board's action yesterday, a spokesman for a large New York bank said, "All pressures are in the direction of a cut in the prime rate. Someone will break tomorrow or the next day or so and then all will have to follow."

Economists both within and without the administration have been dismayed that the predicted 1960 upsurge never materialized, that instead a progressive deterioration of business activity seems to have set in.

Lower interest rates and greater availability of credit are antidoes to such a situation; they pump new life into the economy.

Some observers claim the administration has acted quicker to ease credit restrictions than they might have otherwise because this is an election year. A full-fledged recession by November wouldn't help the Republicans.

"The problem for NIXON is whether he's to be in the White House or the dog house," Eliot Janeway, New York economist, says, "His own people have been telling him he'll be Hooverized if the slump continues into the fall."

Janeway wrote as far back as last March that "NIXON is now pressing the administration to open the valve, and let it [money] pour out again." He also claims today that "the real heavy artillery in the financial and industrial community has been pressuring the Government to take the text books away from the Federal Reserve and the Treasury and turn the economy around."

The Federal Reserve System is not usually given to explaining its actions. It has however, cited lessened inflationary pressures and the usual fall upturn in money demands as reasons for its recent moves toward easier credit. If it's worried about a recession, it isn't talking about it. Just last month, for example, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York predicted an expansion of business activity through the rest of the year.

CREDIT POLICY CHANGES LINKED TO FAST EXCESSES

(By Harold B. Dorsey)

It is of more than passing significance that within the past 10 weeks the Federal Reserve has reduced the discount rate from 4 percent to 3 percent (in two steps), that it has reduced the margin requirement on stock market borrowing, and that it took steps to increase the commercial bank credit base by approximately $600 million which would permit the banks to expand their loans and investments by about $3.6 billion.

Obviously, the combination of these developments portrays a shift of national credit policies toward greater availability of credit and lower interest rates. From the viewpoint of business analysis, we are interested in the reasons for this shift. We must make our own interpretations because, for various good reasons, the Federal Reserve officials cannot be expected to submit detailed explanations.

For one thing, the shift reflects a clear-cut swing away from the fear of inflation. The developments of the past 7 months have made it quite clear that there is a more-than-ample supply of practically everything. Buyers are resisting higher prices, and, in some instances, their sluggish demand has created a pressure for lower prices.

Although personal disposable income in the first half of the year recorded a 5-percent gain over a year earlier, personal consumption expenditures for durable and nondurable goods increased only 2.8 percent and expenditures for new residential construction declined 6.4 percent. Expenditures for services, however, increased by 7.8 percent. Thus a disproportionate amount of the increased purchasing power shifted from the buying of tangible things over to services that do not move tangible goods.

Many of the important business measurements are based on the movement of tangible goods, and since they didn't move according to anticipations, inventories have piled up. This explains why inflationary pressures on commodity prices have subsided.

In turn, we can see the reason why the demand for credit to buy things has lessened, and, again in turn, why interest rates have gone into a downward trend. The reductions in the Federal Reserve discount rate were a reflection of this chain of events.

The sequence can be continued. The inability of business to raise prices because of the slackening in the demand for goods is causing a contraction of profit margins. The resulting failure of earnings to record the improvement that had earlier been anticipated reduced the demand for common stocks, which removed the inflationary force from that sector. That is probably the primary reason why the Federal Reserve saw fit to reduce the restrictions against borrowing on common stock collateral.

Although the current level of business capital expenditures is still quite good, business analysis anticipate that the contracting profit margins, and the underlying reasons for the contraction, will probably reduce the enthusiasm of business to further increase its investment in plant and equipment. This suggests less need for credit later on.

The slackening, and threatened slackening, of activity in the durable goods sector of the economy is probably one of the primary reasons why the Federal Reserve has seen fit to increase the quantity of credit available to the commercial banks for lending and investing. The Fed doesn't want a business setback any more than anybody else, so naturally they do not want the economy to suffer from a shortage of available credit.

But all of this creates an awkward position in respect to our international financial position. Months ago it was pointed out in this column that the liquid financial balances of foreigners in this country were very high and that some significant portion of these funds would only be held in our system as long as our interest rates were as high or higher than these creditors could obtain abroad. Our interest rates are now lower than those obtainable abroad, and the funds are flowing out, as reflected in the outflow of gold in recent weeks.

This entire situation can scarcely be looked upon with complacency. The whole thing is a very natural result of the excesses which overstimulated our economy in recent years—borrowing and spending, increases in labor costs, and an expansion of facilities for production and distribution, each feeding on the other. These excesses appeared to be prosperity while they were causing abnormal spending activity, but it now is becoming clearer that they were really eroding the fundamental strength of the economy.

THE VICE PRESIDENT AND SECRETARY BENSON

Mr. HUMPHREY. I wish to address myself to a comment which was reported in the press over the weekend, and on the WMAL Radio–TV broadcast at 11 p.m., on Sunday, August 14. The news broadcast gave to the listening audience a review of the Vice President's trip to Portland, Maine, on the occasion of the 200th anniversary of the founding of Cumberland County, in which Portland is located.

The Vice President on his visit to the wonderful State of Maine addressed himself to subjects which were allegedly nonpartisan. Later, of course, as was to be expected, he held a press, radio-television news conference. It was from that news conference that the report came to us that the Vice President had said in substance that he had been urging a new approach in the farm policy area, that he had been arguing for a new point of view, but now that he is a candidate in his own right he is dissociating himself from the Eisenhower-Benson farm program. He was quizzed as to his attitude relating to the farm question, because Maine is one of the great agricultural States of the Union, and the people of Maine have a keen interest in agricultural policy.

This is a very interesting attitude on the part of the Vice President. It is one thing for a man to disagree on matters of public policy and program, but it is another thing for him to attempt to dissociate himself from those who have enunciated that policy and program while he was a part of the "team."

cultural attitudes. He has occasionally made a sortie or two into Minnesota. He has given us the benefit of his counsel and advice, which we have happily rejected.

I have noticed, also, that he even visited the State of the Presiding Officer. I may say to the distinguished Senator who now occupies the Vice President's chair, which should be occupied by the Vice President, that the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK] would not be in that chair if the people of North Dakota had listened to the Vice President. This will not be the only time that the people have not listened to the Vice President. There will be a deathly indifference on November 8 insofar as listening to the Vice President is concerned.

However, I wish to get back to the record of the Vice President, who now would have the people in Maine—and would have the people of North Dakota and, I suppose, of Minnesota, and of all the great agricultural States—believe that somehow or other he, Mr. RICHARD MILHOUS NIXON, was always on the "outs," so to speak, with Mr. Benson.

Of course, the Vice President has run the statistics through the political IBM machine, and he has found that Mr. Benson is supposed to be unpopular.

I want to say a word for Mr. Benson. Mr. Benson's farm policies may be unpopular—and they are not only unpopular, but unworkable, and not only unworkable, but tragically ineffective and costly—but Mr. Benson has the respect of many of us. I do not like to see people turning their backs upon one who has been such a close associate of theirs. It is one thing for a member of the Democratic Party to rebuke or repudiate Mr. Benson, because we did not hire him in the first place, and he is not our hired man, and he was not appointed by a Democrat, but I notice that Mr. NIXON, when Mr. Benson seemed to have a little moment of popularity, was always seen standing at Mr. Benson's side for the pictures, as if to say, "This is one man I helped to select."

We have a pretty good documentation of these facts. Going back to 1953, on July 27, in Washington, Mr. NIXON said:

> Some people may not like Benson's farm program, but on the whole I believe the farmers feel that Benson is a fine, able man who is working his head off for the country.

Secretary Benson lost his head, apparently, in 1953, according to this statement.

What is the next statement of support of the Benson line? Here is one from Des Moines, Iowa, in 1954, as reported in the Des Moines Register. The dateline is April 21, 1954, and the article was published on April 22, 1954. Listen to this:

> Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson has a strong supporter in Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON. * * * In his formal address [before the Iowa Farm Bureau] NIXON said of Benson:
> "I predict that the verdict of history will be that Secretary Benson has been one of the best Secretaries of Agriculture in our history, and that he was the friend of the farmer in the program that he advocated and put into practice."

Here was NIXON standing as the historian. I noticed that he had a group of scholars come out for him yesterday. I have not found out who they are. But here was NIXON the historian. In 1954, speaking as a historian and a prophet, he predicted that Benson would be one of the greatest Secretaries of Agriculture in history.

Now he goes up to Portland, Maine, and out to Minot, N. Dak., and starts wiggling and wobbling and ducking, hoping somehow that Benson will not be around. [Laughter.] It is like the song about the little shadow that was always there.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. KERR. Is there any resemblance between this act of the Vice President, which the Senator from Minnesota has so ably described, and the one in which he first seemed to form an association with, and later dissociated himself from, the Soviet Prime Minister?

Mr. HUMPHREY. There might be some relationship there.

Mr. KERR. It seemed that for a while he was running for office on the basis of how well he could get along with him, and then later on the basis of how well he could not.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator's observations have a degree of accuracy and relevancy which certainly lend themselves to acceptance.

Mr. KERR. I knew the Senator from Minnesota was an expert in both fields, and the Senator from Oklahoma is not. What the Senator from Oklahoma had seen indicated that to him, and he is glad to have the assurance of the Senator from Minnesota that there is basis for the comparison.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma. I shall point out that the record is so clear that I thought someone on this side of the aisle ought to speak up almost in defense of Mr. Benson. Mr. Benson has his limitations. Mr. Benson certainly never should have been Secretary of Agriculture. He never should have been entrusted with the responsibility of supervising that big Department. But I do not believe it smacks very well, and it does not show a great deal of courage or even good politics on the part of Mr. NIXON, to be, first of all, embracing Ezra Taft Benson when it looks as if he is going strong, and then, when the facts are indisputable, when the economic facts of agriculture reveal the tragic failure of the administration's farm program, to which Mr. NIXON made his contributions, to try to dissociate himself from Mr. Benson.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator from Minnesota refers to the contribution which the Vice President made. I believe he had the opportunity to vote only seven times in 7 years, and one of those votes—a very crucial one—in which he had the power and the opportunity to break a tie, was a vote against the farmer and in favor of breaking down price supports, so that farm prices could go still lower.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. He was one of the Benson team at that time and broke the tie for Benson in that vote.

Mr. HUMPHREY. He surely did.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I was hoping the Senator from New York would finally reach out for the bait. [Laughter.] Yes, I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I do not wish to impose on the time of the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, because I may want to document further some of the statements which the Senator from Minnesota is about to make, and I do not want to do it on his time. However, I wish to inquire of the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, who is always so engaging in the way he presents these matters, concerning a statement attributed to him in the May 9, 1960, Washington Post, in which he is reported to have said:

> KENNEDY voted against the people's interest in such issues as agriculture.

My inquiry is whether it was the contention of the Senator from Minnesota that his statement that KENNEDY's votes were against the people's interest in the field of agriculture were of more importance or less importance than the statements which the Vice President might have made on the subject.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I shall be happy to edify the great Senator from New York. I am sorry he did not listen to the television program in which I was privileged to participate yesterday, "College Press Conference." Had he done so, he would have the answer, because one of the college students used the same quotation, which is one that the Republican National Committee had prepared. I congratulate the Republican National Committee for their research.

I expect to come here in a few days, I may add, with speeches which they have written for all the speechmakers throughout the country. They will be very interesting.

To get back to the Senator's observation, the Senator from Minnesota engaged in a couple of primary contests with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and the record is quite clear that I lost both of them. In those contests, I did the best I could to present my side of the case. The Senator from Massachusetts did the best he could to present his. He did a better job, apparently.

When it comes to the issue of agriculture, I think I have a record superior to that of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and a record far superior to that of the Vice President, for from the first day I entered the U.S. Senate I have been working for economic justice for farmers.

But I shall say for the great Senator from Massachusetts that when he found that some of the votes he had cast were not in the best interests of the Nation as a whole, including farmers, that the Benson program did not react as it had been described, and that it did not produce the results it was claimed would follow, the courage of his convictions was strong enough that he changed course. He had the courage to follow a new course, and to do it with vigor, vitality, courage, and consistency. He did not wait around until almost election day, and then try to repudiate one of his best friends.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Oh, I shall be glad to yield in just a moment. Do not get excited. There are lots of them. [Laughter.]

I simply want to say to my good friends on the other side of the aisle that they can wiggle, wobble, duck, and bob; they can do everything they want for NIXON and Benson; but they are stuck with them, and they know it. They know the farm people of the country will repudiate them. They know the farmers of America have "had it." They have "had it" from a Republican administration that promised them 100 percent of parity, started to give them 90 percent of parity, abandonded that, and have now come down to 70 percent of parity and less. The farmers are now in grave trouble.

The point is that the Presiding Officer of the Senate, who should be here, but is not here—the Vice President of the United States—has embraced this program from the beginning to the end, alpha to omega, almost. Now he wants to drop omega. But he has been an important part of this activity all the way. He has sat in the Cabinet meetings. He has been in the high legislative councils. He has worked, proposed, and helped in every way to foist upon the farm people of America the Eisenhower-Benson-Nixon farm program. It does not work. It is a flop. It is a failure. It costs the taxpayers more than $6 billion a year.

Mr. NIXON now wants to be President of the United States, but first he has got to get rid of that spot. He is like Lady Macbeth, who said, "Out, damned spot." But the spot is still there. He cannot get rid of it, and he could not get rid of it in Maine, North Dakota, and Minnesota.

Now if any of my friends on the other side of the aisle want to come in, I will yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Minnesota who said this——

Mr. HUMPHREY. Most likely it was Senator HUMPHREY. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. I shall read the quotation anyway:

> KENNEDY voted against the people's interest on such issues as agriculture, rural telephone assistance, and library, highway, and hospital construction.

That statement appeared in the Washington Post of May 9, 1960.

The question is, Who said that? I will now allow the Senator from Minnesota, in a few thousand well-chosen words, to reply. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. I may say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I shall not even need a few thousand Republican words—and those were not well chosen ones—to answer the question.

What the Senator from Minnesota was attempting to do at that time was apparently what Mr. NIXON is trying to get by with now, and he is going to have the same results. [Laughter.] The Senator from Minnesota was attempting to make a fairly good case for himself, but it did not work. The only thing is that I had some evidence; NIXON has none. He is caught. He has been living in the house of Republican agricultural economics, and he is caught in there. The termites are eating out the foundation. The house is wiggly and wobbly, and the folks do not want to come in, and they are not ready to come in.

Let me say one other good thing for the edification of my friends on the other side of the aisle, because I realize the Republican National Committee is having a little conference about more things we have said. But I assure my friends on the Republican National Committee that in connection with any statement they may bring forth about the voting record of my Democratic colleagues, if they select the voting record of a Senator over on this side of the aisle that, from my point of view, is as wrong as it can be, NIXON can trump it every time, because the Nixon voting record as a Member of the House of Representatives and as a Senator and his advice as a Vice President add up to a great, glorious zero to American agriculture. We are going to hold him to it; the feet will be held to the fire, and we will even keep a little heat right on the brow. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me, to permit me to make a brief comment?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes, indeed.

Mr. KEATING. I note that the Senator from Minnesota, with his usual candor, stated on May 9 that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] had voted against the people's interest. Apparently, he has now changed his point of view. The Senator from Massachusetts is to be exonerated.

Let me ask the Senator, has the Senator from Minnesota exonerated the Senator from Massachusetts from that statement or decided that he should now be exonerated because he changed his mind?

The Senator has pointed out that the Vice President has said that his misgivings began to arise in 1955. However, I want to ask the Senator from Minnesota, because he seems to be well versed in the policies of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, whether the Senator from Massachusetts has again changed his mind with regard to the farm program, in that in July he promised "to introduce in Congress next month an emergency farm bill which would guarantee farmers full parity income."

First, I wish to ask the Senator whether he knows whether the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has introduced such a bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator does not need to introduce it, because his good friend, Senator HUMPHREY, has such a bill in the Congress, and KENNEDY and HUMPHREY are working together now, let me say, for the orderly displacement of the Republicans out of these positions of responsibility. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate that frank statement, because I know the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has not yet offered such a bill, and let me point out that in the same statement he said that next January would be too late.

It has now been announced by the chairman of the House Agriculture Committee that the leadership feels that it is not feasible to increase support prices this late in the season. This would appear to me to be somewhat of a shift in position, again, by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

The Senator from Minnesota, due to his intimacy with the Senator from Massachusetts, may have some views as to whether the Senator from Massachusetts has, indeed, again changed his view with regard to the timing of farm legislation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I appreciate the solicitous concern of my beloved friend, the Senator from New York, as to the welfare of our presidential nominee and the Democratic Party. I can assure the Senator from New York that the Senator from Massachusetts is fully aware of the farm legislative situation. I can even assure the Senator from New York as to the exact words the Senator from Massachusetts said in July on this subject. He said:

> I will urge the cooperation of Representatives and Senators of both political parties to take emergency action to raise farm income immediately. Impelling evidence of the rapidly deteriorating farm income situation given to me and my staff by delegates and others from the great farm areas of our Nation indicates to me that many family farmers cannot afford to wait until next year for legislation that will reverse the continuing downward trend in farm income.

That is the basis of the quotations cited by the Senator from New York. The Senator from Massachusetts was and is aware of the foot-dragging that comes on the other side of the aisle on some of these important items. He is aware of the farm income-improving bills that are before the Committee on Agriculture. He is in support of the full Democratic platform. And since the Senator from New York will be here, with us, during the next term—for he is not one of those who is so unfortunate, as a Republican, to come up for reelection this year—he will be here to cast his vote for the Kennedy farm program as it is placed before the Congress of the United States. And if my friends on the other side of the aisle will "get off my back," I will get reelected in Minnesota and will be back here to vote for it, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield for a comment?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. The Senator from Massachusetts has said that next January would be too late. I wonder whether the Senator from Minnesota agrees that this is so, and furthermore whether he feels the Senator from Massachusetts should now assert his leadership, to get the chairmen of the Senate and House Agriculture Committees to report out a bill for consideration at this session?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Massachusetts will speak for himself on this. Of course, this session is not over. But I wish to say that no matter what farm bill is passed here, if it would raise the price of a farm commodity as much as 1 cent, it would be vetoed. We have gone through that; we have been up the hill and down the hill. My delightful friends on the other side of the aisle are great at interpreting and pantomiming; but I wish to remind them that since 1953, five farm bills have been passed, and five farm bills have been vetoed.

We have enough work to do here, besides giving the President the job of seeing how often he can append to a bill a veto message that has been prepared by Mr. Benson.

I am aware that if there is to be a new agricultural bill, it will have to await the election of a new President and the appointment of a new Secretary of Agriculture and the assurance of a good working majority in both Houses of Congress.

If the Senator from New York wishes to pledge his support of that program, we will welcome him into the household of the righteous and the faithful. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEATING. But I may agree with the Senator that that would be too late——

Mr. HUMPHREY. I doubt that it would be too late. If we can just keep the Secretary of Agriculture out of town enough, it will not be too late. [Laughter.]

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am happy to yield to my friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. COTTON. The distinguished Senator from Minnesota knows how much I admire him.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes. [Laughter.]

Mr. COTTON. And he is one of the greatest mathematicians in the world.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COTTON. So I was interested in hearing him say two things: First, he implied that the purpose of this bill, which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] and my good friend the Senator from Minnesota, are working on, is the orderly displacement of Republicans. He did not say it is to help the farmers get Republicans out.

Mr. HUMPHREY. If the Senator from New Hampshire will stop at that point for a moment, I would not want my good friend in any way to be deceived or not to have heard accurately what I said. The bill we are working on is for the orderly well-being of the farmers of America; and I was of the opinion that I had associated myself with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] for the orderly displacement of the Republicans who are not working for the orderly well-being of the farmers. I hope that is clear.

Mr. COTTON. I was quite sure the Senator must have meant that.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I appreciate the concern of the Senator from New Hampshire; it is very nice of him.

Mr. COTTON. In the second place, and here is where the mathematics comes in, I was interested in hearing the Senator from Minnesota say he wanted to wait until next January—not do it now, but wait until the Democrats had a working majority. I am wondering how many the Democrats need for a working majority. Today, they have 66 Members of the Senate.

Mr. HUMPHREY. May I make a suggestion?

Mr. COTTON. First, let me say—and then I shall not interrupt any more—that surely there is one thing that I am confident the distinguished and fine Senator from Minnesota and all his colleagues will do; they will see to it that at least we keep one or two Republicans in the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes.

Mr. COTTON. Because so long as there is one Republican among the 100 Senators, they will have someone on whom to blame everything that happens, so that they can capitalize on it with the people. I only hope the Senator from Minnesota loves me so much that he will let me be that one Republican. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. Let me say to my good friend from New Hampshire that my affection for him is so sincere that I would be glad to keep him as the one Republican for all to see. In fact, I think we need two—one in the Smithsonian and one here in the Senate. [Laughter.]

You know, Mr. President, it appears to me that our Republican friends are oversensitive as to what constitutes majorities in the Congress.

While a majority in the Congress is important, when you want a program put into effect, the man who occupies the White House is a little more important. The absence of Executive leadership during the past 7½ years should not convince anyone that the Presidency is without influence or power.

We on this side of the aisle are conscious of the powers of the Executive, the ability of the Executive, if he wishes, to exercise that power to place before us a program and utilize the tremendous power of that office to get a program through. We have seen it under Democratic administrations.

It has been some years since that has happened. I can understand the lapse of memory. We have not had that kind of leadership since 1952. But it will come again, January next year, and my Republican colleagues and friends will once again see in American Government how when the executive branch under a Democratic President designs proposals and does more than merely pronounce them—it effectuates them. One of those fields of action will be in the field of agriculture.

I see the minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] is here now. This is going to get better. We are going to have a few more observations on Mr. NIXON'S new interest for an agricultural program and his disaffection, for the moment at least, with Mr. Benson.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes, I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. May I leave to see a constituent?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes; the Senator may go. [Laughter.]

I yield to the Senator from Louisiana until the minority leader has an opportunity to return to the fray.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. It seems to me, in these partisan quarters, we southern Democrats can be somewhat impartial.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is right.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. After all, we can afford to be statesmen about these matters; no matter which side is in, neither side wants us.

As a matter of fact, when the Senator from Massachusetts cast a vote some years ago which seemed to be one along Mr. Benson's line of thinking, he was voting as a Senator from Massachusetts, an industrial State. The sales line was that high farm prices would cost the housewife more for her food than she bought at the store. Subsequently, he was voting for the farmers, even though that sales line was being put out.

Is it not true that there is a difference between voting as a Senator representing an industrial State and being the Vice President, who should represent not only an industrial State, but the country at large?

Mr. HUMPHREY. When the Democratic nominees are President and Vice President of the United States, which will be only a few months from now, may I say to our tired and waiting citizenry, a farm program will be placed before this Congress, and it will be based on our platform. It will be vigorously supported by the President of the United States and those who are responsible for the administration.

Mr. President, we know almost everyone has sinned, and there is rejoicing always in heaven for the repentance of one sinner; but it is the one who has sinned and denies it that causes man and God to be disturbed.

Mr. President, there is not any doubt that votes have been cast by Members of Congress, when they were Members of the House or Members of this body, that they would like to do over, so to speak. The important thing is whether one learns or stubbornly persists in his error and then starts to shift just a little bit for the political purposes of an election.

The important thing in this discussion is that the nominee of the Democratic Party has fully embraced the platform. He has a record of performance. He has recognized that at times he may have erred in judgment. He has presented to the American people a plan of action and a program to which he is committed. This program will produce results—at least, that is our conviction.

But now, Mr. President, I want to go back to this nice little interview, indicating that the Vice President is dissociating himself from the Secretary of Agriculture. I notice that in 1955, in

Wabash, Ind., Mr. NIXON endorsed the Benson thesis that lower prices would be the salvation of the farmers and the small business establishments and the economy of this great farm country. In the New York Herald Tribune there was reported a speech Mr. NIXON delivered, and the article stated that he supported "Benson's thesis that the administration program of flexible price supports can achieve prosperity on the farm in peacetime."

Here we find that in 1956, as reported in the New York Times:

Mr. NIXON was given several opportunities during the news conference (in Dayton, Ohio), to state whether he regarded Mr. Benson as an asset or a liability. But he reiterated his belief that farmers would support the administration's farm program because "our approach to the problem is the right one in the long run."

Mr. NIXON thought in 1956 the administration approach was the right one in the long run. He did not start to repudiate or to dissociate himself from the Benson program then.

On the contrary, as reported in the New York Post of October 18, 1956, at the TV press conference of national college editors at Cornell, Mr. NIXON had something to say, in reference to the agricultural situation, on Mr. Benson. I read from that article:

The object of the Vice-Presidential wrath was Andrew D. Kopkind, editor of the Cornell Sun. He had heard it said that NIXON makes it a policy never to mention Agriculture Secretary Benson. So on the air, Kopkind asked NIXON what he thought of Benson's farm policy and whether he favored getting rid of Benson. NIXON answered that the Eisenhower farm policy was dandy. He never mentioned Benson.

When the questioning continued after the broadcast, Kopkind politely pointed out that the Vice President hadn't answered the question, and he repeated it. NIXON flushed with anger. "Sit down," he ordered peremptorily. The editors hissed him.

After the formal meeting had ended, Kopkind was overheard to ask the Vice President again, this time off the record, whether he would keep Benson.

"Strictly off the record," NIXON replied, "I would."

That is just one newspaper's report. I do not say this would be admissible evidence in a court, but at least it was quoted.

Here is one before the American Society of Newspaper Editors, in Washington, D.C., on April 23, 1960.

With regard to the differences with Secretary Benson as far as my position and that of the administration is concerned, I think the first requirement for a Vice President is to support the policies of the President and the policies of the President's Cabinet where they have been approved by the President.

That was a nice statement. I appreciated that. It seems to me that is the kind of statement Mr. NIXON ought to adhere to right now. He is still part of the team.

I have a few other observations. Mr. NIXON had something to say about Mr. Benson at Columbus, Nebr., at the corn-picking contest on October 12, 1956. This was before he started to disassociate himself, according to the recent report:

NIXON urged farmers to put their faith in the administration program.

Any man who did that should not be elected to the Presidency. This disqualifies him, way back in 1956.

That includes flexible price supports, a soil-bank plan under which farmers can qualify for benefits by taking some land out of production, and efforts to increase markets for farm products.

This program, NIXON said, "is working and will continue to work because it cuts right to the heart of the problem."

Mr. President, in 1956, in Minneapolis, Minn., the Vice President of the United States said:

There is no objective to which President Eisenhower is more dedicated than to see that this trend continues until the farmers of America are receiving their fair share of our unparalleled prosperity.

In conclusion, the Vice President of the United States, in an interview, on "Open End," on May 15 of this year, stated:

I think that Secretary Benson has been as dedicated a man in working for the interest of the farmers as he saw it, as any Secretary we have ever had.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the Vice President of the United States has a responsibility for this program. He was a part of it. As the Secretary of Agriculture said some months ago, he was one of the architects of the program.

The Secretary of Agriculture, who has a sense of personal integrity, made comments on the "Meet the Press" program of January 17, 1960. He was asked a question by Mr. Spivak:

In a recent statement in the New York Herald Tribune, you were quoted as saying that Vice President NIXON helped to develop the administration's farm program. What does that mean, that he actively took part in the development of your farm program, or simply that he didn't oppose it?

Secretary Benson said:

There have been many discussions, of course. We have discussions with the legislative leaders, we have discussions with the Cabinet, when we are developing and proposing modifications of our farm policy and our farm program, and, of course, Vice President NIXON is a prominent part of both of those meetings, both in the Cabinet and with the legislative leaders.

He was again asked, by Mr. Spivak:

Would you feel then that he is committed to campaigning for your program since he took an active part in the development of the program?

Secretary Benson said:

I would expect that he would support the program in the campaign.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The record is clear on this matter now. I have a feeling that all of the false promises of recent years, such as the one at Kasson, Minn., in 1952, will not be listened to by the farm people in this election.

I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to congratulate the Senator from Minnesota for "laying it on the line" with respect to Mr. NIXON, Mr. Benson, and the farm program.

I should like to ask the Senator if one of the reasons why he did this today is that we have been advised that the opponents to the pending bill will not permit any amendment to come to a vote, so we might as well talk about something, since we cannot get action on the minimum wage bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I have been so advised. I have heard that.

Regardless of that, I feel that these matters are worthy of public discussion. This is the greatest forum in America—the forum of the U.S. Senate. We have often engaged in great debates.

My friends of the opposition have joined in the fray. They have had a chance to bring out the Republican National Committee "fiction book." I shall bring in several more chapters, as published by the Republicans.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Would the Senator not be willing to enter into an informal compact—to which I should be happy to be a party, as I believe would most Members on this side of the aisle—that we will stop giving Mr. Benson and Mr. NIXON the dickens as soon as the opposition is willing to let us vote on the pending bill—at least, temporarily?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am perfectly willing to give Mr. NIXON Mr. Benson at any time. He has him. They belong together. They are kinfolk. They are political blood cousins.

I want them to be together. It would be a fine time to proceed with the pending bill. It is a good bill as reported by the committee. Some modifications may be required. We can act on those rather readily.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before my friend from Pennsylvania leaves?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am wondering how naive my distinguished friend from the City of Brotherly Love can really be.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator should know by now. We have spent 4 years together. The Senator knows that I am terribly naive, while he, of course, is very sophisticated.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Senator has spoken about the legislation being bogged down. I even asked the Senator from Minnesota if I could go outside the Chamber to see a constituent.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I gave my consent.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There are 66 warriors on the other side of the aisle, while we have only 34.

Mr. CLARK. We cannot get to a vote.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Are the Democrats running the Senate, or are we running the Senate?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator could have made a worse choice than to let us run it.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I will yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota to yield for a clarification.

My recollection is—and it is quite distinct—that the Senator who stated there would be no votes today was the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND]. Personally, I am ready to vote today on any of these amendments or on anything else. I am sure most of us are. There may be one or two exceptions on this side of the aisle. For the most part we are ready to vote today. As I understand the situation, the Senator from Florida insists that his amendment not be voted on until tomorrow.

Mr. CLARK. What is the matter with considering the other amendments? I understand there are 32 on the other side of the aisle.

Mr. KEATING. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Florida, and the Senator has requested that we not vote on it until tomorrow. That is my understanding. I am willing to vote today.

Mr. DIRKSEN. We cannot even offer our amendments.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I believe the observation of the Senator may be correct. I have no objection to any Senator desiring to have an adequate time to discuss his amendment. As a matter of fact, I think a certain public service was performed today, because this situation gave me an opportunity to again sort of explore the travels of Mr. NIXON in and out of the Benson regime. I thought this was worth while. I thank all Senators for being so cooperative.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will send the Senator a post card, to find out when we can arrange to get a vote on the first amendment which is offered from this side of the aisle.

Mr. HUMPHREY. No man in this body, really, has more influence than the minority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HUMPHREY. He is a very persuasive man. However, I have a feeling that if the minority leader would really like to get a vote on the pending wage and hour bill he would find plenty of cooperation. But the minority leader sometimes must leave the Chamber. The Senator asks for permission to go. While he is gone, things can get out of hand.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not take those flattering remarks from the RECORD.

Mr. HUMPHREY. They will be in the RECORD.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Because I wish to use them.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I shall be glad even to put them in capital letters.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oklahoma will yield, I know the Senator plans to make a very important address, and I should like to have the Senator yield to me without losing his right to the floor, so that I may suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I will say to my good friend from Illinois that I would appreciate it, but I understand the Senator from New York would like to have me yield to him so that he may make a few remarks.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I shall be glad to withhold my request.

Mr. KERR. Does the Senator from New York desire to have me yield?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from New York for a few remarks, without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE PRESIDENT'S REQUESTS FOR LEGISLATIVE ACTION

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, we have had a lot of discussion with regard to the possibility of a farm bill being before us in this session, since it is an important piece of proposed legislation. Obviously the appropriation bills are the most urgent.

There has been a great effort to create the impression that this special session of Congress was called to enact a specific and limited legislative program. This is not a fact, and there is no reason whatever to limit the activities of this Congress to anyone's predetermined list of what we have time for.

No particular agenda has any unique sanctity. I believe that we should stay on the job until all of the urgent legislative business of the Congress is concluded. Nor should any special sanctity be attributed to the Labor Day target date for adjournment. If we are sincere in our desire and firm in our determination to attend to the people's business during this special session, certainly we ought to take the few extra weeks necessary to do a thorough and competent job. We should neither attempt to ram some far-reaching bills through without proper consideration, nor should we refuse to allow even a moment for debate and action on other bills.

In many ways this is the most propitious moment for action on a large number of legislative items. Three-fourths of the national ticket of both parties, and both party chairmen, sit in this Chamber. No matter which party wins in November, perhaps never again will there be such a splendid opportunity for these men to exercise their leadership and responsibilities in this Chamber to fulfill the promises made in the respective party platforms.

The point must also be made that there are a number of subjects discussed in the party platforms on which the two parties are in a large measure of agreement. One such subject is civil rights, and that is one of the reasons I personally believe that civil rights should be on everyone's must agenda for this session. Last week I spoke on another subject on which, in my opinion, there should be no partisan division—namely, the question of adequate staffing of the Federal courts so that justice in this country can be administered without unconscionable delay.

Today, I would like to comment briefly on a third topic on which both platforms express themselves unequivocally in favor of new legislation—and that is the subject of our immigration laws.

In his special message at the opening of this session, President Eisenhower listed liberalization of our immigration laws as one of the subjects on which Congress should act. In doing so, he was merely echoing the promises expressed in both party platforms.

No one who is familiar with the President's record in this field would dare charge that his interest in liberalizing our immigration laws is new or belated. Such a charge would be completely baseless, and would be nothing more than an attempt to cover up for the failure on the part of Congress to do anything substantial to reform our immigration laws, despite repeated administration pleas for revision.

Let me briefly review the actions which the President has taken in this field since 1953.

On February 2, 1953, within 1 month after taking office, the President, in his state of the Union message, requested the Congress to review existing legislation in this field and to "enact a statute which would at one and the same time guard our legitimate national interests and be faithful to our basic ideas of freedom and fairness to all."

This message reminded us that "we are—one and all—immigrants or the sons and daughters of immigrants." It pointed out that existing legislation contained injustices and did in fact discriminate.

Later that same year, on April 22, 1953, the President sent a letter to the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in which he recommended the enactment of emergency immigration legislation for the special admission of a total of 240,000 immigrants.

On February 17, 1954, the President requested supplemental appropriations to continue the refugee relief program.

On January 6, 1955, in his state of the Union address, the President again urged the correction of certain inequitable and discriminatory provisions in our immigration laws.

On April 20, 1955, the President transmitted a message to the Congress on the mutual security program which contained his request for funds for the United Nations and the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration for the purpose of carrying on their humanitarian assistance to uprooted and oppressed refugees throughout the world.

On May 27, 1955, the President, in a most comprehensive message, suggested approximately 10 changes to the Refugee Relief Act.

On January 5, 1956, in his state of the Union message, the President again demanded immediate attention to our immigration problem and requested a revision of our immigration and nationality laws which would deal realistically with present-day conditions.

On February 8, 1956, the President delivered a special message to the Congress which again was a comprehensive statement on the need for a major overhauling of our immigration laws.

This message took up four separate and distinct subject matters respecting our immigration policies: First, the quota system and the use of national origins; second, the private relief bill system of handling hardship cases; third, unnecessary restrictions and administrative provisions of our immigration laws; and fourth, judicial review in deportation.

In this message the President said:

> Experience in the postwar world demonstrates that the present national origins method of admitting aliens needs to be reexamined and a new system adopted which will admit aliens within allowable numbers according to new guidelines and standards.

On September 25, 1956, the President addressed a letter to me as the ranking minority member of the House Judiciary Committee, wherein he expressed great disappointment over the failure of Congress to meet his repeated requests for legislation which would provide asylum for a substantial number of refugees and escapees in Europe. He expressed hope, however, that this much-needed legislation would be forthcoming in the next session of Congress and stated that he would again urge its enactment.

In the President's budget message of 1957, the President again requested amounts for escapee programs and for contributions to the Governmental Committee for European Immigration and the United Nations Refugee Fund, which aid in the relief and settlement of refugees from behind the Iron Curtain and in immigration from Europe.

On May 23, 1957, the President, in a message to the Congress, once again urged corrective legislation to alleviate the tremendous refugee problem existing throughout the world. And, in this same message, the President again urged that the quota be based on the 1950 population in place of the 1920 census. He called for the equitable distribution of the additional quota numbers and recommended that they be distributed among the various countries in proportion to the actual immigration in the United States since the establishment of the quota system in 1924 and up to July 1, 1955. He further recommended that quota numbers unused one year should be available for use in the following year. He called for a pool of the unused quota numbers for Europe, Africa, Asia, and the Pacific oceanic areas. He also made recommendations that would eliminate the so-called mortgage on quotas arrangement existing under the Displaced Persons Act. In addition, he noted the need for proper alien orphan adoption legislation, together with several other liberalizing features on our immigration policy.

On May 21, 1957, in a message to the Congress, the President further urged contributions to the United Nations and other international programs in the field of technical operation, assistance to refugees, migrants, children's welfare, and assistance to escapees from Communist despotism.

On March 13, 1959, the President again called for funds to continue the just-mentioned programs.

On May 21, 1959, the President held a conference at the White House on refugee problems and cited this country's role in the World Refugee Year.

On January 18, 1960, in his budget message for 1961, the President again requested funds to continue his mutual security program.

Finally on March 17 of this year, the President, in a special message to Congress dealing solely with the subject of immigration, again strongly urged major revision of our immigration laws.

This special message urged for immediate action the following modifications in our basic immigration law:

First. The removal of the ceiling of 2,000 on quotas within the Asiatic-Pacific triangle;

Second. The basing of the overall limitation on immigration on the 1960 census as soon as it is available in place of that of 1920 which is the present base;

Third. The annual acceptance of one-sixth of 1 percent of our total population;

Fourth. Abandonment of the concept of race and ethnic classifications within our population, at least for the purposes of the increases in quotas recommended, by substituting as the base for computation the number of immigrants actually accepted from each area between 1924 and 1959;

Fifth. The distribution of unused quotas of undersubscribed countries distributed among oversubscribed countries. This distribution should be in proportion to the quotas of the oversubscribed countries.

These recommendations are contained in a bill—S. 3225—which was introduced by the distinguished minority leader for himself and a number of other Members on both sides of the aisle. I was privileged to be one of its cosponsors. The bill is now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary and could be acted upon at any time. Only its provisions dealing with refugee relief have received any attention at all, and even in this area the legislation finally passed by Congress fell far short of the President's proposals.

I believe that every effort should be made during this special session to enact at least a portion of these recommendations. None of the President's proposals would in any sense open the floodgates or remove any reasonable limitations on the entry of new immigrants into our country. They would, however, serve to eliminate from our present immigration laws a number of unjustified and discriminatory provisions which have marred our immigration policies for many years. These provisions display a distrust and isolationism toward other peoples which is wholly inconsistent with our heritage as a nation of immigrants, and with our espousal of the ideas of freedom and equality.

Of the several proposals contained in the President's repeated messages on this subject, the two on which I believe action is imperative are: first, the basing of the overall limitation on immigration on the 1960 census as soon as it is available, rather than on the basis of the white population in our country in 1920, as is provided in the present law; and, second, the pooling and redistribution of any unused quota numbers for the benefit of areas which are heavily oversubscribed.

These are extremely modest changes, and do not begin to fulfill all of the promises in the two party platforms. Their approval, however, would show the good faith of both parties, and would at least be a partial satisfaction of the President's many urgent requests for changes in this field.

Whether these measures can be best advanced by the introduction of a separate bill, or by amendment to another bill which may be before us, or by action in the Judiciary Committee on S. 3225, or otherwise, is something which must be determined later. I am certain that a way will be found in which to bring this issue before the Congress before it adjourns.

I intend later this week to discuss in detail all of the President's requests for legislative action. I intend at that time to review for the record the President's position on each of these issues since the beginning of his administration. This review, I am confident, will demonstrate that the President has consistently and repeatedly over the years made proposals for the vital subjects listed in his special message. I hope that after this record is presented we will get down to the hard work that is necessary to complete the people's business and stop bickering and wrangling about whether any of these proposals are new election-year offerings.

SENATE COMMITTEE RAISES SOCIAL SECURITY EARNINGS LIMITATION

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, on June 27 I submitted two amendments to H.R. 12580, the Social Security Act passed by the House and reported Saturday by the Senate Finance Committee.

I understand the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] intends to discuss the action of the Senate Finance Committee in the field of social security legislation. I wish, first, to express my gratitude to the committee for the inclusion in their measure of the provisions of an amendment which I offered.

Both amendments relate to the so-called Social Security "retirement test" which says that if an individual earns in excess of $100 a month, he loses his Social Security benefit check for that month. My first amendment, followed my long standing feelings on this issue, calls for the complete elimination of the earnings limitation. This amendment is identical to a bill—S. 1168—which I have introduced in the Senate and which has been introduced in this same form by a number of Members of both bodies.

My second amendment is geared to the immediate situation and calls for raising the Social Security earnings limit to $1,800—that is, $150 a month.

It was my intention to offer both amendments on the floor when we considered H.R. 12580, and to bring either or both to a vote according to the reaction received.

Mr. President, as most of us know by now, the Senate Finance Committee amended H.R. 12580 in committee to raise the social security earnings limit to $1,800, the figure contained in my second amendment. I am delighted with this development, and intend to wholeheartedly support the committee's position on the floor of the Senate when this bill is taken up, and following a conference report on this provision, should the House not concur. I am still interested in seeing to it that the earnings limit is raised even further than $1,800—better yet removed altogether. I shall support any and all moves to further eliminate the unrealistic and arbitrary social security earnings limit which has for many years brought hardship and unhappiness to many retired persons between the ages of 65 and 72.

Mr. President, on a related subject, I note that the Senate Finance Committee made certain changes with regard to the health insurance for the aged provisions of H.R. 12580.

The considerable public attention focused on health insurance has made almost all of us aware of the need to do something in this area. Both political parties in their platforms have called for action. The President has outlined a program. Many bills have been introduced in Congress suggesting ways in which to approach the health and medical needs of our Nation's senior citizens. As I see it, the question is not whether we need a program in this area, but what is the best method by which to provide needed medical and health insurance assistance for the aged.

The Senate Committee version has been called a "complete betrayal" of the Democratic platform by a Democratic member of the committee. Where do we go from here?

Mr. President, time is limited, if, as the leadership has told us so many times, we are to adjourn by Labor Day. All that one can say about the progress which Congress has made with regard to the health insurance for the aged is that we are presently confronted with an atmosphere of unanimous and wholehearted disagreement.

For myself, I am prepared to seriously consider and evaluate any and all health insurance programs brought before the Senate for a vote and believe we should remain here until we do just that.

The 86th Congress was "treading water" for months before we recessed in July. We should not now suddenly be called upon to sprint while the old people of America grow still older and be called upon to do this without the benefit of the carefully and deliberate preliminary floor consideration so necessary to the effective working of the legislative process.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, without prejudicing the right of the Senator from Oklahoma, I may suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). Does the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I do not think we should rescind the order.

Mr. KERR. I withdraw my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request has been withdrawn. The clerk will continue to call the roll.

The legislative clerk resumed and concluded the call of the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS] are absent on official business.

I further announce that the Senators from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON and Mr. THURMOND] are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is absent, by leave of the Senate, on official business.

The Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

THE SOCIAL SECURITY AMENDMENTS OF 1960

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I rise to discuss the provisions of House bill 12580, being the Social Security Amendments of 1960, passed earlier this year by the House, and acted on by the Senate Finance Committee on Saturday of last week. I do so, Mr. President, for a number of reasons.

First, there has been an absence of accurate information made available to the public as to the provisions of the bill as ordered reported by the Senate Finance Committee.

Second, I do so because it has been said by sincere and honorable men that the language and provisions of the bill, as reported by the Senate Finance Committee, violate the expressed purposes of the Democratic platform adopted by our convention at Los Angeles in July.

I wish to read a few words from that platform:

MEDICAL CARE FOR OLDER PERSONS

Fifty million Americans—more than a fourth of our people—have no insurance protection against the high cost of illness. For the rest, private health insurance pays, on the average, only about one-third of the cost of medical care.

The problem is particularly acute among the 16 million Americans over 65 years old, and among disabled workers, widows, and orphans.

Most of these have low incomes and the elderly among them suffer two to three times as much illness as the rest of the population.

Mr. President, if I correctly understand the language of that platform, it sets forth one of the pertinent facts confronting the American people today, and that is that medical care and its cost are particularly acute, by reason of their need, among the 16 million Americans over 65 years old and among disabled workers, widows, and orphans.

Mr. President, in my judgment the bill, as agreed upon by the Finance Committee on Saturday, and as it will be before the Senate in a few days, when the committee has completed its work on formulating its report and bringing the bill to the Senate, will go a very long way in providing a sound opportunity for medical care for the 16 million Americans over 65 years of age and for disabled workers, widows, and orphans. In fact, Mr. President, if I correctly understand the provisions of this bill—and I think I do, because I was one of the authors of the amendment that was adopted—it will provide a program, in every State of the Union in which the individual State has or wants a medical-care program for its aged, whereby every aged person in each individual State can, under the provisions of a medical-care program approved by each State, have an adequate medical-care program.

It does not, Mr. President, adopt the method of paying for the program as specifically suggested by the language of the platform. But if I correctly understand the language of that platform, Mr. President, it only suggested what the drafters thought was the most available means of paying for such a program. I did not then, and I do not now, understand the language of that platform to put the premium on the method of paying for such a program. As I understand both the language and the principle of that platform, it placed the premium upon providing the program.

Therefore, Mr. President, it was with a great deal of pleasure and, I thought, in a manner that would meet the approval of my colleagues in the Senate that, together with my distinguished colleague the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], I offered the amendment I did offer to the Senate Finance Committee.

I wish to say that one of the things about the proposal that gave me the greatest amount of pleasure was the fact that, after examination of the proposal by the members of the committee, a number of them indicated a desire to jointly sponsor the amendment with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] and myself, and that was done. A number of the members of the committee on both sides of the table—both Republican members and Democratic members—joined the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] and myself in the sponsorship of this amendment. Mr. President, I think that is wholesome and salutary. I believe that every Member of this body—whether a Democrat or a Republican—is interested in the inauguration of a medical-care program for the aged in our country who are unable to provide for themselves, on a basis that will meet the needs of our people. And, Mr. President, I believe that it can be as attractive to a Republican Member of this body as to a Democratic Member of this body; and I submit this explanation of what the committee did, Mr. President, in the hope that it may have so great a degree of bipartisan support that it will be made a reality for the American people in this, the year 1960.

Mr. President, a number of amendments were offered to the committee, as substitutes for the plan the committee adopted. I am not taking the position that they are without merit. I took the action that I did take in the committee as to my position and my vote, on the basis that the proposal submitted and approved had great merit. A part of that merit, Mr. President, is indicated in the following facts:

No. 1, it is a proposal that can be made effective October 1, 1960.

Every other proposal made or offered as a substitute for this one had as a provision language which would have pushed forward the effective date until sometime in 1961, and a number of them very late in 1961.

Then, the proposal adopted by the committee, Mr. President, has this merit: It will take care of every aged person in any State that implements this program, whether that person is on old-age assistance, or on social security, or on neither, if he has a need for medical care.

Mr. President, this proposal has the added advantage of a very great incentive to a number of States with an acute problem of needed medical care for the aged. While those States having less than the national average per capita income have had difficulty in inaugurating and implementing medical care programs for their aged, this proposal will make it possible for a low-income State to inaugurate a medical care program for its people on the basis of the program being paid for 80 percent by the Federal Government and 20 percent by the State government.

It has the advantage, Mr. President, of becoming a part of the present medical program provided for under title I of the existing social security legislation. That means a State which has passed enabling legislation heretofore permitting it to participate in the present medical care program by the Federal and State governments for the aged can move immediately, without further legislation by the State, into the promulgation of these additional provisions needed for the present medical care program.

The committee made three basic changes in the existing old-age assistance provisions—title I—of the Social Security Act to encourage the States to improve and extend medical service to the aged:

First. It increased Federal funds to States for medical services for 2,400,000 aged persons on old-age assistance.

Second. It provided Federal grants to the States for payment of part or all of the medical services of the aged persons with low incomes, though not on the assistance roles, though not on the social security roles, or on the social security roles, as the case may be.

Third. The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is instructed to develop guides or recommended standards for the use of the States in evaluating and improving their programs of medical services for the aged.

With reference to those receiving medical care benefits, those on old-age assistance, the existing provisions of title I provide Federal funds to the States for medical services to aged individuals who are determined to be needy individuals by the States.

That is another provision of an amendment to the social security law in 1956, adopted by the Senate Finance Committee, of which the Senator from Oklahoma was one of the sponsors, which was passed by the Senate, accepted by the House, and approved by the President.

At the present time the States provide needy aged persons with money payments for medical services, and also provide vendor payments to the suppliers of medical care, including hospitals, doctors, and nurses.

These provisions vary greatly. Some States have relatively adequate provisions for the care of aged needy persons. Others have little or no provisions. The increased Federal financial provisions in the bill are designed to encourage the States to extend comprehensive medical services to all needy persons, including those receiving monthly assistance payments, including those receiving social security payments, and including all of those who need the services, though not within either of the mentioned categories.

Participation in the Federal-State program is completely optional with the States, with each State determining the extent and character of its own program, including the standards of eligibility and scope of benefits.

At the present time the Federal Government makes available to States funds for medical services to needy aged persons, but that financial participation is limited to a stated statutory proportion of the average assistance expenditure up to $65 per person per month.

In explanation of that, let me add that under existing law the Federal Government participates in the old age assistance program within the States, both for subsistence and medical care, under the provisions of a variable grant formula which gives the States from 50 to 65 percent of the amount of their payments up to a total of $65, whether the $65 or the part which they pay is for subsistence or medical care program or both.

I know Senators are aware of the fact that under the matching formula the Federal Government pays 80 percent of the first $30. Then it provides between 50 and 65 percent of the next $35, but it does not participate in payments beyond the total of $65. In many of the States a part of the $65 is used for subsistence and a part of it for medical care. However, in many other States the payment to the aged within the States exceeds the $65 per month.

In some States the excess is for medical care programs. In some States the excess is for subsistence. In some States it is in part or wholly both.

Under the provisions of the bill as it will be before the Senate, Federal financial participation in medical services will go up $12 per month per recipient of old age assistance, to be added to the existing $65. In other words, in effect the bill will provide a new amount for assistance to the aged in the form of medical care separate and apart from and in addition to the $65 limit in which the Federal Government can now participate.

There is a special provision in the bill for the States where the average payments either for subsistence or for medical care, or for both, total less than $65 per month. If a State has a program for both purposes of less than $65 per month, the bill would permit up to $12 per month per recipient of old age assistance in the State on the basis of $1 by the State and $4 by the Federal Government—80 percent by the Federal Government and 20 percent by the State.

If a State has a program already of $65 subsistence, which is paid partly by the Federal Government and partly by the State, and a medical care program and/or subsistence payments in addition to the $65, then the bill would give the State the percentage to which, under the formula, it would be entitled, between 50 and 80 percent of the $12 per month per recipient, to come to the State from the Federal Government.

This simply means that if a State is paying $12 a month for medical care, paid 100 percent by the State, the State can get a percentage of the $12 which is allowable to the State under the formula in the bill, which would be between 50 and 80 percent, to replace that part of the $12 a month now made available for the medical care for the aged, which is now being provided 100 percent by the State.

Under the other provisions in the bill the State could take an additional part of the $12 per month, which it is now paying 100 percent, and with it could match another amount to be provided by the Federal Government on the basis of 50 to 80 percent Federal and 20 to 50 percent State, to set up a medical care program authorized under the bill for all other needy aged in the State not now receiving the benefit of the medical care program under the present law.

The bill would amend the existing title I to make it clear that States may extend their existing programs to cover the medically needy. The bill would give States the incentive to establish such programs where they do not exist, or to extend such programs where they are not adequate in coverage or sufficiently comprehensive in the scope of benefits. The State standard for determining need for medical assistance does not have to be the same standard as that for determining need for money payments.

In other words, under the bill the standards in a State which are fixed by the State for eligibility for old-age assistance are not automatically made the standards for eligibility for medical care for the aged in the State, other than those who are on the old-age assistance rolls.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. If I correctly understand what the Senator is saying, the States can set up a new plan, in most cases, although some presently have a plan which the Federal Government will accept and match. In the majority of the States the State can provide, in the case of a person 65 years of age or older, that if the person is able to pay a hospital bill before he becomes ill, but becomes unable to do so while he is in the hospital, as the hospital bills run up and become substantial, the department can cover such a person.

Mr. KERR. The State department can make that an eligible case for use of these funds.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. In the case of a majority of the States the Federal Government would be paying 80 percent of the cost of taking care of such a person's medical bill.

Mr. KERR. From 50 percent to 80 percent, depending upon the per capita income of the State in relation to the national per capita income.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. In the case of the majority of the States, would not the figure be 80 percent?

Mr. KERR. I do not believe that would be true in a majority of cases. It would be true with respect to many States. The majority would be nearer 80 than 50 percent.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. SMATHERS. In our State of Florida we have a definition of medically indigent which differentiates between those who are indigent by reason of the fact that they cannot buy food for sustenance and things of that character and people who cannot afford certain other things, such as medical care. We say that people who may even have a sum of money but who cannot, for example, go into a hospital, have an operation performed which would cost, we will say, $200, and pay the bill, are people who are to be classified as medically indigent, because they do not have a sufficient amount of money to take care of a big hospital bill.

Under the bill as agreed on by the Senate Committee on Finance, the definition given by the State of Florida to the medically indigent would be applicable to the provisions of the particular bill approved by the Committee on Finance, would it not?

Mr. KERR. The Senator is correct in principle, but I should like to make one correction. The term "medically indigent" is not in the bill. The language in the bill applies to those who need medical attention and who are unable, on account of their economic conditions, to provide it.

We can understand how the standard for medical assistance, under the second part of the bill, would be different from the standard whereby subsistence assistance is now made available to the aged, for the reason that if the standards were the same the second group would already be under the old-age assistance program.

There is the provision in the bill that a State can determine the standards which it believes should be in effect to fix the eligibility of those who need medical services and cannot afford them. Those are entirely different from the standards which are in effect with reference to determining eligibility of a citizen for the present old-age assistance program.

Mr. SMATHERS. I thank the Senator. In other words, what the bill provides is that a great number of citizens, for example, in the State of Florida, would be eligible to receive this medical assistance although they, because of their income, of course, would not qualify for old-age subsistence.

Mr. KERR. The Senator is entirely correct. That is illustrated by the dramatic fact that there are about 2.4 million people in our country now on old-age assistance rolls with reference to whom the first part of the amendment, which I have explained, would apply, in that a medical care fund of $12 each, or up to that amount, could be set up by the State from Federal and State funds. At the same time, there are about 10 million other people in this country who are over 65 years of age who need medical care and who, to one degree or another, are unable to provide it for themselves. Any person of that group whose financial or economic condition is included in the State-fixed standards of eligibility could participate in and be the beneficiary of the other part of the bill.

So in reality this bill makes it possible for a State to set up its program on the basis of eligibility for its citizens to receive the medical care benefits of this bill, so that in every State every person over 65 years of age who is unable to secure medical services could obtain such services on the basis of the standards of need determined by the State of which he or she is a resident.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. FREAR. I thought I understood the Senator from Oklahoma, in response to the Senator from Florida, to say that there are 10 million people now needing care. Is that the fact, or is it the fact that there are 10 million who, in case they need care, will be eligible?

Mr. KERR. The statement of the Senator from Delaware is another way of expressing what I tried to state. I understand there are 16 million people in the country over 65. On the old-age assistance rolls are 2,400,000 who under that part of the bill would be immediately eligible for this program. That leaves 13,600,000. The Finance Committee estimated that about 10 million of those might be in the position of needing medical care which they could not provide. This bill sets up a program to provide medical care for those of that group who need it.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President——

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. KERR. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina first, and then I shall yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ERVIN. If I correctly understand the proposed plan, insofar as Federal participation is concerned, the cost of the program would be financed out of the general revenues of the Federal Government; is that correct?

Mr. KERR. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. The cost to the State would be financed in a similar manner, that is, out of the general revenues of the State?

Mr. KERR. It would be financed in whatever way the State chose to finance it. Ordinarly it would be financed out of the general revenue fund.

Mr. ERVIN. I should like to ask the Senator if I am correct in my recollection that under the present law governing social security the cost of the employment tax used to pay social security is scheduled to rise to 9 percent of the payroll by 1967, even of Congress does not increase benefits or alter the present benefits in any way.

Mr. KERR. I believe the date in which the employer-employee contribution becomes 9 percent, half to be paid by the employer and half by the employee, is 1969.

Mr. ERVIN. In any event, 9 percent of a payroll for an employment tax is quite a considerable amount to be taken out of the payroll, is it not?

Mr. KERR. It is. At this time the deduction is 3 percent from the employer and 3 percent from the employee. I would doubt that the present rate would be changed by Congress in the light of the purpose to keep that fund solvent. The rate under existing law, unless changed by the Congress, will gradually increase until 1969, at which time the employee will pay 4½ percent and the employer 4½ percent.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator think that that is of great significance in arriving at a method of financing in plans for medical care to the aged?

Mr. KERR. I agree with the Senator from North Carolina.

I think that is a factor that should be considered. I think it is especially significant when we think about the situation that now confronts us. Many Senators, who are among the finest men I know, and for whom I have the greatest affection and respect, feel that we should now increase the payroll tax on employees and employers to secure a fund out of which to pay for medical care for some 13 million people who will make no contribution to the fund. I for one do not agree. If we were to decide that instead of 10 million people who need medical care and cannot provide it for themselves, there are 13,500,000 whose span of life would be determined by the availability of medical and hospital care, and who could not provide it for themselves, and therefore, in a great enlightened Christian country are entitled to have that country consider it as a national obligation to provide that service for them, I think that service should be provided for out of the general revenue funds secured from taxation of all the people rather than to have it come from a payroll tax on the workers and the employers of today. If employers were required to pay for that medical care, they would thereby be required to provide not only the money for their own medical care in their elder years, but also, as a limited group of citizens, to provide the necessary money with which to give medical care to a worthy and honored group of aged people. If such people are entitled to be considered—and I am one who feels they are—they are entitled to have their needs met by all of the people and not merely by a limited few of the people.

Mr. ERVIN. As a basis for the next question I wish to ask the Senator, I would like to state a premise. I have talked with a great many elderly people about this problem, and I find that a very substantial number of those people are those who, by reason of possession of a small amount of property or by reason of the possession of a small amount of income, are not eligible for old-age assistance under the present law, and likewise are not covered by the Social Security Act. They do not draw social security. This bill would permit the States to adopt standards which would take care of people who are not protected by social security and who are not eligible for old-age assistance, and prevent them from suffering financial devastation by reason of protracted illnesses.

Mr. KERR. The Senator is eminently correct. If we are going to make provision for medical care for our aged, one of the basic principles contained in this bill is that which calls upon the Government to provide assistance for all of our aged and not merely for a limited group of our aged whose care will be paid for by another limited group. In other words, we do not want a situation whereby we would have an inadequate program providing for less than all who need it, by an inadequate number of people, less than all of our taxpayers.

Mr. ERVIN. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma for yielding to me and for his very lucid explanation of the provisions of this plan.

Mr. KERR. I thank the Senator from North Carolina. I now yield to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], and then I shall yield to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN].

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator was asked the question whether the 10-million group consisted of 10 million who needed medical care and who could not provide it for themselves. Does not the Senator believe, as he answered the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], that this is a group from which prospects might be drawn, but as the estimate was given to us, there might be 500,000 up to 1 million?

Mr. KERR. The Senator is entirely correct.

It is not presumed, whether we provide for 12 million under the social security tax route, or for all of the needy people under a program paid for by direct appropriation, that all members of the group will get sick and will have to go to the hospital. Either program is provided for a group with reference to which the benefits will be made available to those within the group, who by reason of illness, find themselves in need of the benefits of the program; and the applicability, as I understand, would be identical whether we set up a program for one group within a social security tax or a plan for everybody under a program of Federal and State appropriations.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I am seeking information. Can the Senator from Oklahoma advise the Senate what part of the national income is represented by those having incomes of $4,800 or less? In other words, if we adopt the social security approach in connection with proposed legislation, in this field what part of the national income will escape paying the cost of the old age health insurance program? I believe we ought to have that information.

Mr. KERR. I am advised by the representative of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, who has access to the information and statistics which are needed to answer the question, that about 40 percent of the national income would make no contribution to the fund it it were secured from a social security tax.

Mr. AIKEN. About 40 percent. That would be, for the most part, the well-to-do people of the country, who would escape paying a part of the cost of the program. Is that correct?

Mr. KERR. It would mean that that part of the national income would not make any contribution to the fund.

Mr. AIKEN. The entire cost of the program would fall on those whose income was $4,800 or less?

Mr. KERR. It would fall on a percentage of those whose earnings are not in excess of $4,800.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator have available figures which he can place in the RECORD at this time to indicate the added percentage of tax which would have to be imposed on those who are under the social security system if the other program, the one based upon the social security system alone, were followed, rather than the program the Senator from Oklahoma is explaining?

Mr. KERR. I am advised that an additional 1 percent tax on payrolls subject to the social security tax would amount to $2 billion a year.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator. I have received a number of letters, complaining letters, from young people in industries covered by the social security program, under which both employers and employees pay the social security tax, and they state that in their judgment any program which is based upon an increase in the social security tax would be unfair to the younger workers in the country. I wonder if the Senator has any observation to make on that point.

Mr. KERR. As I said a while ago, I believe a program for a group of people, including all of our citizens within a certain category, if Congress decides it is needed and should be provided, should be provided out of revenues secured from taxes on an equal basis and levied on all the people, not secured by an additional tax on the workers in our country.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is not this the gist of the point that the Senator makes, namely, that if the system is based upon social security alone, and based upon a tax levied upon that group, obviously the complaint of the young people under social security, whom I have mentioned, is well founded?

Mr. KERR. It is indeed.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. TALMADGE. I congratulate the Senator on his excellent speech. Perhaps the Senator will come to this point in a later portion of his speech, but I believe it would be wise to put in the RECORD at this point a statement of the benefits these people can get from the proposed legislation which the Senate Committee on Finance has agreed on. Is it not true that if a State adopts this program, they will be able to pay the hospital bills of needy people who cannot otherwise pay them?

Mr. KERR. The Senator is correct.

Mr. TALMADGE. Is it not also true that they will be able to pay surgical fees which they cannot otherwise afford to pay?

Mr. KERR. The Senator is correct.

Mr. TALMADGE. Is it not also true that they will be able to pay dental bills which they otherwise cannot afford to pay?

Mr. KERR. I will be glad to read the services, noninstitutional and institutional, available at this time, if the Senator would like to have me do so.

Mr. TALMADGE. I would appreciate it if the Senator would do that.

Mr. KERR. Inpatient hospital services, skilled nursing home services, physician services, outpatient hospital services, home health care services, private duty nursing services, physical therapy and related services, dental services, laboratory and X-ray services, prescribed drugs, eyeglasses, dentures, and sundry diagnostic screening and preventive services.

Mr. TALMADGE. Is it not also true that under the State program that could be without limit?

Mr. KERR. That is correct.

Mr. TALMADGE. Both as to dollars——

Mr. KERR. Both as to those who are on the old-age assistance rolls, and all other aged under the new provision.

Mr. TALMADGE. He is not limited to that amount, in other words.

Mr. KERR. He is not limited by the per capita amount that has been put in there for him. He or she has the benefit of the total amount put in there for the whole group. That is also true under the bill with reference to those not on old-age assistance.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is touching on a very vital point now, which I wished to cover. Some press reports I have seen indicate that the ceiling would be $12 per capita for those individuals who need aid. As I understand the point the Senator is making, that would merely be the appropriation to cover the individual, but the amount available would be without limit. Is that correct?

Mr. KERR. If the State's program so provided.

Mr. TALMADGE. I thank the able Senator for making that point exceptionally clear. In other words, if the committee's amendment is adopted, it will enable every citizen of the United States——

Mr. KERR. Over 65.

Mr. TALMADGE. Who is 65 years of age or older, with social security or without social security, to obtain medical, dental, and hospital help that they cannot now obtain.

Mr. KERR. The Senator is correct. On the basis set up and participated in by his or her State.

Mr. TALMADGE. That amount will be paid for by 180 million Americans, not by 70 million who are on social security.

Mr. KERR. The Senator is correct.

Mr. TALMADGE. I thank the Senator. I congratulate him. He has worked out a very satisfactory plan which should solve the needs in one very critical area for the people of our country.

Mr. KERR. I thank the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. I congratulate the Senator from Oklahoma for the very cogent explanation of the bill he has made. It may be his intention to refer to the subject a little later in his presentation, but I should like to ask him if he would explain to the Senate the action taken by his committee on Saturday with regard to the Byrd amendment, which was offered by myself and 21 other sponsors.

Mr. KERR. I shall be glad to do so. The measure before the committee was also sponsored by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE]. It provides that any man on social security may have the same privilege of retiring at age 62, instead of at age 65. So that under the provisions of the amendment sponsored by the Senator from West Virginia and others, if adopted, every man in the country would be given equal rights with the women of the country with reference to being permitted to retire at age 62 instead of age 65, by accepting an amount reduced to the degree necessary to receive the same benefits, and thereby not be paid benefits in an excessive amount. I think the term is used "on the basis of what is actuarially sound." I think it is 80 percent of what he would get if he waited until age 65.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Then, if a man accepted actuarially reduced benefits at 62, or between age 62 and age 65, would that entail any additional cost to the employer or to the employee?

Mr. KERR. It would not; nor would it entail any additional cost to the fund.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Would not retirment be voluntarily and not mandatory?

Mr. KERR. It would.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. CARLSON. I commend the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma for the very splendid analysis he has made this afternoon of the amendment as agreed on by the Committee on Finance. I think he has covered very well the people who will be included and taken care of under this proposal, which means every citizen over 65, whether he or she is under social security or not.

Second. He has discussed the bill of the Committee on Finance and, I believe, has made a very good point in stating that if the proposal is not adopted, it will place the people under social security, and young people, who are raising families and trying to provide for their families, will be carrying a burden which they should not be asked to carry.

But a point I should like to mention, which I do not believe the Senator from Oklahoma has mentioned, is that if Congress approves the amendment and the President signs the bill, the act can go into effect on October 1 in a large number of the States of the Nation—in fact, most of the States of the Nation—because they have either a good medical program or at least some kind of medical program.

Mr. KERR. The Senator from Kansas has mentioned what I believe is one of the very important elements of the bill. This proposal can become law on October 1 of this year if the Senate accepts the bill and it is signed by the President. I believe it can and will be accepted by the House. I believe it can and will be accepted by the President. In that event, we would have a great program for the aged needy of our country, and have it this year.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. SMATHERS. I was about to question the Senator from Oklahoma on that very point. Is it not true that some of the factors which the committee considered in its determination to follow this course in providing medical attention for the aged needy were that the other body has indicated that it will follow only this particular course; that the President of the United States has indicated that there might be a veto if we followed the social security course; and that while that might lend itself to a great political issue, nevertheless it was the view of the committee that it was more important to take care of the needs of the aged in the field of medical attention? Was not that more important than to have a medical issue?

Mr. KERR. That was the position of the Senator from Oklahoma. I was happy to find that it was the position of the Senator from Florida and a number of other members of the committee.

Mr. SMATHERS. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I join with my colleagues in paying my respects to the Senator from Oklahoma for a very clear analysis of the action of the Committee on Finance, and to join him in support of our committee's action.

The Senator has already pointed out in his statement that under the proposal of the Committee on Finance, all of the taxpayers of America would be paying for benefits for the aged who need assistance, rather than putting the burden only on the workers of America.

Is it not also true that under the social security approach, if that were adopted, we would be extending medical benefits even to those who did not need them? A person may have more than adequate income from investments and on retirement may be drawing social security. Why should we extend medical benefits to those who are well able to take care of themselves, as would be done under the program if it is made a part of the social security system?

Mr. KERR. The Senator is correct. That is as to the social security program.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct.

Mr. KERR. What it would do would be to provide a program of benefits for millions of people over 65 years of age who did not need them, and deny benefits to millions of workers who are over 65 years of age and who need them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct. Under the existing law, the limitation of earnings is only on earned income, and not on investment income. It is conceivable that a man under social security can be retired and may have an income of $150,000 or $200,000 a year from investments, yet if we tie these benefits to the social security he would be furnished free medical services. This would be true even though he had no need at all for such assistance.

Mr. KERR. He might have no need for them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Yet those medical services would be charged to the workers of America.

Mr. KERR. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. I think I understand the matter clearly, and I congratulate the Senator from Oklahoma upon his presentation. However, there is one point I should like the debate to show clearly, if I understand it correctly.

Reference has been made to a retirement age of 62 for women under the Social Security Act, and reference has been made by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] to an amendment offered by him and the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma to the effect that such amendment, or the substance of it, is now in the bill, to allow the retirement of men on a less attractive financial basis at age 62.

From that, we should not understand, should we, that the present bill, as to its medical care features, applies to anyone except past age 65?

Mr. KERR. Beyond the age of 65; the Senator is correct. That amendment had to do with the social security provisions in the bill, and not with reference to the medical care provisions in the bill.

Mr. HOLLAND. I was reasonably sure that that was the case. I wanted the debate to show that affirmatively. I think that that has now been done.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. KERR. I had yielded to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. TALMADGE. I shall defer to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I simply wish to make it clear that, as I understand, the amendment offered by the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] would reduce the age limit at which a man could receive an annuity under the social security program from age 65 to age 62; but the annuity would also be reduced proportionately, as was done in the case of women several years ago.

Mr. KERR. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think that is a very fine proposal. I congratulate the Senator from West Virginia and the committee for adopting it.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I desire to pursue the point made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS]. If we use the social security approach, would it not be true that Congress would compel every self-employed individual in America and every worker who is on social security to take out compulsory insurance under the social security fund?

Mr. KERR. The Senator from Georgia is correct.

Mr. TALMADGE. That would be true, and the plan would be compulsory, whether those individuals wanted such insurance or not, would it not?

Mr. KERR. Every covered citizen, whether self-employed or an employee of an employer, would compulsorily be covered under the so-called social security tax approach.

Mr. TALMADGE. Even the richest man in America?

Mr. KERR. Yes.

Mr. TALMADGE. Even if he had a son who was an able doctor?

Mr. KERR. Yes.

Mr. TALMADGE. Or if he had a brother who was a dentist?

Mr. KERR. Yes.

Mr. TALMADGE. Even if he had another relative, who was a hospital administrator?

Mr. KERR. That is correct.

Mr. TALMADGE. His health insurance would be compulsory, whether he liked it or not, and would be handled by the Government of the United States?

Mr. KERR. To this extent, yes.

Mr. TALMADGE. Does the Senator think Congress ought to compel the people of the Nation to go into the insurance business with the Government?

Mr. KERR. The Senator from Oklahoma does not.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator from Georgia agrees with the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. I am personally grateful to the Senator from Oklahoma for his remarkably clear exposition of the bill. He has made a difficult subject come to life. I compliment him.

I have been particularly interested in the effect such legislation might have on private insurance companies or private health plans, such as the Blue Cross-Blue Shield. Possibly the Senator will deal with that later in his remarks; or possibly he had already done so, before I caught up with him. Nevertheless, I should like to hear what the Senator has to say on that subject, concerning the effect the committee bill would have on private insurance companies, and what would be the attitude of private insurance companies, who have been trying to move ahead with health insurance plans. What would be the attitude of the Blue Cross-Blue Shield organization with respect to the committee bill?

Mr. KERR. I should think the committee bill would have no adverse effect upon that program. I am sure the Senator from Connecticut would agree with me that certainly few on the old age assistance roles have such personal insurance.

With reference to those who are not on the old age assistance rolls but who have private health insurance plans, they certainly, in my judgment, would not be eligible under any of the standards fixed by the States, whereby the specifications of those who are medically in need——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, we over here cannot hear the Senator. Will he speak louder?

Mr. KERR. The benefits of those in our country who are over 65 years of age but are not on the old-age assistance rolls would be in accordance with or determined by the standards of needs as fixed by their States.

If they had a private plan of health insurance—Blue Cross or Blue Shield—in my judgment they would thereby not come within the specifications the States would fix for what they would define as those in need of medical care.

Mr. MONRONEY. I thank my colleague for his explanation of this very complicated and difficult subject, and also for the great industry and study he has devoted to it.

I should like to ask about the correctness or lack of correctness of the reports, which I have heard, to the effect that the bill also raises the outside earning limits in the case of those who retire on social security, so as to permit those who retire to increase the amount with which they can supplement their social security benefits by their earnings, by permitting them to earn up to $1,800 a year without having deductions made from their social security benefits?

Mr. KERR. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] called up, in the committee, the amendment, which had been sponsored by his colleague [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], and by other Senators on the committee and by Senators not on the committee, raising from $1,200 a year to $1,800 a year the amount which could be earned by a recipient of old-age and survivors insurance without affecting the amount of his social security payments.

Mr. MONRONEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, on this point will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. Was that action taken by the committee?

Mr. KERR. Yes; by the committee.

Mr. BUSH. It was?

Mr. KERR. Yes.

Mr. BUSH. And that provision is in this bill; is it?

Mr. KERR. Yes; it is in this bill.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. I was interested in the question about the situation of those who might have some hospitalization or medical care insurance. The Senator from Oklahoma has expressed the opinion that in all probability the States would adopt standards which might exclude such persons from the provisions of this plan. I should like to ask the Senator whether the plan contains any provision which would deny a State the power to adopt a standard under which persons who have limited health insurance could take advantage of this plan after they had exhausted their limited health insurance.

Mr. KERR. I do not see how a State could fix standards which would keep this program from being available to those with private health programs after the provisions of their programs had been exhausted.

Mr. ERVIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Will the Senator state the effective date of his proposal?

Mr. KERR. October 1 of this year. That is the action of the committee.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. If this program goes into effect, even assuming that alternative plans were proposed and considered, this one would go into effect, at a minimum, a full 3 months before any of the other plans for health insurance under the social security program would go into effect, would it not?

Mr. KERR. I did not hear discussed in committee any other plan which had an effective date prior to October 1 of this year. So the provisions of this bill, as it will be before the Senate, and as it was approved by the committee, will be effective at least 9 months ahead of the effective date of any amendment I heard offered to the committee.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Will the Senator from Oklahoma state the cost of the proposal offered by him—and let me say I believe he included me as a cosponsor of it.

Mr. KERR. I did, and I was happy when the Senator from Louisiana joined the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] and myself and some Senators on the other side of the committee table, as one of the sponsors of the amendment.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Will the Senator from Oklahoma state the estimated cost to the Federal Government and the State governments in the first year of operation of this proposal?

Mr. KERR. The estimated cost of the participation by the Federal Government in the $12 payment for medical care for the aged now on the assistance rolls, for the first year of operation, is $125 million. The cost to the individual States would range from nothing up to 50 percent of the amount of the $12 sums set up by the administration within the State for their participants in the old-age assistance program.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Will the Senator from Oklahoma state how much in dollars it is estimated the States' cost will be in the first year?

Mr. KERR. I would say that, in the judgment of the representative of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, it would be between $10 and $15 million.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Is it not true that most of the Federal end of the matching to which the Senator from Oklahoma is referring is actually a matter of having the Federal Government match the funds the State is already advancing for purposes of this sort?

Mr. KERR. That is correct. In many of the States they are now providing a medical care program for their old-age assistance clients on the basis of 100 percent by the State. So the provisions of this bill would result in having the Federal Government provide a matching fund for many of the States which now are paying all or substantially all of the medical care program for that group.

With reference to those who would be added, I say to the Senate that in order that we may have in our minds language that will enable us to distinguish between the two groups provided for under this bill, I point out that those not on the old-age and assistance rolls would be brought in under what we call title XVI of House bill 12580, as amended. It is the part of the House bill which sets up the program for those who need medical care, but are not on the old-age and assistance rolls. The estimate for the Federal cost for the first year of the operation of that program would be about $60 million to the Federal Government; but after the first year it would be about $160 million, with a proportionate amount coming from the States, on the basis of either from 20 percent to 50 percent of the total amount made available. Only after that program gets underway, would both the Federal and the State parts or shares of the cost of the medical care program for the aged not on the assistance rolls go beyond that amount.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. KERR. But that is the estimate, which I believe is reasonable, for the first and second years of the program.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma about the situation of a State which is regarded as one of the low per capita income States: Is not it true that for States which meet that description and which presently are providing, at their own cost, medical care for the aged, in effect the Federal Government is placing itself in a position which would make it possible to increase by as much as 400 percent the amount that States are able to pay toward the medical care for the aged in those States?

Mr. KERR. That is correct.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Without any increase in a State's appropriations, so long as its present appropriations were applied to matching the Federal program?

Mr. KERR. That is correct.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Does not the Senator from Oklahoma recognize that the cost of this program is going to increase very substantially, because States are going to modify their laws and are going to appropriate more money, which will require more Federal matching, as this program becomes fully effective?

Mr. KERR. That is correct; and in my judgment that is one of the most valuable parts of this bill.

First, it recognizes the need for a medical care program for our aged.

Second, it provides an incentive to States with existing programs to increase them; and it provides an incentive to States which are without programs to inaugurate and implement them.

Third, it provides means whereby, as time passes, and as our States and the people within them recognize the equity of these programs, they will develop them to a basis to meet the needs of the people of their States, with resulting participation by the Federal Government on the basis I have outlined.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Is this not also true? If we vote for this plan, we can depend upon a very substantial increase in every State that is interested in providing aid for the aged—and I believe they all do—very substantial and improved assistance in medical care for the aged. Is it not true that the President would probably sign the bill and the plan would become law on October 1——

Mr. KERR. This year.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. This year. By contrast, if we vote for the proposal to increase the social security tax and to use that money to provide additional health insurance, with the administration opposed to it, the probabilities are that even if the Congress passed it, it would be vetoed, it would not become effective, and there would not be the votes to override the veto. So, in one instance, we would have provided major assistance to those who need help in paying medical expenses; whereas, on the other hand, we would have a good political issue, but it would have provided nothing at all between now and the time Congress next convened. Is that correct?

Mr. KERR. That is the opinion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Earlier I indicated that I would listen with intense interest to the remarks on the subject matter by my friend from Oklahoma. I have done so, and I have been helped by the remarks he has made on the action within the Senate Committee on Finance with reference to this matter.

I wish to make an observation, and I hope that it is in the interest of perhaps a partial understanding on the part of those who would like to go further and have it embrace the social security framework. For that reason I make this comment. I believe the report the Senator from Oklahoma has given relates primarily to the expansion of our old-age public assistance plan to include medical care. Is that not correct?

Mr. KERR. Not exactly. It expands the program now available to 2,400,000 persons on the assistance program. It makes possible the implementation of the program for the benefit of 10 million persons in this country for whom there is a need but who are not on the assistance program.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the Senator. I agree with much that he said this afternoon, insofar as it goes; but the plan he espouses does not provide an insurance plan into which people can pay in their working years and then possess a paid-up policy on retirement. I think this is a matter of right. It does not relate merely to an income test.

Will the Senator comment on that statement?

Mr. KERR. The Senator from Oklahoma has been impressed by what many able men have said with reference to the need of millions of our aged citizens for a medical care and hospital program which they cannot provide for themselves. In the judgment of the Senator from Oklahoma, this bill provides such a program. In the judgment of the Senator from Oklahoma, if implemented by the several States, it will provide for every aged citizen in those States who needs aid.

The program is not compulsory on the States. It does not compel them to provide a program for which they themselves have paid. But it does provide the opportunity, at State and Federal expense. The social security tax is a program that is paid for by taxation. This program is paid for by taxation, but this program will be paid for by the taxation of all the people, and will be available to all the aged who need it. In the judgment of the Senator from Oklahoma, it meets a need which has been so ably and eloquently described with reference to the fact that there are 16 million people in our country over 65 years of age, most of whom need medical and hospital care, but are unable to provide it for themselves.

Mr. RANDOLPH. One further comment: I am appreciative of the thoughtful manner in which the Senator from Oklahoma has discussed this problem, which is a paramount one, I am sure, in the hearts and minds of all Members of the Senate. I become weary at the suggestion expressed by some Members of the Senate that we must draft legislation which has the approval of the President before it is sent to Capitol Hill from the White House. I think the President arrogates to himself a responsibility which is not given to him by the Constitution. The members of the legislative body pass upon these matters and send to the President that which, in their judgment, they believe to be legislative enactments in the public interest.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. KERR. I would like to have an opportunity to reply to that statement. Then I will yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I shall be delighted to have the Senator reply; but over and over again we are faced, it seems to me, with the report of word having come from the White House that we must draft legislation in a certain manner, and that, if enacted in another manner, it will be vetoed. I do not believe that is the best way to proceed under our system of checks and balances.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma let me answer that?

Mr. KERR. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Constitution very definitely makes the President of the United States a part of the whole legislative process.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I realize that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Bills must first be approved by both Houses before they go to the executive branch. The President is constitutionality clothed with the power to approve or disapprove, and if he disapproves he is mandated under the Constitution to send the bill back here——

Mr. RANDOLPH. I agree.

Mr. DIRKSEN. For such action as the legislative branch wants to take; and if the veto is not overridden, obviously it does not become a part of the law of the land. So it cannot be said that the Founding Fathers did not make the President a part of the legislative process. That is one of the happy checks and balances in our whole system of government.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I did not say that. What I object to is the predisapproval of the President of the United States on matters which are yet to be passed on in the Congress.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The President of the United States does not arrogate to himself, as my distinguished friend from West Virginia puts it, powers which are not his; nor are they arbitrarily exercised. He is elected, not by the constituents of a State or of a congressional district but by all the people of the United States, popularly expressed in the form of an electoral vote; and he has a national responsibility to all the people. That does not amount to arrogance. That is nothing more than a judicial exercise of the powers the Constitution imposes on him.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am appreciative of what the Senator has said. I pursue the inquiry for this purpose: If the minority leader in the Senate or the minority leader in the House stands up and tells the Members generally that if the legislation is passed in this form or that, the President is going to veto it, it gives the President a voice here in the Capitol which goes beyond the power, or, very frankly, the prerogative of the President of the United States.

Over and over again I hear that said by the leaders of the party.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have no recollection that the minority leader of the Senate or of the House has ever made a statement to the effect that the President would veto a measure passed by the Congress. I have said, on occasion on this floor, "It is my personal judgment, without putting words in the mouth of the President and without knowing, as a matter of fact, that on the basis of his own declaimed philosophy there is every likelihood that this bill might be vetoed."

That is quite a different thing. I have never yet seen the time when, in advance of his own examination of a measure which has gone to him, the President has ever said to me, either at the leadership meetings or elsewhere, that he would veto a bill. That is a decision he reserves for himself. He takes appropriate advice from the agencies and departments of Government and then come to his own conclusion.

I do not know that I have ever been advised in advance—let us say, more than 30 minutes—that a certain piece of legislation was to be vetoed.

Mr. RANDOLPH. My delightful friend has the pulse of the President, and he expresses it in words over and over again. He may not spell out exactly what the President is going to do, and certainly I would not say he has so done, but I say that over and over again we have felt days and days before we passed upon a bill that the President was going to veto it, if enacted in a form which displeased him. The minority leader has several times forecast ultimate Presidential action with extraordinary accuracy.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. First, I wish to congratulate the Senator from Oklahoma for what appears to me to be an excellent solution to this very troublesome problem.

There is one point in connection with a previous remark I wish to have clarified. The Senator made clear the incentive for increased payments by the States. As the Senator said, I think this is one of the bill's greatest merits.

In regard to a State which may be doing all it thinks it should do at the moment, is there a prohibition against the State decreasing what it is now doing, the effort it is now making in the field? In other words, will a State be permitted to use the Federal contribution to maintain the present standard and to decrease the State contribution?

Mr. KERR. I will say to the Senator there are circumstances under which that would be possible. The bill certainly is not written in such a way as to encourage it.

I remember looking at the situation in regard to one State. I believe the State is providing about $6 a month for a medical care program. I believe the State is contributing to the program about $2.50 a month. Under the provisions of the bill I think the State could use $1 of the $2.50 which it is contributing to the $6 program, and could receive $4 additional, so that actually the State could thereby almost double the medical care program without it costing the State any more money.

I say to the Senator that we had in mind, in writing the bill, that we should have as favorable a provision in that regard as we could in the hope and in the belief that States would step up their medical care programs and, as they did, use more of their own funds and thereby receive proportionately much more Federal money.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I suppose it would be very unusual if a State were in a position to decrease its own contribution, because I presume, except for a very few States, that the present program is inadequate. I wondered about it.

Mr. KERR. I doubt whether any State would decrease the amount of money it spends. There are a number of States which, by spending the same amount of money, could receive substantially greater benefits.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Yes. I think that is certainly very fine. We hope the ultimate effect will be an increase in the quality of and in the amount of most of these programs.

As I understand the proposal, from the Senator's explanation, it seems to be a very wise solution to the problem.

Mr. KERR. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The Senator from Oklahoma has stated the situation very clearly, but I would not want the RECORD to indicate that the Senate Committee on Finance acted under the threat or fear of a Presidential veto.

Mr. KERR. I should like to clear that matter up a bit, if the Senator will permit, and the Senator can say what he wishes in that regard.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I know that the Senator from Oklahoma will agree with me that the Senate Committee on Finance approved the bill on its own merits. An overwhelming majority on both sides of the aisle felt it was a fair and equitable bill. We felt it could be and should be enacted into law.

I think that point should be emphasized. The fact that the administration is in complete agreement with the action of the committee is a fortunate factor, but was not the determining factor so far as the vote of the committee was concerned.

This bill was reported not only with the votes of every Republican member of the Finance Committee but it also had the support of six of the Democratic members of our committee. This bill has bipartisan support as well as the strong support of the administration.

We have brought to the Senate a bill which we think will deal with this problem of providing adequate medical care for every person in America over the age of 65 who needs it, provided the State itself sets up a medical program.

This leaves to the States the right to set up their own programs, with the Federal Government participating in the cost thereof. This is a right the States should have. If the States wish to establish medical programs, every person in America over the age of 65 who needs assistance can get it under the bill. It would not provide medical care for anyone who does not need such assistance.

I think it should also be pointed out that although this bill would supplement the insurance programs, if any person over the age of 65 wishes to carry his own private health insurance he can do so. The bill would in no way interfere with the normal operations and functions of insurance companies. This is not a national or socialized medical program.

I thank the Senator from Oklahoma for yielding at that point. As I said before, the fact that this bill has the enthusiastic support of the administration is fortunate, but I again emphasize that this bill was reported on its own merits with strong bipartisan support.

Mr. KERR. I thank the Senator from Delaware. The Senator has accurately set forth the situation. So far as the Senator from Oklahoma is concerned, he was not under the lash of the Chief Executive by reason of an audible or inaudible, actual or possible, veto threat.

I say to my colleagues in the Senate that I was much more concerned about whether I could get a majority of the members of the Committee on Finance to agree with my proposal than I was with regard to whether I could get the approval of the administration.

As I said when I started the discussion, the thing which made me feel very good about the situation was that the members of the Committee on Finance approved the amendment. They approved it because they thought it was equitable, because they thought it was worthy, because they thought it would be the beginning of a complete and adequate program, and because they believed it was something to which they could subscribe and defend on the floor of the Senate and at home.

When inquiry was made subsequently, as to the attitude of the administration, I was delighted to find acceptance at that place. I believe probably I have been as vocal as any Member of this body in the expression of well-founded and unrestrained opinions about the exercise of the veto. It occurred to me that in this situation we in the Finance Committee achieved a degree of bipartisan support and accommodation with the Chief Executive which was remarkable in the extent to which all had agreed on how to meet the needs of the people of our States. Certainly we did so without the lash or any threat of a veto over us. I am sure every member of the committee can understand that we naturally were delighted when we found that that to which we had agreed would be acceptable to the administration.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to congratulate the very able Senator from Oklahoma and tell him what a pleasure it is to work with him on the Committee on Finance. I should like to address two questions to him.

Is the plan approved by the committee and supported by the administration a plan that has been approved by the insurance industry? To put the question in another way, has the insurance industry raised any objection to the plan?

Mr. KERR. None that I know of.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the American Medical Association raised any objection to the proposed plan?

Mr. KERR. None that I know of. One of the significant things was the fact that after it was explained to the medical and dental professions in my State, I had the assurance that the members of those professions there would be happy to cooperate; they had no basis of opposition.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it the type of plan to which a Senator such as myself, who believes very firmly in the rights of the States and the rights of their people to take care of their own problems at home, could agree?

Mr. KERR. I think the Senator is eminently correct.

Mr. BUTLER. It is a type of plan that takes care of the absolute necessity of the people who are already on relief rolls, and it applies to those who are in need and do not have the means to protect themselves. It gives assistance to the States to aid such persons.

Mr. KERR. It also gives ample assistance to the States to meet the needs of their aged who need it, whether they are on the old-age assistance rolls or not, and each State can determine its specifications. I shall discuss that point in some detail in a few moments. Each State can determine the specifications which are acceptable to it for the eligibility of their citizens to participate in this program.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma. I make a slight reservation. I think I said it applied only to those persons who are on the assistance rolls at the moment. It also applies to those who are in need of care and are not on the assistance rolls and cannot pay for it themselves.

Mr. KERR. That is correct.

Mr. BUTLER. But necessity must be shown before they are entitled to it.

Mr. KERR. According to the specifications of the individual State.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. I commend the Senator from Oklahoma for a very fine presentation. He is always prepared on this subject, and he is interested in it. I sometimes complain about the lack of a quorum or attention, and I now wish to commend the Senate for giving the Senator such a fine opportunity to explain this important bill. I believe the entire committee, whether individual members voted for this particular bill or not, owes a debt of gratitude to all Senators for the consideration that has been given to it. I think the committee has brought forth a very fine bill.

I was about to ask a question of the Senator from Oklahoma on a subject which the Senator had not covered except by referring to "those in need." I believe his answer to the Senator from Maryland, that he is about to develop that part of his subject, is sufficient for the time being.

Mr. KERR. Yes, I expect to do so.

Mr. STENNIS. I shall not ask the Senator to repeat what he intended to say.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, does the Senator from Oklahoma intend to continue?

Mr. KERR. Yes. The bill would amend existing title I to make it clear that States may extend their assistance programs to cover the medically needy. The bill would give the States a financial incentive to establish such programs where they do not exist or to extend such programs where they are not adequate in coverage of comprehensive in the scope of benefits.

The State standard for determining need for medical assistance does not have to be the same standard as that for determining need for money payments. Thus, a State may, if it wishes, disregard in whole or part, the existence of any income or resources, of an individual for medical assistance. An individual who applies for medical assistance may be deemed eligible by the State notwithstanding the fact he has a child who may be financially able to pay all or part of his care, or owns or has an equity in a homestead, or has some life insurance with a cash value, or is receiving an old-age insurance benefit, annuity, or retirement benefit. The State has wide latitude to establish the standard of need for medical assistance as long as it is a reasonable standard consistent with the objectives of the title.

Section 1 provides that one of the objectives of the title is to furnish medical assistance to individuals who are not recipients of old-age assistance but whose income and resources are insufficient to meet the costs of necessary medical services. In establishing the standard of need for medical assistance a State must comply with all other applicable provisions of section 2.

Mr. President, I wish to close by extending my appreciation to the Senate for the attention it has given to me and to the other members of the committee for their work in deliberating and studying this bill, and the amendments which were approved. In my judgment, a close examination of the bill by Senators from any State will show that, if enacted into law, the proposed legislation would be of great benefit to the citizens of each and every State and a detriment to none.

I thank the Senate.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. FREAR. As the Senator from Oklahoma has already heard, many Senators have expressed their pride in the work accomplished by the Senator from Oklahoma and the manner in which he has presented it to the Senate. I should like to add perhaps merely a feeble word, but the feebleness of it does not signify my degree of appreciation for what the senior Senator from Oklahoma has done for the senior citizens of the United States.

Mr. KERR. I thank my good friend from Delaware.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Senator has made an exceptional exposition. I know he has been on his feet for quite a while. I ask him if he would yield for a little catechizing in order to place the whole subject in a package.

First, the proposed legislation preserves the general principle set forth in the President's message, liberalizing it in the hope of making it adequate?

Mr. KERR. The statement is accurate.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The plan would not be financed out of general revenues but from funds made available in the form of grants-in-aid to the States that qualify under the program?

Mr. KERR. I am sure it would not be financed out of earmarked taxes, out of revenue secured from the general tax structure.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Out of general revenues appropriated for that surpose.

Mr. KERR. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. A State is free to come in or stay out.

Mr. KERR. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There are enough incentives in the bill to make one properly assume that every State would want to come in under this program.

Mr. KERR. I believe that it would result in that happening.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The estimate with respect to the House bill was that if all States participated, the combined Federal-State cost would aggregate about $325 million. Can the Senator give us a rounded figure as to what this program would cost?

Mr. KERR. I believe that the estimate of cost of the bill as passed by the House for title XVI, which was the initial coverage, would be about $30 million a year, soon going up to $165 million, which would be the Federal cost. That would call for matching funds by the States, so that when it went into effect, after a year or so, the total cost to both State and local governments with reference to both title XVI and the slight expansion of coverage under title I of the existing law, would be about the amount named by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is my understanding that every person over 65, whether on social security or not, who is in need would be eligible for the benefits provided in this plan.

Mr. KERR. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is my understanding also that this program could be put into effect on or about the 1st of October of this year, if enacted into law in this session, as distinguished from alternative programs, which would require additional State legislation, and could probably not become effective until some time in the middle or latter part of 1961.

Mr. KERR. As I understand it, every substitute offered to the committee for its consideration had in it a provision which would have prevented the amendment from becoming effective before the middle of 1961, if enacted.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The proposed program makes no provision for a fee by a participant in the program, or any kind of action that might put a lien upon the property of a recipient of the benefits. Is that correct?

Mr. KERR. Not by reason of anything in the law.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That puts this matter into one good package. I congratulate the Senator on his magnificent presentation.

Mr. KERR. I yield the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it has been with very great interest that I have listened to the able address of my friend and colleague, the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR]. He has made many lasting contributions to the Nation's social security program, for which I should like to pay him tribute.

Lest someone reached the conclusion that there is no longer any disagreement with the bill to be presented by the committee, I wish to speak very briefly. The bill has been described to the Senate this afternoon. It is faulty in three major respects.

First, a means test would be provided, which would be applied before any old person could receive a benefit. The distinguished Senator from Oklahoma said it would provide medical care and hospitalization to all old people who needed it.

I believe there are still old people in America, and I hope that when my children are old there will still be old people in America, who have sufficient pride that they will not humble themselves by seeking public alms. The committee bill follows the public charity approach. The bill provides for public charity. It gives no old person an entitlement, a right. Ours is a proud people. It erodes the pride of our people to place them in the ignominious position of having to take their hat in hand and go to a welfare agent and plead their poverty before receiving aid of which they are in need.

One would gather, from several remarks made on the floor of the Senate this afternoon, that this country made a great mistake when it enacted the social security program. It was with considerable surprise that I heard in the Senate, one day after the 25th anniversary of this, the greatest step in social security that mankind ever made, that it was wrong to have a program of compulsory insurance.

The social security program applies to all alike who are in specified employment. It is compulsory. I have no choice, when I pay my tax as a self-employed individual in private life, but to pay the social security tax on self-employment income. An employee in a bank in the city of Washington has no choice but to accept the social security deductions from his paycheck. As a consequence of this program, when that bank clerk reaches the retirement age, he is entitled to his social security retirement pay. He is entitled to it as a matter of right, whether he be a pauper or a plutocratic millionaire. He has an entitlement. He has a right. That right vests under the law.

The social security program has a wide base. It provides insurance so that people will not have to live in poverty when they retire.

I thought this was good and I still think so. But we hear this afternoon that it is not good, that it is an unsound principle.

The seesaw of political sentiment toward a proposal can take weird turns. I heard the distinguished minority leader extoll the committee bill because it did not meet the test of pay as you go. I heard the distinguished minority leader praise the bill because the benefits it provides would be paid for from the general fund. Yet only a few months ago he and the administration were opposed to additional funds for highway construction if even $1 came out of the general fund. They said the cost must be met by an increase in the tax on gasoline.

There is one feature of our social security program upon which all of us have insisted. That is generally true of Democrats and Republicans. We have insisted that the plan be actuarially sound. That is another major fault of the bill to be reported by the committee.

I would like to see medical care and hospitalization added to the social security program as an additional category of benefits. I offered a substitute bill, which was defeated in committee. I see on the floor the distinguished junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON]. He also offered a substitute that was defeated.

The proposals which the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] and I introduced, while providing greater benefits, also provided taxes to bring in the revenue to make the program fiscally sound.

The committee bill would provide some additional benefits, but it provides no additional revenue.

The course of fiscal responsibility sometimes takes a weird turn, indeed. The turn is often interpreted in accordance with the dictates of expediency. Some persons apparently had rather be fiscally unsound with an inadequate poorhouse approach than to be fiscally sound with an adequate program of social security.

The third major fault of the bill reported from the Committee on Finance is that it depends upon State matching of funds. Some States contend that they are already straining to match that which is already available. Indeed, several States are not now matching funds which are already available under a provision of law similar to that now recommended to us.

The recent Governors' conference passed a resolution asking Congress to enact a bill adding medical care and hospitalization to the social security program. One of the principal reasons given, as I recall the resolution, was that the State sources of matching funds were already all but exhausted.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] has just reminded me that that resolution was passed on June 29 and was placed in the RECORD of June 30 by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA]. It will be found in the RECORD on page 15094.

Much has been made of the fact that the committee bill would be effective in October of this year. Some small benefits might be available in some States at that time; but, in major part, the States must raise additional matching funds, and that would require sessions of the State legislatures.

A group of Senators who are earnestly seeking a sound medical care and hospitalization bill, adequate for the needs of the people and preserving the pride of the people, met this forenoon. We will introduce a bill in due course, and the Senate will have an opportunity to choose between a means test, which, as I say, erodes the pride of our people, and a program which is actuarily sound, is not dependent upon State matching, and provides benefits within the framework of the social security program. I hope Senators will reserve judgment until they read the minority views and have an opportunity to examine the bill which we will introduce.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I may say, at the outset, that much of what I shall say will sound similar to what the distinguished Senator from Tennessee has been saying. This is not because we have gotten together and compared notes; it merely indicates that our hearts beat somewhat in unison when it comes to trying to deal adequately with this problem. I thank the Senator from Tennessee for the remarks he made.

First, I was greatly intrigued by even the suggestion that any Senator might hold back on this proposal because of the possibility of a veto. It seems to me that not long ago we passed a housing bill which we were fully certain might run into trouble, but I do not recall any Senator announcing that he would not vote for it because it might have difficulty at the White House.

It seems to me that a couple of years ago we had under consideration an agriculture bill which I vigorously opposed, but which my Democratic colleagues shoved rapidly through the Senate to the White House, there to see it receive a veto.

It seems to me that one Member of the Senate had a proposal, at one time, to add $5 to the old-age assistance. The bill passed Congress and went to the White House, where it was vetoed. But the Senator who sponsored the measure never held back a minute because of the possibility that it might be vetoed.

As I recall, not too long ago a public works bill went through Congress, was sent to the President, and was vetoed. Congress passed the bill again, it went to the President, and was vetoed again. I do not recall that the author of that bill ever stood up and said, "Do not pass the bill; it might be vetoed."

So I hope that in this discussion no Senator will so far forget himself as to suggest the possibility that any Senator would vote differently because of the possibility of adverse action at the White House.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. This Senator is one of those who has been guilty of what the Senator from New Mexico refers to as urging that an amendment be adopted although the bill might then be vetoed.

This Senator also had the experience, some years ago, in connection with a social security bill, of urging that an amendment be adopted to reduce the benefits in the bill, because we had rather certain indications of the probability that the bill would be vetoed, and Congress would not be in session when the bill was returned to Congress.

The distinguished Senator knows that these decisions must depend on the circumstances.

Mr. ANDERSON. I recall that, and I take pride in the work which the Senator from Louisiana did.

I think there are some good features in the bill the committee will report. I do not say everything is bad. Many things about it are good. I simply say it does not go nearly far enough.

I am not surprised that it has been indicated that the administration will support the bill, or that we might get an administration bill, because one little section of the House bill, which was carried on page 8 of the committee print which we had, but which liberalized the alternative requirements so that an individual could meet them much easier, was taken from the House provision; and taking out that House provision saved $251 million a year. So it is not unusual that the addition of some little section which added $130 million did not throw the bill so far out of balance that the administration was no longer interested in it. We rejected that one time. Then we called for a reconsideration of it, and we rejected it again. So I know that one of the prompting motives in rejecting it again was the fact that if we had not restored the $251 million, then this additional amount of money for old age help might have overbalanced it a little.

There are many weaknesses in the bill. One of them is that it depends on State appropriations and tax increases. That will involve a tough battle in the legislature in almost every State. One of the weaknesses is that State legislatures meet biennially.

It is all very well to throw out the date October 1 and say it is a wonderful thing. The fact is that only the old-age assistance provisions will be affected by October 1. The rest of it will have to be held in abeyance until the legislatures of the various States meet and take some action. The Governors of the States must also act.

The able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] anticipated somewhat what I intended to say. He cited the fact that the Governors' conference passed a resolution, which is printed in the hearings at page 161.

> We, the undersigned, attending the 52d annual Governors' conference, urge that you and your committee amend H.R. 12580—
> The bill which has just been reported—> to provide health benefits under the provisions of the old age survivors and disability insurance system.

That is what the Senator from Tennessee was trying to do with his bill. That is what the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA] was trying to do with his bill. And that is what I tried to do with my very modest amendment.

The interesting thing is that when we have been listening to debates on the minimum wage bill, some Senators have said, "Leave it to the Governors. The Governor of my State says we do not need this legislation."

Well, Mr. President, if we are going to leave it to the Governors, as regards the minimum wage, why not leave it to the Governors, as regards benefits to the aged, for health purposes? Thirty Governors signed the telegram in which they said they did not want it done by any fashion other than the payroll tax method. Why did they say that? They said it because they knew what their financial problems were.

A great many of the Governors signed it. Among them are the Governor of Missouri, the Governor of California, and Governor Collins of Florida, who took a little part in some of the recent discussions.

A moment ago I found that the Governor of Arkansas, Mr. Faubus, signed it. Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, of New York, also suggested this as a possibility.

It is all very well to say that all New York has to do is appropriate another $35 million or $40 million. But certainly the Governor of New York knows what he is doing when he suggests this possibility. Therefore, I think we should pay some attention to his ideas in regard to this matter.

The telegram was also signed by the Governor of Michigan, the Governor of Washington, the Governor of Connecticut, the Governor of Wisconsin—by a total of 30 Governors, who are suggesting that the method proposed here, of imposing a small payroll tax, is the proper method with which to care for this problem.

If the Governors know so much about the proper course in regard to the minimum wage, how is it that, in the opinion of some, they are so ignorant as regards social security? I believe we should pay a little attention to that point.

Furthermore, the Governors will have to sign the implementing legislation, if it is passed next year.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator from New Mexico referred to the State of New York; and I believe the point he made in that connection illustrates some of the benefits of this proposed legislation, although of course the Senator feels that it might not be adequate. Does not the Senator know that at present New York is one of the leading States of the Nation in providing general hospitalization to persons who, for one reason or another, might have difficulty in paying their medical bills?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. This bill would make it possible for New York to provide twice as much care for those over 65 years of age as New York is now providing. In the opinion of the Senator, would not that make it a very liberal and substantial program in New York?

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, yes, if New York could just find $75 million. But New York has a little difficulty, once in a while, in doing that. New York is a marvelous State, and I am very happy that its payments are high. But, somehow or other, its Governor took a little different view regarding this situation than did the Senate Finance Committee. If the Senate Finance Committee had taken Governor Rockefeller's advice, it would have reported another of the bills, rather than the one it did report.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. But my point is that although I do not know just how New York is providing all its aid to the aged or how it is handling the hospitalization, yet I am sure that New York can very well do what Louisiana does, namely, set up the plan in such a fashion that the State gets credit for what it already is doing for those over 65 years of age, and thereby enable the State to qualify for Federal matching of the amount the State already is providing.

New York, which has a very liberal program, would be in a position at least to double its program, simply by adjusting its affairs in such a way as to get credit at the Federal level for what New York already is doing at the State level.

Mr. ANDERSON. However, if the only result of this bill would be to have some fancy bookkeeping done, I do not think very much additional help would be provided for the aged.

It is true that New York is doing a fine job. But there are 15 or more States which today are doing little or nothing for such medical care. What are they to do?

That is why some of us believe that the best way is to proceed by means of a payroll tax with which to take care of this social security problem.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. In the case of those of us who come from States which already are providing liberal and adequate medical care for the aged, and who assume that under this program our States will go to the extreme limit in seeing to it that anyone who needs medical care at public expense will receive it, is there any reason why we should vote to require the people of our States to pay, on top of that, an additional tax in the form of a payroll tax or a tax of one-half of 1 percent of their income, as the case may be, to provide for such care, when our States are already providing it?

Mr. ANDERSON. In the case of the $71 that Louisiana is providing Louisiana will be able to match $3 and will be able to receive $12 or $15 for it. But it is also true that the State next to Louisiana on the list is Kentucky, with only a $46 average payment. If Kentucky is not able to provide medical benefits now, how does the Senator expect Kentucky will be able to provide them in the future merely because the Congress passes a bill which provides, in effect, that the Kentucky Legislature will be allowed to try to dig up some funds with which to match?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The $71 to which the Senator from New Mexico has referred does not relate at all to what is being done in Louisiana. Our State hospital program is quite independent of our welfare program in Louisiana. The Louisiana hospital fund is spent for State hospital care, for which the people are not charged medical bills. If the hospital program for the aged in Louisiana is to be given credit for what the State already is doing, frankly, the funds which would be made available would be more than what is needed in order to do the job for all aged persons in Louisiana at 100 percent.

But as the Senator from New Mexico knows, under the program we have in mind, Louisiana would not receive complete matching for all she already is doing, because Louisiana has already gone so far that if an effort were made to match what she already is spending for this purpose, she would have more help than she would need.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have stated frankly that Louisiana has done a very good job in the field of medical care; and that may be one of the reasons why on so many occasions the Senator from Louisiana has suggested liberalizing our social security program. But that is not true of every State; and the fact that there is a fine program in Louisiana does not mean that the same is true throughout the Nation.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. But does not the Senator from New Mexico appreciate the fact that the medical care which States already are providing for the aged could at least be doubled under this bill without devoting to the program any additional State revenue—in other words, merely by having the Federal Government match what the State already is doing?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not mean the matching provisions of the bill; I simply say that, in addition, there are millions of people under the social security program who will find themselves best taken care of by this system.

Now I come to the question of the means tests: One of the big objections, I believe, to what is provided by the bill is the provision for a means test. There are a great many people who do not want to say, "I am medically indigent, even though I am not indigent insofar as my other resources are concerned, for I own my own house, and I have property and income; but when it comes to paying medical bills, put me down as indigent, so I can get medical care free."

Many people believe they should receive it as a matter of right; that is the position of many who are perfectly willing to make such insurance payments. And I am satisfied that many of the Governors of the States said that was the desirable thing to do.

Some interesting philosophies are being voiced in connection with this matter. I do not understand how it is that a conservative, pay-as-you-go social security approach has become impractical, whereas a program of making large appropriations from the General Fund—in other words, the spending approach—is regarded as having become so fiscally responsible. Certainly that is a strange argument. Some seem to believe that it would be perfectly horrible to make a program self-sustaining on a pay-as-you-go basis.

I have seen some Members of Congress vote against a measure which provides for a pay-as-you-go method, although heretofore they have been very much worried about the condition of the Federal Treasury. Yet they are willing to start taking $130 million or $230 million out of the Treasury, to supplement these funds, and are willing to have millions of dollars come out of the State treasuries, whereas the payroll tax would take care of the matter very simply and very easily.

A great many things could be said, and will be said. My only purpose here tonight is to urge Senators not to become pledged to some particular program and against some other particular program. I think it is entirely possible that, before they are through, they may find that there are no bargain days. There are no discount stores. There is no way we can get something cheaply. The program will cost some money. It is true that a one-half of 1 percent tax on payrolls would provide $1 billion; and someone says, "You can have all of that for $135 million. All you have to do is take what is in the bill now. For $135 million you get what $1 billion will buy."

No, we do not. There is no royal and easy road to getting insurance protection for the people of the United States, and I say to Senators that they had better look at the whole figure and decide what we need.

I was interested in the question that was asked, "What about a rich man, a man whose father might be a millionaire, a man whose wife might take in roomers? Will he get the money to go to the hospital?" They would argue against that and strike down the whole social security program. What about the president of a corporation who gets $600,000 a year, but who comes under the social security program? Does anyone worry over whether he might have retirement pay? I am told there are many Members of Congress who have money deducted from their pay for retirement purposes, who have adequate income and resources, but who believe insurance is not a bad thing.

There are officers of corporations who are paid many thousands of dollars a year, many of them receiving more than a hundred thousand dollars, who still see to it that money is deducted from their pay, up to $4,800 of their earnings. We do not suggest taking them off the 3-percent tax. No one says that corporation officers should not contribute to the program in this way. However, if it is suggested taking another quarter of 1 percent from the employer and another quarter of 1 percent from the employee, that suddenly becomes fiscally irresponsible and dangerous to the whole country. I do not believe it. I believe that services for which the rich are taxed are still all right because they provide for all the people of this country.

I therefore hope we will not suddenly decide in advance that we will not support an amendment which will be offered, which would recognize the social security principle. I believe a number of Senators will be interested in having it presented. I hope I will be among them, as I am sure other Senators who are now present will be. Regardless, there will be an opportunity, when the bill reaches the floor, to vote on that supplementary amendment, which carries out the desires of the Governors of 30 States, which carries out the desires of the people across the country who have been watching the program for a long time.

I began my first participation in this program in 1936, when I became a director of the Employment Security Administration in my home State. I had served as a relief administrator prior to that time. I had served as a national youth administrator, as had our distinguished majority leader. We started our work in the same way.

Through the years I have developed some feeling on this question. I believe the Social Security System has been a fine thing; and if we will only go back to the early days and listen to the pronouncements issued against this "awful, pernicious insurance device," whereby a man who had a good job was taxed so there might be unemployment insurance for all, it will be found that those who made those pronouncements in the beginning do not make them any more.

We have just celebrated the 25th anniversary of the Social Security System. When the first bills were passed, there were some pretty harsh things said from one side of the aisle; but when the 25th anniversary arrived, I did not see a single Senator from the other side of the aisle stand up to recommend a repeal of the whole Social Security System. Perhaps they learned something in 25 years; and I suggest to them that if we establish this program and accept an amendment that will be offered which puts it on the social security principle for medical care to the aged, in 25 years we shall see the same general results. And I hope that will be the decision of the Senate.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It was my privilege earlier in the day to listen to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], and then to listen to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], and now to have heard the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON]. I would not feel it proper, after having expressed my appreciation to the Senator from Oklahoma for his discussion of the action of the Senate Finance Committee, if I failed to speak my appreciation for the helpful and forthright manner in which the Senators from Tennessee and New Mexico have spoken. I am sure their reasoning appeals to many of the Senators in this body.

Mr. ANDERSON. I thank the able Senator.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I ask the Senator to yield primarily because I wish to commend the Senator from New Mexico, not only for the words he has uttered here today, but for the work on the part of the Senator from New Mexico and his colleagues who voted with him for the social security principle in providing medical care for the aged or elderly. I commend the Senator also for pointing out some of the weaknesses in the committee proposal that are so very evident.

What disturbs me about the proposal is that it is nothing more or less than a "souped-up" old-age assistance program with the means test applied a little more liberally than before. It does not get down to the solid principle of insurance under the social security program.

I jotted down a few thoughts relating to the action of the Finance Committee in rejecting the sound principle of social security insurance and in approving a modified version of additional Federal assistance to the States in order to carry on a medical care program on the basis of need as determined by social workers who investigate the economic status of each and every applicant for medical assistance.

We should get away from this relief concept. This Nation boasts of its prosperity. This Nation boasts of its productivity and of the ever larger number of people that have well paid jobs. It seems to me we ought to work our way up to a system of health care insurance so that when elderly people come into their hour of need for medical care there is money in the till, so to speak, to pay for it on an insurance principle.

The thing that disturbs me, I can add to my friend from New Mexico, is that the very people who have criticized us for fiscal irresponsibility are ignoring or pushing aside a conservative, proven, tested program of social security insurance that is a pay-as-you-go type of program into a special fund out of which tax revenues are directed for a particular purpose or purposes.

They reject that. They go on to say, "Let us dip into the general revenues of the Treasury for an undetermined amount to increase Federal assistance to the States." Then they depend upon State legislatures to act cooperatively to provide increased revenues from the States for a medical assistance program based upon a means test and the relief principle.

I cannot understand that. I think we should enact the Anderson proposal or the McNamara proposal or the bill I introduced, which related only to hospital and nursing home care. The bills sponsored by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE], and myself had a common denominator, namely, the social security insurance principle. That is the sound way to approach the problem. Those bills would provide free choice of hospitals. In the instance in which the McNamara bill relates to surgical care, there is provided a free choice of doctors.

That would have provided a sensible, sane way to pay the bill. The bill would have been paid not out of the general revenues, as the Finance Committee proposal indicates, but out of the special social security fund on a sound, actuarial basis.

The Governors of the 50 States have indicated their overwhelming approval, as the Senator from New Mexico pointed out. Every public opinion poll which has ever been taken on this subject has indicated that more than two-thirds of the people favor applying the social security principle to medical care for the people who are recipients of social security benefits. It seems to me that should be the approach.

Mr. President, I shall do my best to see to it that the Congress supports that principle. I shall do my best to see to it that the Democratic Party stands up for it, since we are committed to it in the platform.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. ANDERSON. If my colleagues will permit, I wish to conclude by saying that I am glad the able Senator has mentioned the problem of the means test. I had my first experience with this problem as a county relief administrator. I found that when we had case aids scattered all over the county we had to learn whether they were reading the same book or living up to the same standards, for in one area family after family went on relief, while in another area practically no family was on relief. The only way to solve that problem was to shift the aids around and to establish standards.

Subsequently I became a State relief administrator, while I was trying to run a private business at the same time. I found that we had the same problem with regard to individual counties that I had found to exist on the case aids. They had a different standard of need in one county as compared to another county.

Finally I became an administrator of a program for several States, and I found that the same thing was true with reference to the various States.

That is why it bothers me when I read such things as are found in section 1605:

> An eligible individual means any individual (1) who is 65 years of age or over and (2) whose income and resources, taking into account his other living requirements, as determined by the State, are insufficient to meet the cost of his medical service.

That is open to as many interpretations as there are States.

Shall we say that a man who has relatives who are rich has resources, or shall we eliminate the relative responsibility, as many States have done?

Shall we say that a man who owns his own home has resources? Shall we take it away from him piecemeal, item by item, as he needs medical care?

Shall we say that a man who has an income of $100 a month from social security has an income sufficient to live on? Will we make him dip into that month by month to pay a medical bill?

We may have as many variations on this theme as there are States and State administrators. As one who has seen hundreds of variations in the same field, I recognize how that could occur.

One of the worst riots in which I ever was caught in relief activity arose over a case of lace curtains. The question was, Should we give a relief client lace curtains in his house, and did he need lace curtains? It was my privilege to be called to the telephone in Salt Lake City, where the regional headquarters were then established. The Governor of Colorado at that time was Gov. Ed Johnson. He was being held inside his office by a raging mob of hundreds of people who demanded that he change the rules for eligibility before they would release him. He got out safely only when I was able to promise an additional sum of money in the name of Mr. Hopkins, which was to come to him a few days afterward.

If we want trouble, we can place this assistance upon the basis of 50 different States having 50 different living requirements and deciding whether people have income and resources adequate to meet the need.

I do not think we will have too much trouble with regard to those who are already under old-age assistance programs. I believe we will have a great deal of trouble when we try to create a new class of indigency in America, the medically indigent. I say that is a dangerous proposal, and I hope we shall not let it occur.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Would the Finance Committee bill depend upon State appropriations in part?

Mr. ANDERSON. In part.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Increased State appropriations?

Mr. ANDERSON. In part.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Would this not necessitate an increase in State taxes?

Mr. ANDERSON. I would rather not try to answer that question. I am not opposed to what is provided in the bill. As the able Senator from Louisiana pointed out earlier, in a State such as Louisiana it might be possible to readjust some of the overpayment which is already being made, over the $65 limit, so as to provide more medical care without any additional taxes. There are individual States in which that situation would be true, and other States where it would not be true.

I would rather have the Senator from Minnesota ask me a general question, as to which I could say that generally speaking it is anticipated there will be additional financial burdens on the States.

Mr. HUMPHREY. In the State of Minnesota we spend $20 million a year on medical care for the aged. That is a substantial sum of money. I ask the Senator from New Mexico if we are to be asked to spend more money under the Finance Committee bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have put away the table which had the figure for Minnesota on it. I am not able to answer the Senator's question immediately, because I do not carry the figure for every State in my mind.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The point I emphasize is that the real problem today in financing is a problem of local and State governments.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The State expenditures have gone up as much as 300 percent. Indebtedness of States has gone up fantastically. I have been a mayor of a large city, and I have some idea of the difficulty of operating local government with a limited taxing power.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have the table again, and can now answer the Senator's question.

Mr. HUMPRHEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ANDERSON. For the State of Minnesota, if I have the correct figure, the average is $91.49. The maximum in regard to which the Federal Government participates is $65. Therefore, some of the additional money Minnesota is now paying above the $65 might be turned over to the fund and might provide some additional benefits.

I hope that answers the Senator's question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. In other words, the State might receive some additional funds?

Mr. ANDERSON. From the first part of the bill, as the section is written, in the case of Minnesota, there might be provided some additional money without additional taxes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. For what people?

Mr. ANDERSON. It would be for all classes of people, but primarily it would be for the people on old age assistance.

Mr. HUMPHREY. For those on old age assistance?

Mr. ANDERSON. There could be some additional money for the medical indigent, once the State of Minnesota amended its law to make that provision.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The point I feel very strongly about, Mr. President, relates to the comment of the Senator from New Mexico when he talked about a new category of the medically indigent. There are people today, in substantial numbers in every State, who are receiving assistance in the form of medical care. That is all to the good. There has been a hard fight to have some of the bills enacted into law in the respective State legislatures, to take care of this problem.

However, what about the man who has a $2,000 a year income, for example, or slightly more? Let us say a man has $2,500 a year income, from the social security payments he receives and from what he can make, with the present limitation of $1,200. Is that man a medically indigent person? Is that man to be charged as one who will be the recipient of State aid? Or is that man to be put aside and be on his own?

If a person has $2,500 a year income and is put in a hospital, that income is practically nothing. All of us who have families who have had chronic illnesses know of this.

The thing that disturbs me is that Members of this Congress can go to the Bethesda Naval Hospital, or to Walter Reed Hospital and we can get all the medical attention we want. Every member of the Cabinet can get it, as can the President of the United States and the Vice President. When I speak of giving aid to the elderly people, I do not mean only the ones who are without money. When one is 65 or 68, whatever age is provided in the bill, and he is eligible for social security benefits, when we start talking about putting that person under a social security or a social insurance system, somebody says it is wrong.

I do not want to see people classified as medically indigent. I say that if such a person is entitled to social security benefits, and if we can add on a social security provision for medical care, paid for by a contribution from the individual as well as the employer, or paid for by the individual alone, if self-employed, such is a sound provision. I do not see any reason why we must hire another 10,000 social workers, even though I have the highest regard for that group as a profession, to go around investigating whether somebody who is going into a hospital for medical care meets the requirements of a "means test."

I wish to see the day in this country when, if one is eligible for social security benefits, and if he is ill, he may go into a hospital of his own choosing and receive medical care. I think this is the way it ought to be.

Of course, the committee bill, so far as I understand it, is an improvement over what we have. There is no doubt about it, and for that it is to be commended. But we have arrived at a point in the history of this country when the problem of medical care for our elderly people is a critical problem, just as 25 years ago, when the social security law was enacted. there was a critical problem of unemployment.

We have a rising rate of elderly people in the population. We shall have a great increase in the population of the elderly, and if we are going to try to take care of this group on the basis of public assistance, we shall have insurmountable problems. There is only one way to take care of the problem and that is to pay for it under the social security system, where there is a fund, and where there is a levy made to pay for it, rather than waiting around to see whether or not money can be appropriated by a State legislature every year, with the thousand and one demands on State legislatures, including demands for new schools and new colleges.

It is said that in the next 10 years we must double the university plant of State universities and colleges because of the population increase. There is a fantastic increase in school enrollment. There will be the greatest increase in school enrollment in the next 10 years, equal to that of the past 50 years. When State legislatures are asked to erect new schools, new universities, new highways, or to clean up cities, we should look at the tax base of those States. What is it? Most of the tax base of the States is property, real, tangible property. This is already overtaxed.

The answer, it seems to me, is to find a better means of financing. That is what the committee bill attempts to do. The committee bill does not provide that the people should not have medical care. It provides that they should have medical care. But it provides for such care on the basis of Federal-State public assistance, using the means tests for eligibility. The difference between us is not whether people should have medical care, but how they should have it. I, for one, do not believe that it is a wise public policy to predicate medical care for an ever-increasing number of people in this society on the principle of the means test and on the principle of public assistance. We need a predetermined financing means in terms of a levy or a tax for a special fund so that the bill can be paid and the insurance principle applied.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me? I do not want the floor; I merely wish to pay the Senator a compliment.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am happy to yield for that purpose.

Mr. CARLSON. I wish to say that the interest of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico in behalf of the social security program is not new.

He mentioned earlier that we had this year celebrated the 25th anniversary of the signing of the original Social Security Act. A program celebrating that event was held this afternoon at the Health, Education, and Welfare Building. I had the privilege of attending the program. I wish the Senator had had time to attend also. It was a very interesting session, I assure the Senator, and it brought back memories, as it would have to him, because he and I were both Members of the House of Representatives at the time that was passed.

I think he would be interested in knowing that Miss Perkins was present and made a very fine statement. She discussed some of the problems of the past, and some of the problems that the Senator has mentioned with respect to the new health program. There were problems at the time the Social Security Act was passed, and there are some problems involved in this bill. I would not say this afternoon that all the proposals the Senator has made are bad. I do not think the bill is the answer to the problem, but we will discuss those details when we get into the bill. It has some merit.

Mr. Folsom, who was the main speaker this afternoon at the 25th anniversary, made an outstanding statement of this program. As the Senator from New Mexico well knows, he started a program in his own company in 1921. I think he is one of the most outstanding men in this field and has been for many years. The national program partially—I will not say largely—was instituted through his urging and his background and ability in this field. He made an excellent statement. I urge the Senator to obtain a copy of it. He not only went into the history of the act, but into the facts of the program, which has now gone through a shakedown process. I think it is regarded as a very stable and necessary program, and one that means much to this Nation.

I mention that event because I went through some of the battles on that legislation with the distinguished Senator from New Mexico in 1939 when we rewrote the act. The Senator from New Mexico is not a Johnny-come-lately in this field. He is to be complimented on his statement. We will discuss and debate some of the issues in the program when the bill is before us for consideration.

Mr. ANDERSON. I thank my longtime friend.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, as one who has supported every social security bill, and I believe every public welfare bill, as well as every improvement of either program that has passed this body during the last 12 years, I am pleased to support the bill which the Senate committee reported. In my judgment it is a good bill. It will go a long way toward providing for the needs of the aged in terms of medical care, and it is the only assistance that we are likely to get for the aged at any time soon. The junior Senator from Louisiana has on occasion urged amendments to legislation when it was contended that such amendments might lead to a veto of the legislation if they were adopted, and will do so again. In many instances it was his hope either that the President would not veto the bill, or that if the President vetoed the bill, we might find the votes to override the veto. On other occasions the Senator from Louisiana has been willing to go along with amendments to bills. I have in mind particularly the Social Security bill of 1958, by which benefits for the aged and the orphaned children were to be materially increased. The junior Senator from Louisiana voted with those who made some reductions in what the committee would have liked to have for the needy, the aged, and the orphan children because he was certain that otherwise the bill would be vetoed, and in all probability the Congress would have adjourned without an opportunity of even trying to override the veto of the bill.

Practically, that is where we stand today with regard to the various medical plans that will be offered. The probabilities are that we will not achieve action if we undertake to enlarge the social security plan and blanket everyone under social security to obtain medical benefits for the aged. On the other hand the proposal that we have here is one that would provide immediate additional assistance to all the needy aged in this country, and additional assistance to all persons needing medical care for which they cannot pay and who are not presently classified as needy in all 50 States of the Union.

This measure would go into effect on October 1. It is a measure that we have every reason to expect the President to sign into law. It is the only real possibility of anything of any consequence being done between now and the time the next Congress has an opportunity to act on a social security bill, if the next Congress should see fit to act on one.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. CARLSON. The Senator has mentioned the fact that the proposed legislation, as it will be reported by the committee, would probably receive the approval of the President and become law. I wonder whether there is not another obstacle to be considered in connection with the enactment of legislation of this kind. A somewhat similar bill passed the House of Representatives, with only 23 votes cast against it. I wonder if the situation in the Ways and Means Committee—and I served on that committee and I know the thinking of the membership of that committee—and with only 23 votes having been cast against the bill in the House—I shall check on it to make sure of the vote—is not another situation that we should keep in mind, because the bill probably would have to go to conference.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Also, the proposal to have an additional social security tax levied, and to blanket everyone into the medical care provisions for benefits for which they have not paid, would undoubtedly run into trouble in the Rules Committee in the House. That would be an additional obstacle. As a practical matter, many Senators who are supporting substitute plans have told me and others in the cloakrooms that there is no prospect at all for those plans to be enacted at this session of Congress. In some instances the sponsors know that this is a political issue, and that they are proposing a political issue to take to the country, rather than supporting legislation which can become effective immediately.

A great deal has been said about a means test, about making people submit to indignities in order to obtain the Federal-State payment of medical bills of those who are over the age of 65. The junior Senator from Louisiana has been opposed to anything that keeps a larger number of aged people from receiving public assistance. In many States there is the concept of relative responsibility. The State of Louisiana does not require it in order for a person to be eligible for public assistance. The relative responsibility requirement usually relates to the fact that a son or daughter or some other relative who is able to provide for an aged person should first provide for his relatives and the old person is prevented from receiving public assistance if his relative is able to help him.

As one who opposes this type of requirement, the junior Senator from Louisiana realizes that in many instances the relative responsibility requirement has prevented aged people from receiving the public assistance to which they are entitled because the needy persons are ashamed to admit, or ashamed to say under oath, that their children cannot or will not support them; and rather than ask their children to say that they cannot support the old folks, they simply decline to request any public assistance, because they are too proud to do so.

In Louisiana we do not have a relative responsibility provision in our public welfare laws. The Federal law does not require it, and the State of Louisiana does not require it.

We are proud that we do not require it. We believe that if the aged people feel that they need assistance, they are entitled to apply for it, and we feel that they should not be prevented from receiving assistance because they have relatives who could if they would—in most instances they would not—provide for the old people.

The next provision which keeps a great number of aged people from receiving public assistance is the so-called lien requirement. This is usually a requirement whereby an aged person is asked to sign a lien on whatever property he possesses, usually on real property, so that the property can be seized by the State and sold to get back the money that has been paid to the poor person in public assistance after the person has passed on.

Once again, many aged people—and I believe this applies to a great majority of them—feel so close to their property, and have always had the concept that they must never part with their property, that many of them will not sign any agreement that would permit their property to be sold under foreclosure procedure, even though it cannot be sold until after their death. They will not sign it. That is another way from keeping old folks from getting assistance to which they are entitled.

In Louisiana we do not have the poorhouse approach to public assistance. A person can have money in the bank, can own a home, can own a small piece of property, and can own an insurance policy, and still receive the maximum amount of public assistance under a program in which the Federal Government matches the States in order to provide for that person.

In Louisiana 57 percent of the persons over 65 years of age receive some degree of public assistance. The average payment is about $71 a month.

So far as all these people are concerned, the bill makes it possible for the Federal Government to match an additional $12 per capita. The State of Louisiana is already providing an extra $6 a month, on the average, with no Federal matching at all, in order to provide for 57 percent of those who are over 65 in Louisiana and are at present receiving public assistance.

Every other State can do the same thing if it wishes to do so. If they do not want to dispense with the relative responsibility requirement for public assistance, or do away with the lien requirement, they can still set up a separate category under the bill that we will report to the Senate.

This can be a very liberal plan. It can permit people to have a substantial amount of money in the bank, to own homes, to hold insurance policies, and still receive the State payment with a Federal-aid program paying the entire medical bill.

It has been said by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], that the people affected would have to take a pauper's oath before they could apply for some sort of assistance. That is not so. They could go to the hospital or go to the doctor, and get whatever medical treatment they need. After they had been in the hospital, whether it be a day or thirty days or a hundred days or a year, they would then simply sign a statement that in their opinion they were eligible to have their hospital bill paid under this program.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Is the Senator describing the situation in Louisiana?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Yes. That would be true in Louisiana. However, Tennessee, as the Senator knows, can organize its medical program on an entirely different basis for those who are under the old-age assistance program, and permit them to have a liberal amount of property in their names, or have cash in the bank, and still receive this type of assistance in the payment of their medical bills.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its deliberations today, it stand in adjournment until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I announce that I discussed this request with the minority leader, and it is our hope that there can be some votes tomorrow. We do not expect any votes after 10 o'clock tomorrow, although we expect to be in sessions longer than 10 o'clock, unless an amendment is pending.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CARLSON. Do I understand that there will be no votes this evening?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I hope there will be some, but I have been informed that Senators did not expect to vote this evening. While I would like to have that opportunity present itself, I am informed that there will not be any.

MEDICAL CARE FOR THE AGED

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I should like to make it clear that a State can require relative responsibility if it wishes to do so, but it does not have to do so. Under the bill, a State can establish a completely different requirement for medical care beyond the public assistance program, which would not necessarily fall under the standard of the public assistance program. So a State can say it wants to insist on relative responsibility in order for a person to receive old age assistance for food, housing, and lodging. On the other hand, so far as medical care is concerned, the bill provides that a State can dispense with the relative responsibility requirement, and provide that even though a person has a relative worth of a million dollars or $20 million, that person can nevertheless have his hospital bills paid under the Federal-State matching program, if the person qualifies.

The most liberal qualifications can be provided—far more liberal than anything which exists in Louisiana, which is the most liberal State so far as eligibility requirements for public assistance are concerned.

Reference has been made to Blue Cross policies, and the question has been asked: What would be the situation under Blue Cross? If a person had a Blue Cross policy which provided that he would be entitled to have Blue Cross insurance paid for the first 30 days in the hospital, then obviously, under the most liberal requirements anyone can conceive of, he needs no help in making his payments for the first 30 days. They have already been taken care of.

But suppose the 30 days have elapsed, and suppose he has been in the hospital for another 60 or 80 or 100 days, if the State will match the Federal Government—and the Federal Government will provide 80 percent of the funds in some cases; then the program would pay for the additional 60, 80, or 100 days the person might be in the hospital.

Reference has been made to the way the program will be paid for. Here, I believe, is a fundamental conflict in thinking between those who propose that the social security tax be increased and those who propose that the cost should be paid out of general revenues. In either event, whether we speak about a person getting medical treatment as a matter of right or not, those who will be getting such aid for the next several years will be those who have never paid for it. In either event, the aged people who will be getting their medical care at State and Federal expense will be those for whom it has been voted, and it will be paid for by the general taxpayers, on the one hand, or by the workingman and his employer, on the other.

Let us see where the tax will fall in the event the program is paid for under the social security approach. As has been pointed out, 40 percent of income is not taxed under the social security tax. What 40 percent of income is that? For the most part, it is the income of persons whose income exceeds $4,800 a year, with the exception of a few exempt categories. In general, the social security tax can be described as a tax on consumption. That is a tax which the workingman making $3,000 a year, having a wife and five children, will pay, although he will not be paying any income tax. That man is exempt from the income tax because of the number of exemptions he has and because he cannot afford to pay an income tax. But he is hit with a social security tax, because it is felt that he should pay for the benefit of the protection he will receive for himself and his family.

That is a tax on the poorest of them. It is a tax on the people who cannot afford to pay an income tax. On the other hand, those receiving the 40 percent of income not subject to social security tax are people who are able to pay more in taxes than they are paying now. We heard much complaint about this matter at the Democratic convention. Many Democrats felt that some persons should be paying more taxes than they are paying now. Those are the people who would not be paying much if anything for these medical costs.

In other words, a man who makes $50,000 a year pays a social security on the first $4,800. But on the other $45,200, he pays no social security tax.

So if it is desired to confer a benefit on the aged by a regressive tax, by a tax which the poor man pays much, while the rich man pays little; if that is how it is desired to pay for the medical benefits for the aged, then one should vote to raise security tax.

We have many aged people with us. If it is desired to pay for their medical care by taxing those best able to contribute their share, for the benefit of those who need to have their medical bills paid, the best way is to vote for the committee bill.

So far as the taxation proposal is concerned, if the labor unions want to be fair—and they are the ones who have been pressing the plan for a social security tax, they themselves would be the first to admit that the fairest way to raise money to provide all these benefits is by general revenue, under which everyone pays in relation to his ability to pay. As a matter of fact, under the McNamara plan and the Gore plan—I know for certain under the McNamara plan, and perhaps under the Gore plan—it is recognized that it would not be fair to tax the workingman to provide public assistance to the aged who are not under social security. So it is provided that the general revenues be used as the source to provide the money to finance the care of their needs rather than by means of an increased social security tax. The money would come from general revenues to take care of the aged persons who are not covered by social security today.

Generally speaking, those who are already drawing social security benefits are not to pay for the benefits they are to receive. Others are paying for them. Others are giving the benefits to them—and it is being given in either event. Then why should this group, any more than other aged persons have their medical care financed by the most regressive type of taxation, taxation which hits most at the poor man and least at the rich?

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SMATHERS. Would not the Senator agree that the suggested social security tax approach is somewhat similar to the sales tax type of operation? One pays a sales tax irrespective of almost how much income he has, and the sales tax falls most heavily, in most instances, upon those who are least able to pay it.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The social security tax is more regressive than a sales tax. Suppose a man earns $1 million a year. He pays a flat 3 percent social security tax on only the first $4,800. The rest of that $1 million is not taxed for social security purposes. By contrast the tax on his income goes up to 90 percent.

Mr. SMATHERS. As I had understood, most labor unions, historically, have opposed the sales tax on the basis that it weighs most heavily on those least able to pay, and permits those having high incomes to pay, in effect, only a small percentage.

What I do not understand is why, if the labor unions are opposed to the philosophy of the sales tax in ordinary tax procedures, they should favor such a philosophy in this particular instance rather than to proceed under a plan as the Senator from Louisiana has pointed out, under which general revenues would be used, since they are raised on the basis of payments made by those having the greatest ability to pay.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. So far as the question of who will pay for the benefits is concerned, let us not delude ourselves. From the point of view of the labor unions, if the principle of paying out of the general revenues is to be compared with levying a tax on the working man himself, this proposal is better than anything the labor unions have ever dreamed they were going to get. They never dreamed it could be so good.

I have sometimes discussed with friends in organized labor a proposal which I favor.

I have urged them to go along with a proposal to blanket aged people on public assistance under the social security program. Their answer to that proposal has always been that they would favor it, but not if the workingman has to pay for it through a social security tax. If the cost were to be paid for out of general revenues, the unions would be delighted to see that done. On the other hand, if the workingman were to be made to pay for such a program in order to provide for retired housewives, farmers, dentists, doctors, clergymen, and veterinarians, who have never contributed to the social security fund in the past, they want to protect the workingman from the increased tax to pay for it. They do not want to have the workingman taxed in order to take care of the welfare of persons in the categories I have described. However, they are perfectly willing to support a proposal to blanket those people under social security, provided the cost will be paid by general revenues.

I do not believe the labor unions ever dreamed they would see the day when adequate medical care could be provided from the general revenues. They would be willing to support such a program if they could get it.

The real reason why the labor unions prefer the social security approach is that they are fearful that the States will not match the amount of money which would be made available by the Federal Government. I can understand how they would have some fear in that respect.

But the practical matter is, as the Senator from Florida knows as well as I do, that the unions are working to get a bill which will provide greater benefits than they think the States will provide.

If the States take advantage of the bill we shall propose, they can provide at least twice as much, and in the poorer States they can provide four times as much as they are presently doing.

So under the bill we propose, the Federal Government would match everything we are doing. In the poorer States, the Federal Government will match $4 to $1 to provide additional care for the aged.

Mr. SMATHERS. Is it not also a fact—judging from what we have heard about the action of the other body and about what might happen at the White House—that this proposal is the only one which could be enacted at this short session? So if, in truth and in fact, we wish to give aid and comfort to the aged who need medical care, is not this the only course for us to follow?

On the other hand, if we follow the other course, we might then have a great political issue during the campaign; but none of the other measures is even supposed to start functioning until July 1961. So the elderly persons who want immediate medical attention, and in some instances need it, can get it only if we follow this course.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. That is correct.

For instance, suppose my mother owned no more than her own home and perhaps an automobile and had a few thousand dollars in the bank or in an insurance policy. I believe that is the situation of the mothers of a great many persons in my age bracket. If she needed assistance because she was in a hospital, the difference between her situation as a result of enactment of this committee bill, and her situation as a result of Senate adoption of one of the substitute proposals would be very considerable. In Louisiana and, I believe, in most of the other States, under the provisions of this bill her entire hospital bill, all her expenses while in the hospital, including every item, room, board, surgeon's fees, pharmaceutical and drug charges, and so forth—would be paid, whereas all that the substitute bill would give her would be a political issue to discuss after the next election.

I am not sure that we are going to win the election I would rather pay her bill than offer her a political issue in November.

Mr. SMATHERS. A political issue would be of very little help to her, would it not?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Of course.

The Senator from Florida knows that at the time our committee had made very liberal provisions for the needy. We received word, through channels, that the bill we had been working on would be vetoed; and we also realized that the session was soon to adjourn. So I urged the Senator from Florida to offer amendments to reduce the full measure of the benefits we had recommended on the theory that it would then be possible to enact the bill. I realized that our more liberal proposals would be vetoed and, could not be enacted at that time. In short, we realized that the situation was such that the only possible choice then available was to settle for a good bill or to demand too much and get nothing.

So the Senator from Florida offered his amendments and they prevailed. Our bill resulted in having an increase of $8 a month, or $96 a year, made available to the aged in Louisiana and similar increases in other States, whereas if we had not adopted those amendments, the needy aged would not have received any increase because the bill would never have become law.

So I was happy to go along with the amendments of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SMATHERS. Let me say that I would not have offered the amendments if it had not been for the urging of the able Senator from Louisiana, who, I think, knows more about the subject of help to the aged in the Nation than does any other Member of this body. So when he came to me and informed me that the bill would be vetoed unless we minimized the benefits called for by the proposed legislation, it was upon his urging that I submitted the amendments, because I knew that his interest was in helping the elderly people, not only those in his State, but all the elderly people in the Nation; and I knew that he would not have urged that course if he had not known that that was the only practical course that could be followed.

So it is, Mr. President, that I am quite willing to follow the suggestion of the Senator from Louisiana in the case of this bill.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator from Florida is very generous.

I am sure he recalls that at the time we realized that the session was about to adjourn—within a week, in fact—and that Congress would not even have an opportunity to try to override a veto, should the bill be vetoed as we anticipated.

We now have the same situation; namely, that it is better to get something, rather than nothing.

In short, under the committee bill any State will be in a position to have what it already is providing matched by means of Federal assistance, with the result that the State's present program will at least be doubled; and the poorer States will be able in that way to have their existing programs increased fourfold, for the assistance of persons over 65 years of age.

Furthermore, a pauper's oath will not be required. It is envisaged that, under this program, if a State is desirous of doing so, it will be able to provide the most liberal qualifications within reason.

There has been talk about indigents. Those who are sponsoring this program are not talking about the aged people as if they were indigent. We definitely have in mind that many of the people whom we would like to see eligible under this program own their own homes and have valuable assets, but simply do not have enough so that they feel they can pay these medical bills. Within any rule of reason, a State can be as liberal as it wants to be in connection with this program, and still can receive from 50 percent to 80 percent Federal participation.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further to me?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. SMATHERS. I may say that there are a large number of elderly people in Florida, and many of them have some income, but not enough to be able to pay for what we call catastrophic illness—in other words, a major operation or a long stay in a hospital.

Under our present program in the State, which would be supplemented by the Federal funds provided under this bill, we now have a definition or category of "medically indigent," as distinguished from otherwise being indigent. We have people who have homes and automobiles and some income, but who, notwithstanding that, can have their own doctor certify that they do not have sufficient funds to pay for the cost of such an operation or for the necessary care in the hospital. Once the doctor signs that certificate, the agencies in charge "pick up the check" for that particular operation or for that period of hospital care. That is of great assistance to many persons; and they do not have to be on public assistance. For instance, one who had a number of children might not be able to pay the cost of a major operation or pay for a long stay in the hospital for one of his children.

As of today, that help can be received; and under the provisions of this bill the amount would be doubled. Of course I assume that the benefits would be made available even to those in higher income brackets.

So I think this is the best approach in order to meet the problem.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I thank the Senator from Florida.

There is an additional problem—namely, that unless there is some restraint on the amount of money spent on medical care there is no limit to the amount which can be spent. I make that point because in Louisiana half the hospital beds available are in the State hospitals; and for care in the State hospitals the entire bill is paid by the State. We find that in Louisiana the number of hospital days for a given illness is substantially greater in the case of patients in State hospitals than it is in the case of patients in private hospitals. In other words, if a man is paying the hospital bill, the minute his doctor tells him he could go home he leaves the hospital, in order to reduce the expense. When he returns home, his wife or other members of his family take care of him. That is particularly true of old folks who have relatives. After the old folks have been in the hospital a while, often they are told they can leave, if they wish to do so, if there is someone at home who can take care of them.

If they know they can stay in the hospital a week or so longer and can receive all their meals at public expense and can have all the hospital care made available to them at public expense, many would really prefer to stay there a while longer, and so would their families. In other words, in such cases the State itself pays for the cost of their convalescence, whereas their doctors realize that they are able to return home and be at home during their period of convalescence. Such practical considerations play a considerable part, with the result that the bill the State has to pay is greater than it otherwise would be. A good State administrator will try to keep his cost in line with the hospital costs in private hospitals.

The point to bear in mind is that, when the State puts up some of the money, that makes for a certain amount of responsibility on the part of someone who concerns himself with keeping down the amount of the bill; he tries very hard to avoid spending any more than necessary in the individual cases.

Therefore, Mr. President, I make the point that all that the States presently are doing can at least be doubled under the provisions of this bill, and in many cases can be increased by as much as fourfold, and that the method of paying the bill under this proposal is much fairer—by paying it out of general revenues—than by having it paid by means of a tax on payrolls.

The measure which will be reported by the committee means immediate additional assistance for the aged, while the substitutes that will be offered will, for the most part, be offering an issue to take to the people who will vote in November, rather than representing some immediate effective legislation to provide medical care for the aged who are in need of it in this great land of ours.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RESOLUTION BY ARIZONA STATE BAR ASSOCIATION RELATING TO CONNALLY AMENDMENT

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, at the annual State convention of the Arizona Bar Association, a resolution was adopted objecting to the suggestion that the Connally amendment be destroyed.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION 1

Resolution relating to Connally amendment

Whereas the settlement of international disputes by rule of law rather than by force is in accord with the political ethics and legal philosophy of the American people; and

Whereas the fostering of peace among nations through the judicious application of the rule of law is a proper objective of the legal profession; and

Whereas the International Court of Justice is the most universal and influential judicial body for the determination of international disputes; and

Whereas the United States of America has accepted the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice only with a reservation which excludes from the jurisdiction of the Court disputes "with regard to matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States of America as determined by the United States of America"; and

Whereas the reservation contained in the last eight words of the quoted portion (also known as the Connally amendment) constitutes a "self-judging" provision out of keeping with customary judicial procedure and inconsistent with disinterested adjudication; and

Whereas the reservation of the Connally amendment extends self-judging benefits to any other nation in litigation with the United States of America before the International Court of Justice and deprives that Court of its effective jurisdiction in all cases in which the United States of America might be a disputing party: now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the State Bar of Arizona urges the repeal of the Connally amendment by the deletion of the words "as determined by the United States of America" in the reservation excluding from the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice those disputes in regard to matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States of America; and be it further

Resolved, That the U.S. Senators from the State of Arizona be advised of the opinion and action of the State Bar of Arizona as expressed in this resolution, and be requested to support the repeal of the Connally amendment.

Whereas the Senate of the United States, in advising and consenting to a declaration of adherence by the United States to the International Court of Justice, recognized as compulsory the jurisdiction of that Court in all legal disputes concerning questions of international law, but added to its consent a proviso known as the Connally reservation, to the effect that its declaration of adherence to the Court should not apply to "disputes with regard to matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States of America as determined by the United States of America"; and

Whereas there has been introduced in the Senate of the United States Resolution 94, and other legislation is being proposed, for repeal of the Connally reservation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the State bar of Arizona, in convention assembled at Chandler, Ariz., this 9th day of April 1960, That in light of international developments during the past decade the State Bar of Arizona opposes Resolution No. 94 pending in the U.S. Senate and any and all legislation for repeal of the Connally reservation to the declaration of adherence by the United States to the International Court of Justice; and be it further

Resolved, That the executive secretary of the State bar of Arizona forward a copy of the foregoing resolution to the Arizona congressional delegation, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the Senate of the United States, and to the American Bar Association.

PROCUREMENT OF GOVERNMENT SUPPLIES

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, on July 1, 1960, my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], addressed the Senate at considerable length and exhibited a number of items in pursuance of his contention of waste and extravagance in the procurement of Government supplies. His remarks appear on pages 15311–15315 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for that date.

I deemed it appropriate to make some inquiry of the Defense Department with respect to these charges and allegations, and in due course the Assistant Secretary of Defense sent me an extended memorandum with respect to such charges. I believe it not only proper and appropriate, but also necessary that the whole story be told; and I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that this memorandum be made a part of my remarks and printed in the body of the RECORD.

This memorandum is in three parts. The first part deals with the assertions that the Department of Defense has paid contract prices which are substantially higher than those for which the same items could have been bought from local commercial sources. The second part is an analysis of the 10 items which were dealt with in the Senator's speech. Part III contains background information. I am sure this analysis will throw much light upon the allegations which were made.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONCLUSIONS WITH RESPECT TO SENATOR DOUGLAS' RECENT ASSERTION THAT THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE HAS PAID CONTRACT PRICES WHICH ARE SUBSTANTIALLY HIGHER THAN THOSE FOR WHICH THE SAME ITEMS COULD HAVE BEEN BOUGHT FROM LOCAL COMMERCIAL SOURCES

PART I

Conclusions

Following a study of the 10 items presented by Senator DOUGLAS to support his allegation of wasteful practices in the supply system of the Department of Defense, the Department has concluded that there is no evidence of its having paid excessive prices for these 10 items.

Detailed fact sheets to support this conclusion are attached.

As pointed out in these fact sheets, the prices reported by Senator DOUGLAS, although taken from our surplus property reports, were not the prices paid by the Department when it originally purchased 7 of the 10 items.

As will also appear from these fact sheets, seven of the items were necessarily of experimental or specialized design or construction which made them quite different from the items with which the Senator compared them. The military need for exacting performance of these items was not readily apparent by physically looking at them.

As further information, surplus property, when transferred to another agency of the government, Federal or State, is transferred at no charge other than for packing and transportation. There is no limitation placed upon the amount of property which may be donated to such agencies. Items of surplus property available without charge to such governmental agencies are, like all other items of surplus property, in widely varying conditions due to wear and loss of parts. Hence, the using activities have the full responsibility for determining, before ordering, that the items are in such condition as to be useful to them. The Department of Defense makes no representation as to the present market value of the items, which are frequently worn or, in some cases, useful only as scrap.

PART II

Item 1. Cable, operator headset

Allegation

"This item, which the military purchased, consists of about 4 feet of cable with a plug at each end. According to the Air Force invoice, it was procured at a cost of $10.67 under the Air Force negotiated contract, or so they say. I will not publicly name the contractor or the location of the material. However, I have had a member of my staff procure the same item—or it seems to be a little better item—from a small electronics vendor in the suburbs of Washington. He paid $1.50 for this same, or very similar item.

"I hold in my hand an item purchased by the Air Force for $10.67. Now I exhibit the item which we purchased for $1.50. I hold both of these items in my hand so that they can be compared.

"In other words, under this negotiated contract the Air Force was charged at least six times the value of this item, and it was so charged under a negotiated contract."

Department of Defense Reply

Two extension cables were manufactured by the prime contractor, Nuclear Products—ERCO Division, ACF Industries, in 1957, as a spare part item for a Cockpit Procedures Trainer (F–104A). The characteristics of the particular headset were reliability and mobility so that the instructor could direct the trainee in changes in flight training conditions. This means freedom of movement for the instructor within a 7- to 8-foot radius. The peculiar requirements for this cable extension were that it must avoid interference and must fit with the hanging connector normally supplied on the standard Air Force headset.

A connecting jack was needed which would connect with the plug on the headset. This is a standard jack meeting military requirements, which at the time of procurement sold for $2.70 each. Today the price is higher. The extension cable involved would permit any Air Force pilot to walk in and connect his headset in his helmet to the trainer equipment. To use a connector not meeting military standards would require the provision of special headsets at considerably greater prices than were paid for this headset cable.

The item must meet military standards and specifications and the contractor was required to furnish drawings to allow procurement at a later date of identical replacement units.

The cable operator headset purchased by Senator DOUGLAS' staff was not the same item "or a little better one." It would not work with the standard Air Force headset equipment because the jack (at the end of the cable) was not designed to fit the plug on the headset. These fittings are not of military standard, size, or quality and the plug was of Japanese manufacture.

Item 2. Wrench sets with case

Allegation

"The second item is a small wrench set with case. It was procured by the Army. The acquisition cost is given at $29. Incidentally, it came with some of the items missing.

"I hold in my hand an advertisement of the Pep Boys. I did not know that there was a concern known as the Pep Boys, but apparently there is. According to the advertisement, they will sell a similar wrench set for $3.89. But in addition, the General Services Administration also carries a similar set on its books—and I offer it for display—and it is a better set—for $4.50. The Army says that its acquisition of this set cost $29. The General Services Administration will sell it for $4.50."

Department of Defense Reply

The Army reports that it has bought no wrench sets of this specific type and quality since World War II.

The item that was displayed by Senator DOUGLAS was declared surplus by the National Security Agency in 1958, and a price for record purposes was then established at $29. The specific set displayed by Senator DOUGLAS is not complete and contains worn and substitute tools. As no Army purchase action has been taken on this item since World War II, the actual purchase price is not available as all applicable records have been destroyed. Under these circumstances the price that was obtained for record purposes in connection with the declaration of surplus of these items was obtained from the then current Teletype Corp. catalogue price list of December 1957. This was done because the stock number assigned to this set indicated that the set had originally been purchased from the Teletype Corp. Under no circumstances would the Army have paid the full list price because they would have obtained Government discounts.

The toolkit carried by GSA (somewhat different in tool arrangement and of much better quality than the Pep Boys kit) has been found to have different tool components than the original wrench set which was declared surplus. The major difference is that the Pep Boys kit and the GSA kit are composed entirely of socket wrench sets whereas the surplus wrench set originally contained an arrangement of sockets, open end miniature wrenches, and a special miniature plier. In commenting on this set to Senator DOUGLAS, GSA said: "GSA offers a set (not claimed as alike or comparable) through its stores depot system at an issue price of $4.50."

Where there is a need for small quantities of special purpose toolkits, such as those handled by the Teletype Corp. for use with its equipment, purchase may be made direct from that company. The Navy has bought 42 such toolkits through several small purchases in the period 1957–59. All procurements were made from the Teletype Corp. at Government discount rates of 32 percent to 38 percent below list price. There is no record that any of these sets have been declared surplus by the Navy.

Item 3. Lamp sockets

Allegation

"Let me take my third item, which is a small socket for a lamp. This box contains 500 of these small sockets. * * * Here is the price tag. * * * They cost $21.10 * * * apiece. Here is the invoice. These small sockets cost $10,550, so the military says. We have a letter from the General Services Administration corroborating that fact. * * * We had a similar item priced at a College Park, Md., electronics retail store. * * * The private dealer said it was worth 25 cents. The invoice states it was purchased for the Government at $21.10. Here is a boxful which ought not to have cost more than $125, but which, so the military says—so the Navy invoice says—was purchased for $10,500."

Department of Defense Reply

The lampsocket in question has been used on equipments in the Navy since before World War II. However, the earliest recorded purchase of the item was in 1947 at a price of 43 cents. Since the 1947 purchase, several additional purchases have been made at prices ranging from 43 cents to $1.10. The high of $1.10 was related to a special requirement for oversea packing and preservation. Examination of available procurement papers covering these purchases indicates that an average price of 60 cents each was paid for the sockets.

The information supplied to Senator DOUGLAS and the General Services Administration was erroneous in that a clerical error was made in applying the price and stock number of a complete lampholder assembly, including the socket, to the socket itself. This price of $21.10 was never paid for the sockets alone.

There is no record that these individual lampsockets have been bought since 1954. The Navy is informed that the present price, from the manufacturer of individual sockets, is 25 cents each in lots of 100 or more. A socket of this size was purchased last week from the only retail store which we could find that carried it in the College Park, Md., area. The price was 33 cents.

It is obviously of much poorer quality than the Navy socket.

The lampholder assembly of which the individual sockets are a part are used on numerous shipboard equipments including the Mark 56 fire-control equipment. These uses require a high degree of reliability.

Item 4. Electronic delay line

Allegation

"Let us take Item No. 4, an electric delay line of the so-called bull model. This item was procured by the Air Force under a negotiated contract at a cost * * * $250 * * *. The company said that the item cost from $300 to $500 when engineered.

"I have had a staff man price this item at a private firm. My source, an electronics supply firm, estimated that it would cost at most $40 if purchased singly, or $24 if bought wholesale, as the Government would buy."

Department of Defense Reply

Five different types of ultrasonic electronic delay lines were purchased from four different sources by Bendix Radio, an Air Force subcontractor. The item declared surplus was an experimental, quartz crystal, hermetically sealed miniature delay line made specially to order for this contract.

Of the five delay lines mentioned above, the prices submitted ranged from $40 to $325. After full evaluation, the delay line of Labortory for Electronics was selected as the most suitable. Its initial price for the experimental sample was $250. The delay line purchased by Bendix from Anderson Laboratories (the one declared surplus) cost $325 although it was erroneously reported in surplus and to Senator DOUGLAS at $250. As a result of the technical engineering evaluation, six production models were then purchased from Laboratory for Electronics for $125 each.

These delay lines were urgently needed to test their suitability as a vital component of the electronic gear within a mother plane to guide an airborne drone (small unmanned aircraft) which was being developed for the purpose of seeking and destroying enemy radar sites. This use of a delay line was an unusual and novel application requiring very special characteristics.

The only commercial, stock item delay lines which are used are in color television. These were not suitable for use with this drone since in commercial-type delay lines the first signal is followed by echoes. These confuse the directing finding function and would cause errors and send the missile in a wrong direction. The delay line manufactured by Anderson Laboratories is a military item, different from anything that can be bought normally at an electronic supply house.

Item 5. Blower—Bull models

Allegation

"Item No. 5 is a blower, bull model, with miscellaneous components. This item, which everyone can see, consists of three small wires, a small amount of metal, and a small, fanlike blower. * * * The invoice shows that amount ($50), and the General Services Administration corroborates that fact. We have the contract number; it was a negotiated contract. The General Services Administration checked back on the price." In press reports, the Senator was quoted as saying that an independent firm appraised the value at $6 each or $3.60 each when purchased in quantity.

Department of Defense Reply

The Senator's reference to the smallness is the key to the cost of the item. The information supplied from the disposal papers to GSA for the Senator stated that the price of $50 each was established in a purchase order issued by Bendix to Globe Industries, Inc., Dayton, Ohio. This blower was a very small, high-performance type required to cool a complex and exceedingly compact electronic unit within the mother plane which was part of the equipment to guide an experimental airborne drone to be used for the purpose of destroying hostile radar sites. Bendix Radio, an Air Force subcontractor, bought six blowers from Globe Industries, at a price $50 each. At the time of purchase, in June 1956, Globe Industries was the only manufacturer which had built a qualified blower to comply with specialized characteristics as follows:

A. 115 volt, 400 cycle, single-phase, capacitor start.

B. No load speed 24,000 revolutions per minute, minimum speed under load 15,000 revolutions per minute.

C. Life 500 hours continuous.

D. Operating temperature minus 55° to plus 85° centigrade.

E. Operating altitude 30,000 feet.

F. Humidity, salt spray, fungus, vibration, shock tests.

These are special requirements for application of the blower to aircraft and could not be met by any commercially available blower which could reasonably be appraised at $6 or $3.50. The requirements for this blower, as to compactness and the amount of air to be moved, are far more demanding than can be met by normal commercial blowers. The biggest dimension of this blower is two inches from tip to tip of the fan blade. The motor of the blower alone today costs $35 in quantity lots.

Item 6. Aluminum gage blocks

Allegation

"Now we come to a rather interesting item, the so-called gage blocks. These are merely pieces of aluminum. They are supposed to measure off short distances. * * * I may say that the piece is not even and that a line drawn along the 2-inch side would not be particularly accurate or straight, although that is the purpose of a genuine gage block. It is not a gage block; it is rather, a substitute—a strip of aluminum just as it came from the mill, with no machining having been used. The dimensions are quite uneven. It could never be used to draw a truly straight line.

"These were procured by the Air Force, this time supposedly under a competitive contract. * * * They cost $10 apiece. I have here the records showing they cost $10 apiece; three of them, $30.

"We obtained a comparable piece of metal made of steel. It is straighter than the other piece. A staff member procured it for 50 cents from a small machine company in the Washington suburbs.

"At most, a genuine gage block of this kind would not cost more than $2; but here is an ersatz gage block, which is quite uneven on one side, which is nothing more than a piece of aluminum 4 inches long, 2 inches wide, and a quarter of an inch thick, for which the Air Force said it paid $10."

Senator DOUGLAS said that the item he displayed is not a gage block but a strip of unmachined aluminum. We agree. The foreman who was responsible for making these tools does not recognize these blocks and agrees that this item shown by Senator DOUGLAS is scrap.

The item referred to by Senator DOUGLAS in the invoice was part of the total special tooling purchased by the prime contractor, General Electric, in 1956, for use in the machining and assembly of six rocket sleds to be utilized in testing the Mark II nose cone of the Atlas missile. The prime contract was a research and development effort.

The prime contractor obtained competitive bids from four qualified manufacturers for the machining and assembly of six rocket sleds from materials and hardware furnished by the prime contractor. Miller Research Laboratory, the successful bidder, was awarded a subcontract at a fixed price of $19,485, plus special tooling which was priced at $495, or a total price of $19,980 for the contract. The individual items of tooling were not purchased or priced separately as they were part of the overall tooling contract.

The figures of $10 each for three aluminum gages, $8.19 each for four transfer punches, $9.65 each for eight drill bushings, and $11 each for three locating plugs, all of which appeared on the surplus property declaration, were obtained as estimates from the subcontractor in a report to the prime contractor after completion of the contract. The $10 figure for the gage blocks was erroneously confirmed to Senator DOUGLAS as the purchase price.

On November 15, 1956, General Electric telegraphed Miller to go ahead and build the sleds. Delivery of the first sled was required by December 31, 1956, with one sled every 12 days thereafter. All of these items of special tooling were nonstandard, had to be designed for this particular sled contract and, while they could have been made by a tooling manufacturer, Miller found it impossible to obtain them by purchase in the required time.

The sleds were precision structures requiring stability, exactly the same dimensions and parts interchangeability. The gage blocks were used for preliminary alinement of the shoe and the frame of the rocket sled and then were removed and the final alinement set by micrometer. Aluminum was used to prevent scoring of the shoe finish. The block had to be designed for this precise application. An ordinary steel block would not serve the purpose.

This and the other items of tooling are shown as having been delivered to the State of Maryland by the subcontractor in 1958. With the exception of the large diameter transfer punch (approximately one-half inch), the items held by Senator DOUGLAS cannot be identified as part of this special tooling.

Item 7. Locating plugs, steel, one-half inch

Allegation

"Item No. 7 is three steel locating plugs, which I hold in my hand, and for which the Air Force states it was charged $11 apiece, or $33. They are about 3 inches long, with some machining at one end, which is very rough. There is probably no similar commercial article; but, at most, such an item could not conceivably be forth more than $1. As a matter of fact, it is probably worth a good deal less than that. A private appraiser has fixed the true value at 25 cents or 50 cents at most. But the Air Force paid $11 apiece."

Item 8. Small transfer punches

Allegation

"Item No. 8 consists of four small transfer punches, which are nothing more than small metal cylinders of 2 inches or less in length, and varying in diameter from one-eighth to one-half inch. They are very roughly machined, and at the end of each is a small metal extension which could be used to make, on metal, small punchmarks about the size of an end-of-a-sentence period made by a typewriter.

"The acquisition cost for four of these was $32.75, or $8.18 apiece.

"If one wanted to make a generous estimate, they would not be worth more than 25 cents apiece, or $1 in all for the four items which the Air Force states it procured for $32.75."

They are small pieces of metal pipe of from one-half inch to an inch in both length and diameter and which give no appearance of having been machined to any minute tolerances. The acquisition cost for these eight small bushings was $77.25, or $9.65 apiece. Again, their real value, according to a machine shop appraiser, could be no more than 25 cents to 50 cents apiece, if that. They were procured by the Air Force."

Item 10. Assorted wrenches

Allegation

"Item No. 10 consisted originally of 5,739 small wrenches and assorted minor items of which I have merely brought along 8 items. If pressed, I could produce more. The procurement cost of these was listed by the Army at $1.84 apiece, or $14.72 for these eight items, or $10,559.76 for the total amounts. The items I have are representative of the total. They are certainly worth no more than a few cents to perhaps 25 cents apiece. Even if we valued the eight items at $1 for the total, that would probably be an excessive price to pay for them.

"This would be only one-fifteenth of the price which the military paid for them.

"These items were purchased by the Army."

Department of Defense Reply

Based on the limited description given by Senator DOUGLAS and information furnished by the committee staff pertaining to the assortment of wrenches and minor items, it has not been possible to identify the items sufficiently to determine the circumstances surrounding their procurement and subsequent disposal action. Hence, we have no means of verifying the average figure of $1.84 each ascribed to these assorted items.

PART III

In December 1959, the Department of Defense was asked by the General Services Administration to supply price data on six items. It developed that these items had been donated to a State agency under the program for disposal of surplus. The items were: (1) Cable, operator headset; (2) Wrench set with case; (3) Lamp sockets; (4) Electric delay line; (5) Blower—Bull model; (6) Aluminum gage block.

Replies received from the military departments on the six items were given to GSA on December 23, 1959. GSA passed the data to a representative of the House Committee on Government Operations. The attached information sheets are copies of those furnished by the Department of Defense to GSA, except for the last item on each page. That is the comment added by GSA.

Items 1 through 6 of the 10 examples used by Senator DOUGLAS in his speech on defense procurement on June 13, 1960, were the 6 items referred to above.

Item 1

Department: Air Force.

Government prime contract No.: AF 33 (600)–32940 S.A. No. 4, device MF12a—procedure trainer. Contractor's reference No. 44–119 (AF–4).

Item description: Cable, operator headset, AP9531.

Property classification: Erco made assembly, usable as spares.

Holding agency: Mr. Thomas Sherlock, plant clearance office, Philadelphia Air Procurement District, 1411 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Location of material (before disposal): Erco plant, Riverdale, Md.

Inventory schedule B, cast No. 12763, October 21, 1958, item No. 1, page 1.

Questions

1. How was price established? The price of $10.67 each was established by the contract, under supplement agreement 8–2, negotiated by the contracting officer for spares provisioning.

2. Who furnished item, Government or contractor? Item was manufactured by the contractor.

3. Actual contract purchase price per unit: $10.67 each.

4. Purchase order number: No purchase order on contract involved.

5. Type of contract: Items manufactured by contractor under negotiated contract.

6. Costs other than purchase price included in items: No other costs involved.

7. GSA price estimate for comparable item: Company advises that item was produced in a small quantity for use on flight simulators in connection with this job. Current price, based on business from commercial sources, is about half.

Item 2

Department: Army.

Item description: ¼-inch drive socket wrench set, 8 sockets from 5/16 inch to 7/16 inch. 1 extension, 1 extra deep extension, 1 flexible arm extension, 1 reversible ratchet; $29 per set; manufacturer, Plomb Tool Co., Los Angeles.

Property classification: FSC–5815–412–8116.

Holding agency: Commanding officer, Fort George G. Meade, Md.

Location of material (before disposal): Property disposal officer, Fort George G. Meade, Md.

Turn-in voucher No. 8551–59 (QM property disposal branch, Fort George G. Meade, Md).

Questions

1. How was price established? The price of $29 was shown on the turn-in voucher.

2, 3, 4, 5, 6. These questions are inapplicable. The Army does not procure, stock or use this item. The National Security Agency asked the Signal Corps to get a Federal stock number for this item, which Signal Corps did. The item is not listed in the current GSA Stores Catalog.

7. GSA price estimate for comparable item: GSA offers a set (not claimed as alike or comparable) through its stores depot system at an issue price of $4.50 under FSN–5120–293–3537.

Item 3

Department: Navy.

Item description: Socket, NS6250–159–0987, lamp, double contact for lamps, Edison-Mazda No. 64, brass, nickel plated, molded Bakelite insert, 11/16-inch OD, 1 3/16-inch length.

Property classification: FSC–6250–159–0987.

Holding agency: Supply officer, Supply and Disposal Division, Naval Weapons Plant, Washington, D.C.

Location of material (before disposal): Excess Material Branch, Bellevue Annex, Naval Weapons Plant, Bellevue, D.C.

Report of excess personal property No. N.–111–59–171, AFSSC control No. 627220.

Questions

1. How was price established? Price of $21.10 was obtained from invoice which transferred the item from regular stock to the Navy excess account. This price in turn reflects the stock record card for this item.

2. Who furnished item, Government or contractor? Contractor inventory is not involved in this instance.

3. Actual contract purchase price per unit: Only one procurement of this item is recorded during the past 7 years (procurement records are not retained after 7 years). This last known purchase was in June 1952 by the Electronic Supply Office on purchase order NR–39282 for a quantity of 14 each at $21.15. This was accomplished by negotiated contract with the Ford Instrument Co. This item is in the standard stock catalog at a list price of $21.10.

4. Purchase order number: Contract and purchase order identification are not known for the 1,544 items concerned. However, the above cited cost of $21.15 should be considered.

5. Type of contract: Similarly, this data is unknown for the 1,544 items concerned.

6. Costs other than purchase price included in items: Contract purchase price of these items is not known, however the last known purchase price appears to be in line with the reported acquisition cost.

7. GSA price estimate for comparable item: Special type item not procured by GSA but carried in active stock by Navy. Serves special purpose for use on gun fire control systems. Carried today at NSD, Great Lakes, at $21.10 each.

Item 4

Department: Air Force.

Government prime contract number: AF 33(600)–23893, Crossbow, contractor's reference No. BR–1–5.

Contractor: Bendix Radio Division, Bendix Aviation Corp.

Item description: Anderson Laboratories, Inc. (Type 510–2–6–mus) Delay Line (BWIOMC 6usec).

Property classification: Bull models, delay lines.

Holding agency: Mr. Thomas Sherlock, plant clearance officer, Philadelphia Air Procurement District, 1411 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Inventory schedule B, case No. 12153, November 18, 1957, item 607, page 43.

Questions

1. How was price established? Price $250 each was established in subcontract with Laboratories for Electronics (not Anderson Labs., Inc.).

2. Who furnished item, Government or contractor? Item was furnished by contractor.

3. Actual contract purchase price per unit: $250 each.

4. Purchase order number: Purchase order No. E–121517.

5. Type of contract: Contract negotiated.

6. Costs other than purchase price included in items: No other costs involved.

7. GSA price estimate for comparable item: Company advises that item was $300 to $500 when being engineered. Now as a production item is available at lower cost—$175 for one, $160 if procured in large lots.

Item 5

Department: Air Force.

Government prime contract No.: AF33-(600)–23893, Crossbow; contractor's reference No. BR–1–5.

Contractor: Bendix Radio Division, Bendix Aviation Corp.

Item description: Globe Industries, Inc., blower (manufacturer's part No. 19A557–1).

Property classification: Bull models, miscellaneous components.

Holding agency: Mr. Thomas Sherlock, plant clearance officer, Philadelphia Air Procurement District, 1411 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Inventory schedule B, case No. 12153, November 18, 1957, item 1250, p. 92.

Questions

1. How was price established? Price of $50 each was established in subcontract with Globe Industries.

2. Who furnished item, Government or contractor? Item was furnished by contractor.

3. Actual contract purchase price per unit: $50 each.

4. Purchase order number: Purchase order E–119836.

5. Type of contract: Contract negotiated.

6. Costs other than purchase price included in items: No other costs involved.

7. GSA price estimate for comparable item: Globe Industries doesn't make this particular model any more. New model with change in design of fan operation would cost (per company) $46.50 for one f.o.b. Washington, or $36.20 each on purchase 100 units.

Item 6

Department: Air Force.

Government prime contract No.: AF–04–(645)–24, nose cone.

Contractor: Missile and ordnance systems department, General Electric Co.

Item description: Gage blocks, aluminum, 1# Dwg# 535E828 PO #40777.

Property classification: No commercial value.

Holding agency: Mr. Thomas Sherlock, plant clearance officer, Philadelphia Air Procurement District, 1411 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Location of material (before disposal): Miller Research Laboratories Division, Miller Metal Products, Inc., Baltimore, Md.

Inventory schedule D, case No. 12199, October 22, 1957, item 9, p. 1.

Questions

1. How was price established? Price of $10 each was established in purchase order with Miller Research Laboratories Division.

2. Who furnished item, Government or contractor? Item furnished by contractor.

3. Actual contract purchase price per unit: $10 each.

4. Purchase order number: Purchase order 40777.

5. Type of contract: Competitive.

6. Costs other than purchase price included in items: No other costs involved.

7. GSA price estimate for comparable item: Type of item provides no basis for obtaining comparative prices.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage of employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, this minimum wage issue is not a matter of concern to business alone. The interests and welfare of many people are involved, as well.

To the housewife, to the family as a whole, this type of legislation could mean having to pay extra pennies and extra dollars at the retail counter for various items of food and clothing and household necessities.

And even if it should not force up prices on these things it definitely would operate against any possibility of price reductions.

Also, it could mean that teenage children in the family would find it harder to get part-time and summertime jobs. That is because employers in retail and service establishments would be looking for experienced or trained employees who already know something about the job.

Actually a similar hardship would face anybody without experience or training regardless of age or physical condition. They would face layoffs, displacement, and unemployment.

Such a situation certainly prompts this question: How could any person rejoice over a higher Federal minimum wage rate if it means losing his job?

Legislation like S. 3758 could even hurt the sole family breadwinner, if, for example, he should be a retail salesman working on a commission basis. In his case, extra hours mean an opportunity for extra earnings. But if his employer, in order to avoid costly overtime payments, should cut his working schedule from 48 to 40 hours, the salesman would probably see his income shrink, too. And, consequently, the salesman's family would suffer, as well.

Here, we would have a real paradox in legislation that is designed to improve conditions for some workers, while actually bringing hardship to others.

These are only a few examples of the possible adverse effects of such legislation on the consumer, on the housewife, on the family.

WILL MINIMUM WAGE LEGISLATION HURT SMALL BUSINESS?

Tonight I should like to deal with a few of the economic facets of the proposed legislation and with what some of the results could be, in my estimation.

We have heard much about the increase in the minimum wage and what this might do to small business. The question is properly asked, "Will minimum wage legislation hurt small business?"

The interests of small business in the legislation were emphasized recently when House Speaker RAYBURN predicted House approval of minimum wage legislation—but cautioned against extending coverage to the point where it might "put the little fella out of business."

Unfortunately, too few people recognize the fact that the pending proposed legislation poses a serious threat to small business. To the contrary, advocates of minimum wage legislation have tried to convey the idea that such legislation will not affect small business because of provision for exempting small stores.

For example, the Senate Labor Subcommittee last year held hearings. The following are selected quotes from the hearing record from supporters of the legislation:

George Meany, president, AFL–CIO: "We recognize that retailing and service trades include a high proportion of small businesses. We recognize that it would be inequitable and impractical to apply the law to these small storekeepers. We have no desire to do so."

Stanley H. Ruttenberg, director of research, AFL–CIO: "The bill would not extend the act to genuinely small merchants or service companies."

Max Greenberg, president, Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Union: "Retail workers who are employed by small retail enterprises would continue to be excluded from the act by specific provision incorporated in the bill."

Andrew J. Biemiller, legislative director, AFL–CIO: "We estimate that, of all the retail enterprises in the country, S. 1046 would extend coverage to only the larger ones. It would allow the small retailers to continue exempt."

Such comments as these prompt an examination of the pending minimum wage bill to determine exactly how they would affect small business. Under examination, it becomes clear that any protection for small business is more fictional than factual.

EFECTS OF THE LEGISLATION ON SMALL BUSINESS

Contrary to the comments of those who give the impression that small business would not be harmed by the proposed legislation, it would appear that small business cannot escape injury.

Competition for employees would mean higher wage costs for many small merchants, in spite of any pretense in the bills to "protect" small business. An exemption for small stores having annual sales volume below a specified amount does not exempt the small operator from having to compete for employees in the same labor market with larger, "covered" stores. If legislation is enacted that causes higher wage levels in large retail stores, in manufacturing, wholesaling, and so forth—this is bound to create an upward pressure on wages at the community level. If the small merchant wants to remain competitive for qualified employees, he will find it necessary to hike his wage levels, too.

Moreover, as the covered establishments would learn, the law would not necessitate merely an adjustment for employees earning less than $1.25 an hour. Higher paid employees also would expect pay increases, to maintain salary differentials within the establishment. The small merchant would face the same situation. In fact, where employees are unionized, unions could be expected to demand higher wages for employees paid above the new minimum.

I interject, Mr. President, that the other day I said it would be a duty of a union to bargain for higher wages for the employees paid above the new minimum in order to maintain that which in the retailing and wholesaling industries is very essential to our system of economics; namely, a wage differential. A man always wants to have the possibility of earning a higher wage. As we artificially raise the wage at the bottom, we also artificially raise all of the wage scales between the bottom and the top, in order to maintain the wage differential which is so badly needed in our free enterprise system.

The maintenance of differentials also would confront small merchants. Thus, looking solely at the indirect effect resulting from competition for employees, small businessmen undoubtedly would be confronted with higher wage costs—regardless of any "exemption" in the legislation.

Franchised dealers, co-op groups are threatened with coverage under the definition of enterprise contained in S. 3758. This is a basic definition of what constitutes an enterprise—and it provides the foundation for provision in the bills that cover specifically certain types of enterprises in retail, service, and other trades.

According to the definition, enterprise means the related activities performed—either directly or indirectly, through unified operation or common control or otherwise—by any person for a common business purpose; and includes all such activities, whether performed in one or more establishments, or by one or more corporate or other organizational units.

The word "person" used in this definition is defined in the current law as meaning "an individual, partnership, association, corporation, business trust, legal representative, or any organized group of persons."

Ostensibly, the purpose of this definition of "enterprise" is to assure coverage of retail chains as complete organizations. In other words, all stores in a chain would be considered a single operation. If all the stores in a chain have combined annual sales of more than $1 million, all the stores in a chain would be covered—even those having sales well below the million figure.

The provision actually has even deeper significance to small establishments. It is seemingly broad enough to encompass the thousands of small, independent merchants who are today operating their own businesses under franchise agreements so long as the combined sales volume of all stores under a given franchised operation tops the specified amount. And this would be true in virtually all cases.

Thus, coverage would seem imminent within the wide range of franchised businesses—frozen custard stands, doughnut shops, self-service laundries, equipment rental services, automatic merchandising, auto laundries, upholstery and carpet cleaning services, hamburger stands, auto appliance stores, restaurants, motels, and so forth. And, of course, the thousands of service station operators who lease their stations from major oil companies would be affected.

In addition this provision threatens coverage of the thousands of small grocers who participate in voluntary and co-op groups—as well as the small, independent drugstores and other types of businesses operating under similar arrangements.

The legislation very definitely threatens to classify such operations as these under the "enterprise" heading—and thus would base coverage of the individual stores on the combined sales volume of all stores in the particular group. Under such an interpretation, the sales volume exemption for small businesses would be meaningless.

I keep returning to this point because we must recognize that under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution Congress does have the power, it has the right—in fact, we might even say it has the duty—to regulate commerce between the several States, the Indian tribes, and foreign nations.

But I suggest to my colleagues in the Senate that the wage scale has nothing to do with the regulation of commerce. To those who argue that the definition of "activities affecting commerce" in the proposed legislation, I say that it is not at too great variance with that contained in the Taft-Hartley Act. They must recall that the Taft-Hartley definition actually regulates by prescribing what must happen before even the provisions of the act can be applied.

In the bill the explanation of "activities affecting commerce" is so broad that we could conclude that an attempt is being made to indicate that wages paid across the Nation actually influence the flow of commerce between the States. Because of that implication those of us who have engaged the Senate for the last several days have been expressing such a concern over the possible dangers in the Kennedy bill. That is why I am attempting tonight to expand a bit in the economic field about these dangers.

Recordkeeping requirements would be burdensome for the small merchants brought under direct coverage by the legislation. Existing regulations require that 17 separate records be maintained for each employee for 3 years and 7 other records for 2 years. There also are additional requirements as to how the records shall be kept. This is a distinct problem for employers already covered by the law. It would be even worse for small merchants, many of whom do not have legal or accounting specialists to maintain the records properly. Moreover, maintenance of the records would be time consuming for someone and, therefore, would represent an additional cost factor.

This subject might be overlooked by some of my colleagues as being unimportant. As I mentioned Thursday, I have had a lifetime of experience in the retail field. My firm is not a small one, nor is it a large one, but I think the Senate might be interested to know that five people in my firm are engaged in preparing reports for the different levels of government, and it is difficult to imagine any business, regardless of how small it is, that cannot attribute a direct cost factor to the cost of keeping government records.

There are dangers involved in this field, too. We say there is a $1 million limitation. Let us say the merchant or the businessman did $900,000 of business in the preceding year, and he going through the next fiscal year, or calendar year, whatever the case may be, and he comes up to the 12th month and discovers that in spite of what he might do, he is going to do more than $1 million. All through the foregoing year he has not been paying the minimum wage because he has not been covered. He has not been filing reports because he has not been covered. Yet in the last month of the year he finds himself liable for fines and the imposition of much bureaucratic red tape because he did not know he was going to fall into the class that would take him out of the exemption.

While we talk of a $1 million figure, we forget that the business is not specifically covered by the $1 million exemption in the bill. There are two other classifications. One is a classification of $250,000 a year, which is not a very high figure in today's markets. If one is engaged in the construction business, the amount is $350,000. That figure, too, as anyone in the construction business knows, is not a difficult figure to reach.

Higher costs would confront the small businessman even if the legislation were revised so as to clearly and definitely exempt small retail and service businesses from coverage. Previously, we have discussed the indirect effect relative to competition in the labor market with larger concerns. This would mean higher wage costs for the smaller merchants.

In addition, if higher wages are pushed onto manufacturing and wholesaling enterprises, they cannot be expected to absorb the added labor costs. Rather, they can be expected to raise their prices to compensate for the extra costs. Result: Small merchants would be confronted with higher merchandise costs.

Moreover, if higher wages are thrust upon construction companies, this would mean higher costs for the retail or service firms that contemplate remodeling or other building programs.

THE PLIGHT OF THE RETAILER

One of our distinguished Senators, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], made this pertinent statement:

I would agree the evidence is overwhelming that the retailer is not getting rich, and that the retailer's margin is very small, perhaps too small. The rate of small business failures, the very great difficulty of succeeding in the retailing area for the small businessman, all these are very persuasive with me, and I am familiar with them. I am chairman of the Small Business Subcommittee of this particular committee.

Mr. ROOSEVELT, a distinguished Congressman from California, likewise pleads the case of the small retailers as follows:

The Bureau of Internal Revenue reports that an examination of income tax returns of 206,582 gasoline service stations under sole proprietorships showed they earned a net profit of only $564,154,000. Through a process of simple arithmetic, by dividing one of these numbers into another, one arrives at the figure $2,731, which represents the average net profit derived by a proprietor of a gasoline service station. These figures are the figures supplied by the U.S. Internal Revenue Service. Mind you, only $2,731 net profit for a year's compensation for back-breaking toil through long hours. This figure I submit, gentlemen, in these days of the high cost of living, is pitifully small indeed.

CONCLUSION

Small business does not exist in a vacuum. Neither does large business. The costs of one firm have relationship to the costs of other firms. Small business, therefore, has a great stake in cost-hiking legislation—regardless of exemptions—and should not be deluded into thinking otherwise.

The other day, when I made my first presentation on this subject, I spoke very briefly on the effect the bill would have on employment and unemployment. I made a prophecy on Thursday which many people have questioned, and I wish to do a bit of arithmetic tonight and develop the reasons for prophesying that within 3 or 4 months after the bill went into effect there would be a half million people out of work who are not out of work today.

EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT AND UNEMPLOYMENT

Retailing currently offers comparatively good employment stability—as was evidenced during the last recession. From August 1957 to June 1958, retail employment declined only 1 percent—while manufacturing employment dropped 12 percent.

All of this—the general employment stability and the opportunities for inexperienced employees—would be seriously jeopardized by extension of Federal minimum wage provisions to the retail and service trades.

As employers are forced to make staff reductions to keep total labor costs in line, the inexperienced employees would be first to go, followed by others whose productivity is not on par with the mandatory wage level.

There was evidence of this in a report contained in the December 29, 1959, issue of Daily Labor Report, published by the Bureau of National Affairs here in Washington. The report cited a study compiled by a student at Cornell University's School of Industrial and Labor Relations—a study of 42 retail stores in Syracuse and Auburn, N.Y., a State having a $1 minimum rate for retailing. Preliminary findings in the study are that a 7.8 percent increase in the price of labor resulted in a 4.5 percent rate of layoff among workers who previously had been paid less than $1 an hour. The layoff impact struck most heavily among certain kinds of workers: the relatively inefficient, the elderly, the part time and the handicapped.

There are about 1.7 million retail establishments in the United States. The 1.1 million of these who have employees employ 7.3 million workers of whom 7,050,000 are not now protected by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Only 25,000 establishments in retail trade have more than $1 million in annual receipts. These establishments employ 2 million workers.

The House bill, if corrected, would raise the number of employees subject to the minimum-wage provisions from 23.7 million to 24.4 million. This is the net result of adding 1.4 million workers in retail trade and excluding, by the broadened "area of production" exemption, 700,000 presently covered workers.

If we assume that the figures that resulted from the Cornell study is accurate, that in itself, if projected, would add about 1,100,000 to the unemployed rolls.

However, I do not believe that that figure is correct, from the experience I have had in my business and from the experience I have had in studying this subject in retail establishments and service establishments of varying sizes.

I would say that the rate is slightly on the high side. Let us say, however, that it is 50 percent wrong. If it is 50 percent wrong, we can expect 600,000 people, or nearly 600,000 people, to be out of work as a result of the passage of the pending bill.

Therefore, I stick to my figures of Thursday last, of 500,000.

I do not believe that anyone can successfully argue against that figure in view of the fact that the Department of Labor found that there was considerable impact upon employment following the last increase in the minimum wage.

In this connection, consider also a statement in the Secretary of Labor's report of February 15, 1960, on the Fair Labor Standards Act. Commenting on the effects of the 1956 minimum-wage increase to $1, the report states on page 1, part II:

> During the period of adjustment to the higher minimum, there were significant declines in employment in more of the low-wage industry segments studied.

And, on the same page, it is said:

> If alternative employment is not available, workers in low-wage communities may remain unemployed rather than obtain higher wages as a result of the minimum wage.

The Pennsylvania State Employment Bureau has revealed that a recent labor market analysis of the York, Pa., area shows that because of minimum-wage regulations forcing a higher wage scale, retail outlets in general are operating with a smaller sales force than a year ago.

A Pennsylvania State minimum wage of $1 an hour went into uniform effect throughout the State at the beginning of 1960.

The State employment bureau report states that the number of nonfarm wage and salary workers in the York area is lower than a year ago and that the decline is centered entirely in nonmanufacturing fields, such as retail and wholesale establishments. The employment in these firms is down 400 from the previous year.

"This is a reversal of past trends which have always shown year-to-year gains," the report says.

Clearly, then, when wages are raised, so are standards of employability. Those who cannot qualify for work at the higher wage standards simply will not work. The Labor Department reported substantial declines in employment in low-wage industries after the 1956 minimum-wage increase.

Currently, some 4.5 million are unemployed—more than 5 percent of the civilian work force—even under the prevailing $1 minimum. In the House debate, no one asked how a higher minimum would help these unemployed people find jobs.

In the coming decade, the number of workers will increase 50 percent faster than in the 1950's. The problem of job creation and job finding is made all the more difficult by legislation which tends to price jobs out of existence.

Any further rise in the statutory minimum wage should be considered carefully in the light of its possible impact on jobs for the unskilled. Legislation establishing a minimum rate of pay, however justified, is a form of interference with the operation of a normal and competitive labor market. It forces important socioeconomic changes in wage and work patterns. Two points should be considered:

First. Where minimum wage legislation raises hourly pay above the value of an unskilled job, workers tend to be laid off. The low-income workers expected to benefit from the legislated increase in minimum pay may, in large numbers, be without any income at all. There is little prospect of their being absorbed in today's labor market, with its increased premium on skill and adaptability.

Second. Employers set higher employment requirements—putting more premium on skills—as pay minimums are priced higher; a man may be hired as a sweeper or porter at $1 an hour, but at $1.25 he must be something more than that. Moreover, employers often find that capital equipment may be substituted for higher priced unskilled labor.

According to a labor economist, Neil Chamberlain, legislators who vote to set a higher floor under wages, "however good intentioned, may only succeed in making victims of their intended beneficiaries."

Unions, of course, want a higher minimum price set for an hour's work. They concede that some unskilled workers are sure to be squeezed out of jobs, and that some marginal employers will be forced out of business and sounder ones into laborsaving mechanized processes. But, they say, this will be a small loss offset by the gains in "decent" wages.

Labor leaders today are expressing much concern about the impact of automation and technological improvements on employment. They protest that too often there is a rapid rate of displacement of workers. Yet the same labor leaders close their eyes to the potential displacement effects of this type of legislation on retail and service trades workers.

The most recent show of concern over the effects of automation comes from a union in the retail field—the very field which would be hardest hit by the passage of S. 3758. Thus, the Retail Clerks Union has called for a 35-hour workweek for workers in the retail industry who are allegedly the victims of increased operational efficiency in that industry. This union feels that automated devices may flood retailing, materials handling, and distribution within the immediate future, as they have in warehousing and billing. Yet, this same union strongly supports S. 3758. This raises a most significant question: How can a labor union which expresses concern for workers displaced by automation, on the one hand, be so completely unconcerned with the displacement of workers as a result of minimum wage legislation, on the other hand?

Retail management is constantly seeking ways of reducing operating costs. Thus, in recent years, we have witnessed the growth of self-service operations in several of the retail trades. Just 5 years ago, in the retail drug industry, 17.2 percent of all drugstores used the self-service technique. Early this year, in 1960, 37.2 percent of all drugstores are operated on a self-service basis. May we not logically assume, therefore, that the acceleration of this trend will be brought about by the passage of such legislation as S. 3758?

Coming under a new law for the first time will create many adjustment headaches for retail and service firms. Faced with mounting wage costs, these employers will strive to tighten control of all operating costs—especially if already-low profit margins will not yield to further cost pressures. Methods used to offset higher wage costs will include:

First, higher work standards; second, more rigid hiring and layoff practices; third, reorganization of layout of place of business for greater efficiency, that is, self-service, use of conveyor systems, and so forth; fourth, closer control of overtime work; and, fifth, installation of labor-saving machinery.

It apparently has not occurred to the labor bosses that union pressure for more and higher wages—regardless of productivity—has caused many employers to adopt labor-saving techniques on a more hurried schedule than was originally planned, thus needlessly throwing more employees out of work.

At present, when a reemployment problem exists in some areas, pricing labor at an arbitrarily higher scale would place a heavy burden on the labor market. Certainly the AFL–CIO should be aware of this problem. The labor federation recently cautioned that 1960 unemployment will stick close to the 5.2 percent of the labor force total racked up last January. It said that only a continuing rise of sales, production, and jobs throughout 1960 could head off the threat of a 1961 recession. In this connection, the AFL–CIO executive council, in its midwinter meeting in Miami Beach, actually forecast a recession in 1961 and demanded Federal action to thwart it.

In view of the AFL–CIO's concern over persistent unemployment and a possible recession next year, it is hard to understand why it is pushing for legislation which would only add to these two problems.

For a moment or two I should like to draw on my experience in this field, to try to tell Senators what can be done today and what probably will have to be done if the retail trade and service groups are faced not only by higher wage costs, but by increased regulation of their business.

I said the other day that I believe some of the best stocks on the New York Stock Exchange are those of industries which make vending machines. It is possible today to sell by a vending machine in a store, almost anything which does not require fitting, including handkerchiefs, men's socks, women's hosiery, almost any line of goods found on a cosmetics counter, and practically everything found on a notions counter. In fact, with the exception of articles which actually have to be tried on or altered to determine the fit, it is difficult to imagine anything which cannot be sold without a sales person. One has only to go into the largest hardware stores in the city of Washington to realize that they have dispensed with salesmen or saleswomen. Those stores have been converted into do-it-yourself establishments, where one can get anything he wants by walking to the counter and picking it up. Signs tell him the location of screws and nails and of other articles of hardware. The customer can pick them up and carry them to the front counter, where one employee will take the money and complete the transaction.

Today one can go into lumberyards in various places in the country and select the lumber himself for his "do-it-yourself" job at home.

The house painters of the country will tell us that more and more people are doing their own painting of their homes and of their rooms. The professional house painters are not decorating so many homes and offices. Why? Because unnatural forces acting upon the labor market are forcing private labor to the point where the American householder simply cannot afford to pay them. This, I think, is very sad, because I can see, if the trend continues, the end of a very important segment of the American economic system, namely, the craftsman who has heretofore been called upon by the householder to do a job that the husband or son is now doing for the family.

Automatic elevators and escalators are rapidly being installed almost everywhere, because it is no longer felt that the cost of an elevator operator can be afforded.

If these forces had been at work 30 years ago, I do not think retailers would have paid much attention to them, because, as I related the other day, it was possible in those days, with the proper attention to business, to realize a 10-percent profit at the end of a year. Unfortunately, I left on my desk some figures I had intended to bring with me, but I shall supply them tomorrow. They show that in the first few months of this year every level of merchant whom this process might affect has been undergoing losses instead of profits. The annual study made by the School of Business at Harvard shows that the average retailer today can look forward to a profit of around 2 percent. That does not provide much room in which to move. When a merchant had a larger profit, he could eliminate many things which were not needed in the business, but those things have almost all been eliminated until today the point has been reached of not necessarily paying lower salaries, but of increasing production, which will produce higher salaries; of not relying upon the fiat of government to produce higher wages, but relying upon the historic basis of the free enterprise system to provide more productivity in all those fields.

In the absence of that incentive system, the merchant has to turn to automatic vending machines, which in turn will deprive from jobs the very ones we are talking about helping—the older people, who are not interested in 40-hour, 5-day-a-week jobs, but want to work a few hours a day or 1 day a week or 1 night a week. These are the ones a retailer will employ in times of need, and these are the ones who will work regularly on such schedules. The point to bear in mind is that they are the very ones who will be the first to be discharged. The next will be the less skilled, because as these wages are forced up at the bottom, they are forced up at the top; and we must be concerned with profit, because it is the reason why any man is in business. So the cut comes on the part of the force that can least afford to be cut.

The other economic force in connection with higher labor costs is the pressure on prices.

HIGHER LABOR COSTS—PRESSURE ON PRICES

Enactment of Senate bill 3758 would have a double-barreled cost impact on retail and service businesses.

The first cost impact would be on the stores' own labor costs. For the stores brought under the $1.25 minimum, there would be a direct cost hike. For the few stores that might remain uncovered, there would be an indirect cost impact; they would need to keep their wages in line with those of covered establishments, in order to remain competitive for qualified employees in the same labor market with covered firms. And both covered and uncovered stores would face the prospect of maintaining salary differentials.

Also, since most of the smaller retail and service establishments do not have legal or accounting specialists, the proper maintenance of records for the Wage-Hour Division would impose still another problem on these establishments; and its solution would represent another cost factor.

The second cost impact for retail and service employers would be felt in purchasing the goods and services necessary to their business operations.

Inasmuch as the legislation would cause higher wages at the manufacturing level, it is quite certain that would cause the manufacturer's product to cost more. As a result, the merchants would be confronted with higher merchandise costs.

It is totally unrealistic to expect these firms to absorb the extra costs. Profits simply are not large enough. In fact, 41.4 percent of the retail corporations reporting to the Internal Revenue Service for the fiscal year 1958 showed no profit at all. Those that were in the black showed a net profit after taxes of only 1.8 percent of sales. For all reporting retail corporations—both those with and those without profit—the average net profit after taxes was 1 percent of sales.

Obviously, therefore, no one can expect these firms to bear the brunt of the extra costs the legislation would impose, without taking some sort of compensatory action. To escape the impossible burden of the extra costs, the retailer would look mainly toward reducing his staff of employees and/or raising his prices to the consumer. The amount of increase would depend on the extent to which they could reduce already low profit margins or compensate for the added costs through layoffs. But some consumer price increases would be inescapable.

Price rises in a wide range of manufactured items over the past 2 years have pushed the Bureau of Labor Statistics wholesale price index to record highs for all commodities other than foods and farm products. Of course, increases in the wholesale price index are not necessarily reflected later in rises in the Consumer Price Index. However, additional wholesale price "hikes" of manufactured products cannot help but exert more upward pressure on the retail prices which consumers pay for many types of goods. And, certainly, rises at the wholesale level will discourage any possible reduction of retail prices.

The Consumer Price Index for June 1960, was 126.5 percent of the 1957–59 average. While this index as a whole has risen only 1.6 percent since June 1959, the cost of services—less rent, the most persistently rising factor in the index—went up 3.2 percent; and the trend still is upward.

The minimum wage bill before the Senate, if enacted, would only compound the difficulty of maintaining stable prices. Let there be no doubt that enactment of legislation such as Senate bill 3758 would be tantamount to legislating higher consumer prices. The consumer would have to defray some of the added costs that would result from the legislation.

Mr. President, I have briefly mentioned profits. I know that profits are not supposed to be discussed here on the floor of the Senate, if we are to judge by the attitude taken by some. In fact, when we listen to some of our colleagues, it seems to be considered shameful that an American businessman should ever try to make a profit. I have heard American businessmen criticized and virtually beaten from pillar to post because they were able to arrive at a small profit during a yearlong operation.

On the contrary, Mr. President, I think all Americans should be very proud of the private enterprise or capitalistic system, or whatever one may wish to call it. Certainly profits constitute the greatest force that has resulted in making this country the greatest producer in the world. Socialism could not do that. That is why Russia is lacking in the economic fields.

In fact, I have no fear of Russia's activities in the economic fields, unless she continues what she has been doing recently, for, strangely enough, recently Russia has been copying our capitalistic system; she has recently been doing that in connection with her agricultural system, by allowing her farmers to retain some of what they produce; and in the case of her factory workers, Russia has been doing that by means of allowing longer vacations. If that trend continues, but if, on the other hand, we, in our system, continue to listen to the siren song of socialism, we can easily be in trouble, because certainly no socialistic system can produce what the capitalistic system has produced. That has been tried and tried, and tried again; but certainly it can never work in America. The only thing that can work in America is the private enterprise system or the profit system.

PROFITS

Profit margins in the retail trades, on the whole, are too low, Mr. President, to absorb rising costs and wage increases not accompanied by productivity increases. Over the past few years, a large portion of retailing has tried to absorb most of its increased operating costs. But, generally, the point has been reached where added costs can no longer be absorbed.

The profit problem of the small enterprise was made clear last year in a University of Michigan study[1] which contended that small department stores in the $5 million and under volume classification have made no progress in the last 30 years in improving net profits.

An analysis of operating results between 1928 and 1957 shows, according to the study, that total expenses rose from 29.6 percent to 33.5 percent of sales, more than offsetting rises in original markup and gross margin.

Even the large grocery chains are said to be heading toward a profit squeeze, according to a recent Harvard business report sponsored by the National Association of Food Chains. The report says that net profits before income taxes declined from 2.97 cents per sales dollar in 1957 to 2.89 cents a dollar in 1958. The net after taxes slipped from 1.44 cents a sales dollar in 1957 to 1.40 cents in 1958.

The Harvard report concluded that food-chain profits declined because competition limited the growth of gross margins, while expenses went up.

In a coldly accurate appraisal of profit trends in the distributive trades during the postwar years, Dr. Arthur F. Burns, former Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, observes in his book, "Prosperity Without Inflation":

> The pace of competition became especially keen in retail markets as new methods of distribution—of which the discount house, supermarket, and suburban shopping center are representative—spread rapidly. A broad tendency toward declining profit margins developed. While only moderate and irregular in the case of manufacturers, this tendency became quite pronounced for the distributive trades.[2]

The profit decline in retail trades is most vividly illustrated by a comparison of corporate income tax reports for fiscal 1957 and 1958, which are the latest available, issued by the Internal Revenue Service. These IRS figures show that all reporting retail corporations in fiscal 1957 had average net profit after taxes of only 1.2 percent of sales. Of all retail corporations filing income tax returns that year, 40.9 percent reported no profit at all. Those operating in the black had a net profit after taxes of only 1.9 percent of sales.

For fiscal 1958, the reporting retail corporations showed an average net profit after taxes of 1.8 percent of sales—a slight drop from 1957.

Even the most cursory examination of the profit picture in the retail and service trades shows these trades generally are in no position to absorb legislated wage increases unaccompanied by productivity increases.

If S. 3758 is enacted, many retail and service businessmen will have no alternative but to raise prices and/or lay off employees if they expect to remain in business.

PRODUCTIVITY IN RETAILING

In view of the complex relationship between employee average productivity and wages, it is important that there be serious consideration of the productivity problems and variations that exist in retailing.

Productivity is an elusive factor in any industry and can be discussed only in loose and general terms. In retailing, the only means known thus far for measuring productivity is the crude yardstick of sales per employee.

It is true that new methods of distribution, such as the modern supermarket system, have increased retailing efficiency and productivity. However, it would be a mistake to presume that retail productivity is subject to the same degree of control as the productivity of assembly line industries.

Even allowing for advances made by our modern supermarket system, shopping centers, and self-service methods, retailing in general still functions on a person-to-person basis. It still relies heavily on the skills of selling and persuasion; on the whims of the customer and the weather; on variations in quality, value, and types of merchandise offered; on advertising and display techniques; on store services for customer convenience, such as credit and parking facilities; and a host of intangible factors, such as management ingenuity.

Unlike manufacturing, retailing cannot depend extensively on the nearly flawless performance of machinery, and on well-regulated production lines. Bearing this out is this pointed observation of a grocery chain store executive:

Speaking to the National Association of Food Chains convention in 1958 on "Productivity of the Retail Outlet," Carol Shaver, of Grand Union Co., noted that the average supermarket employee is productive only 40–45 minutes out of each 60, or about 65–70 percent of the time. In contrast, he pointed out, well-run production line industries may expect 54–56 minutes of productive time, 90–95 percent of each hour.

Even within retailing, there are wide variations in productivity and employee earnings. Evidence of these differences is borne out in the 1956 BLS survey of retail employee earnings, which showed that variety store employees' earnings were the lowest of all trades, while employees of auto dealers were the highest. This can be attributed to: First, wide differences in skills required; second, tremendous use of part time, inexperienced, and young workers in variety stores; and third, great differences in value between types of products sold.

The size of the average sales transaction obviously affects both employee productivity and earnings. The range in these average transactions may vary from hundreds of dollars—automobiles and appliances—to as little as 50 or 60 cents—variety stores. There are stores in every community which sell lower priced merchandise and which do not have expensive items to bring up the average sales per transaction. Such stores will have relatively low employee productivity and, therefore, a low average rate of pay.

Retailing's productivity problems and variations not only explain some of the difference between retail and manufacturing wage averages, but they offer another reason for continued exemption of the trade from Federal wage-hour regulation.

S. 3758 does not improve retail productivity, but is aimed simply at raising wages. Since wages are an operating cost, then the immediate effect of the bill would be to increase the ratio of costs to productivity. Generally speaking, this would present an intolerable situation to retailers, especially smaller retailers.

THE "ENTERPRISE" DEFINITION

To get back to the bill itself for a few moments, I should like to discuss the definition of "enterprise" as contained in the Kennedy language.

S. 3758 extends coverage to any retail or service "enterprise engaged in an activity affecting commerce," whether the enterprise consists of one or more establishments, if the aggregate annual dollar volume of sales of all such establishments is $1 million or more. The apparent purpose of this language is to assure that separate units of a chain organization are considered collectively as a single enterprise.

Thus, the meaning of "enterprise" becomes a key issue in determining precisely who is covered and who is exempted.

Here is the definition of "enterprise" as set forth in section 3(r) of S. 3758:

(r) "Enterprise" means the related activities performed (either through unified operation or common control) by any person or persons for a common business purpose, and includes all such activities whether performed in one or more establishments or by one or more corporate or other organizational units but shall not include the related activities performed for such enterprise by an independent contractor: Provided, That within the meaning of this subsection a locally owned and controlled retail or service establishment shall not be deemed to be other than a separate and distinct enterprise by reason of any arrangement, which includes, but is not limited, to an agreement (1) that it will sell, or sell only, certain goods specified by a particular manufacturer, distributor, or advertiser, or (2) that it will join with other locally owned and controlled concerns in the same industry for the purpose of collective purchasing, or (3) that it will have the exclusive right to sell the goods or use the brand name of a manufacturer, distributor, or advertiser within a specified area, or by reason of the fact that it occupies premises leased to it by a person who also leases premises to other retail or service establishments.

However "protective" this new language may sound for smaller businesses, there is a distinct possibility that it does not afford a realistic exemption for small business. When considered in relation to modern merchandising practices, this definition of "enterprise" has far-reaching application to countless independent distributors.

Past history indicates that the new language would be construed—by the courts and the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor, which enforces compliance with the law—so as to achieve the broadest possible extension of coverage.

Consider some of the questions which might arise in interpreting the "enterprise" definition to determine whether a small store is part of a larger enterprise having more than $1 million annual sales, and therefore, is subject to coverage:

The first point is: When are employers related for a common business purpose through "unified operation"?

This would appear to include employers who are unified in interest, a term which might well mean, for example, that a small independent drugstore, franchised to handle and promote certain cosmetic lines, photographic equipment, and so forth, would be covered as part of the enterprise of the national manufacturer of such lines. Result: No exemption.

Similar arrangements can be found in a variety of fields: Auto dealers linked in many ways with the manufacturer of the car they sell. Department stores linked with national manufacturers of appliances, bedding, clothing, floor covering, and so forth. Furniture stores linked with manufacturers of certain class lines of furniture. Hardware stores linked with manufacturers of certain home workshop equipment, and so on. In each case there is a definite threat that the small locally owned and operated establishment would be covered as part of a larger enterprise, even though its own sales volume is far below the $1 million figure.

Also think of the co-op advertising and merchandising agreements between manufacturers and retailers in a host of fields. Often, the manufacturer provides mats or suggested ad layouts for the retailer to use. He may require the retailer to place a minimum amount of local advertising in a specified period of time. He may require that the co-op ad not show product price. Here, too, there is a degree of unified operation in merchandising which might link the retailer and the manufacturer in a common enterprise.

Likewise, consider the definition of enterprise with regard to the thousands of small franchised businesses, such as frozen custard stands and also auto appliance stores, self-service laundries, equipment rental services, automatic merchandising, hamburger stands, as well as leased operations such as gasoline service stations. Broadly interpreted, all such small businesses would be part of a larger enterprise with their supplier.

The second point I wish to make, Mr. President, in connection with this term is, When are employers related for a common business purpose through common control?

This may be academic, inasmuch as it would appear relatively easy to establish relationship through "unified operation," in which case common control would not have to be present. Even so, common control also might be subject to broad interpretation.

For example, consider again the small drugstore franchised to sell a certain product. Under the agreement, he is required to stock certain items so as to maintain a desirable inventory; he also is expected to maintain certain price levels for the equipment. This would apparently relate him to the manufacturer through a degree of common control.

Moreover, what about fair trade States? There, all retailers who sell a national brand are expected to adhere to the manufacturers' suggested retail sales price, another form of control.

Such control relationships between manufacturers and retailers can be found in many instances.

The third point, Mr. President, is, What is the significance of the first type of agreement, that the local retail or service establishment "will sell or sell only certain goods specified by a particular manufacturer, distributor, or advertiser"?

Chances are, such an agreement does not often exist. If it does, it may well be a violation of antitrust law. Generally, it is illegal for a manufacturer and retailer to enter into any agreement that prohibits the retailer from handling specified products.

The fourth point is, What is the significance of the second agreement, "that it will join with other locally owned and controlled concerns in the same industry for the purpose of collective purchasing"?

This is supposed to afford some protection for those small concerns that join together, for example, in cooperative buying groups, so as to benefit from quantity prices. But, this provision is of doubtful value.

For instance, many of the co-op and voluntary group members join together for more than merely collective purchasing. In many cases, they pursue similar merchandising programs. Limited as it is to "collective purchasing," the provision does not protect the thousands of retailers affiliated in joint merchandising programs.

Mr. President, I draw again upon my experience to relate a little known fact of retailing life. It is a very expensive operation for a store in this country to maintain a buying office in a city like New York, Los Angeles, or Chicago. It is very expensive to maintain an office in the various large markets, yet it is a very desirable thing to do. A store doing less than a million dollars' worth of business cannot very well have an office in New York, Chicago, or Los Angeles, but by joining with a large number of other stores—50, 100, 200, or 300 stores—to provide lower cost operations to the individual stores of a New York office, which would in turn buy for all the stores, this can be done.

If we pushed the definition to the fullest—and I assure Senators that the Department of Labor would do so—it would bring under coverage many thousands of stores which in a cooperative way join with other stores to provide themselves with the benefits of an office in the large markets. The administrators would do this merely by adding the total volume of all the stores engaged in this cooperative effort and by saying that each store was a part of it. That is one of the hidden "gimmicks" in the bill.

I know personally of hundreds of firms in my own State which would come under the provisions of the law, even though they do not do a million dollars' worth of business a year, by virtue of the fact that when the totals are added, even though the work in the office is unrelated to the work in Arizona, in North Dakota, or wherever it might be, the total is more than a million dollars.

Mr. President, I beat myself to the punch, because that is the next item in my prepared statement, and I had forgotten it was. It goes a step further.

Consider another situation. Many department stores also join together through large central buying offices which handle their purchasing requirements. In a typical arrangement, one buying concern may purchase for both local, independent department stores and for chain department stores. Thus, the independents would be joined together with chain stores not locally owned and controlled and would not be able to claim immunity under the collective purchasing agreement. He would likely be considered a part of the larger enterprise consisting of the buying office and all its members unified in interest for a common business purpose.

The fifth and last point that I shall touch upon in this part of the discussion is this.

What about the third type of agreement "that it will have the exclusive right to sell the goods or use the brand name of a manufacturer, distributor, or advertiser in a specified area"?

This seems relatively unimportant. Such exclusive arrangements are far less frequent today than they were in the past.

Besides, there are so many other possibilities for trapping the small business establishment under minimum wage coverage, this provision probably would have little value.

In closing I urge my colleagues in the Senate to study this very intricate bill. I ask them in all respect to their constituents who are engaged in the service and retail fields, so that they might not act hastily and do these people harm, to study the discussions that have been placed in the RECORD by myself and by other Members of the Senate who are opposed to the Kennedy bill that is now before us. We think that while the bill has much political sex appeal, it does not make much economic sense. I cannot understand the desirability of legislating for the so-called low-paid man, who is going to be harmed by the passage of this proposed legislation within a few weeks after its passage by increased costs. I think it is time that we in the business of this country should pass on to the consumer some of the increases of productivity rather than passing on almost entirely these increases to the wage earner.

I think there must be a very fine balance between that which we pass on to the wage earner and that which we pass on to the consumer, because if all the increase goes to the wage earner, without any corresponding increase in productivity, something must give, and that is the price line. Prices go up, so that the man who is working on an hourly wage or a guaranteed annual wage or whatever base he may be working on finds that the increase he has received, either through governmental fiat or over the bargaining table, is of no avail because he must pay so much for merchandise, and that he was actually better off when he was earning a lesser amount.

These are the economic facts of life that I as a man who spent his life up to the time he got into politics discovered in business. I have tried to get across to my colleagues that this is a time for us to look carefully at what is between the covers of this bill.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield to my friend from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I do not recall the particular amendment the Senator has in mind, but is it not true that in many instances the wage earner and the consumer is the same person?

Mr. GOLDWATER. In every instance that is so.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Is it not true oftentimes the man who must pay the increased wage is the consumer, and that he happens to be the same man who is the wage earner?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is absolutely correct. I am glad he brought out that point, because for some strange reason we in this country have set the wage earner apart, as if he did not belong to the rest of society.

We are wage earners. Some may argue that we here do not earn our salaries. I will admit there are times when I think they are correct. But on days like this, after 14 hours of work, I am very much interested in the time and a half proposal which other workers get.

Nevertheless, in the politician's mind, particularly, there is an attempt to separate and divide. Such thought does not find rest in the mind of the public, because the public knows the consumer and the wage earner are one. But in the politician's mind there has been successfully created the idea that the wage earner—the union man, the workingman—is someone completely set aside in a different corral on this great ranch that we call the economics of the United States.

They are one and the same thing. When we raise the wage of the Federal employee without any justifiable increase in productivity, we see prices rise, as they are rising in Washington today.

The other day I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a column which indicated that in some cases the recipient of the wage increase, who is a consumer, already is finding himself worse off than he was before the increase.

If we have wage increases based upon productivity, everyone benefits. I have often made that point in private discussions, because anyone who speaks out on this subject is immediately branded as anti wage earners, who are not supposed to be related to anybody else in the United States. We are branded as antilabor.

I do not care what a man's pay is. If a man can earn $1 an hour by productive ity, he ought to be paid that amount. On the other hand, if a man cannot earn $2 an hour, he should not be paid $2 an hour.

We have made our gains in this country historically by allowing the free enterprise system to achieve wages and prices, and when the Government gets in the act, who gets hurt? The working person, the consumer, and we are that consumer. We are all working people, regardless of how we work.

Some people work with their hands. Some are highly skilled with their hands. Doctors are highly skilled with their hands. A man who runs a precision lathe is highly skilled with his hands. The man who uses a shovel, on the other hand, does not require as much skill, and his pay reflects that.

Some people work with a combination of brains and hands, and we have various scales that apply to those people. Some work only with their brains, and we have degrees of skill among those and various pay for those skills.

There is an effort that I sense in this country through those who do not have faith in our free enterprise system to create an actual common man, and the Senator has heard me say many times that there is no such thing in the United States as a common man. We are 180 million of the most uncommon people that the Lord ever put on the earth, and if we ever allow ourselves to become forced into one mold, all earning the same salary, all voting in the same party—because there will be only one party—then we will have to agree our freedom is gone, our Republic is gone, and we have achieved nothing in the years that history should have taught us a few lessons.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. PROUTY. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I believe I heard objection to the order for the quorum call being rescinded. The absence of a quorum was suggested, and then I believe I heard objection to its withdrawal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. PROUTY. I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the order for the quorum call is rescinded.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask whether this is a circus or a carnival. Some of us are dedicated to the job we have to do. We feel compelled to remain here. However, it is somewhat of a discouragement to be called to answer a quorum call only to find that we do not need to have a quorum. I should like to inquire of the acting majority leader what the program is. Can all of us go home now, as most other Senators have already done, or must we stay here in the expectation that we are going to transact some business?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DWORSHAK. I am reserving my right to object. I should like to have an explanation.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The absence of a quorum was suggested by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], who had just concluded his speech, for the purpose of allowing the Senator from West Virginia, who was conferring with a constituent in the gallery, to reach the floor, to speak. It is intended that the Senate will recess until tomorrow at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from West Virginia, which will be in about 25 minutes.

Mr. DWORSHAK. In other words, we might as well have gone home when the other Senators went home, so far as the transaction of business is concerned. Is that correct?

Mr. MANSFIELD. No; there was always the possibility that business would be transacted, but this is the first time that we have reached a definite point where that will not be the case.

Mr. DWORSHAK. I have a great deal of confidence in the acting majority leader. I should like to ask his reassurance that we are safe in going home without the possibility that we will be called by the Sergeant at Arms when we get back home to come to the Senate to answer a quorum call and to transact some business.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I can assure the Senator that he will not be dragged in by the Sergeant at Arms. If he wishes to go home, he is free to do so. I will look after his interests.

Mr. DWORSHAK. I thank the Senator.

AMENDMENT OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, the Finance Committee on Saturday approved an amendment offered by me and cosponsored by 21 other Senators. This amendment would amend the Social Security Act to permit men to receive reduced benefits at age 62 in exactly the same manner and under the same conditions as reduced benefits are provided for women at age 62 under existing law. Under existing law, a female worker, or wife, who is otherwise qualified may elect to receive actuarially reduced benefits at age 62, and any widow or female parent who is otherwise qualified may receive full benefits at age 62. My amendment would treat men workers, husbands, widowers, and male parents in exactly the same way as their counterparts of the opposite sex are treated under existing law.

Mr. President, the adoption of the amendment will involve no appreciable cost, according to advice given me by the Chief Actuary of the Social Security Administration, Mr. Robert Myers. Mr. Myers has advised me that the net additional cost to the social security system would be about one-twentieth of 1 percent, and this is small enough that it can be borne within the current financing of the system. Therefore, no additional payroll tax will be required of either the employer or the employee.

Under my proposal, a man who decides to apply on his 62d birthday can draw social security benefits equal to 80 percent of the amount he would receive were he to wait until he reached his 65th birthday. He will have the option of receiving a proportionate increase—five-ninths of 1 percent—for each month he delays retirement after age 62. For example, a man entitled to a benefit of $100 per month at age 65 will receive $80 per month if he chooses to retire at age 62, under my amendment. If he decides to wait until he is 63 years to apply, the benefit he will receive for life will be increased to $86.67 monthly. If he applies at age 64, his monthly benefit will be $93.34.

It is my understanding Mr. President, that the provisions which were adopted into law with respect to reduced benefits for women have occasioned no administrative difficulties. In the light of the experience gained from the years in which the lowered eligibility age for women has been in effect, I think one can be confident that the adoption of my amendment will prove to be similarly beneficial and advisable. In other words, the 1956 amendment has worked out all right in the case of women, and it should prove to be the same for men.

At the time the 1956 amendment was adopted, there was some skepticism about how well it would work. It was charged that the lower retirement age would encourage employers to lower the compulsory retirement age for women employees. Opponents maintained that it would discourage the continued employment of older women workers whose potential work life would thus be shortened. Experience, however, has failed to bear out these skeptical fears and the average age of retirement for women has not been lowered by the reduced annuity.

I realize that there is some question as to whether it is desirable policy for the Government to encourage early retirement when the science of geriatrics is lengthening the lifespan of men. Yet, it is my understanding that only about half of the women eligible for retirement at age 62 elected to retire when the 1956 amendment was adopted. I think we can properly assume that not so great a percentage of men would elect to retire at 62. Many of the women who took benefits in 1956 had been working during the war years and had not been working immediately before the adoption of the 1956 amendment. Most men will continue to work until age 65 or somewhat thereafter as long as they are physically able or as long as there is employment. Moreover, Mr. President, automation is here to stay and it constitutes a growing problem with which our society is going to have to deal more and more in terms of unemployment. A recent study of automation prepared by the National Planning Association points out that, according to Census Bureau estimates, the average annual increase in the labor forces is presently 700,000 to 800,000 and that, by the year 1965, it will reach the figure of 1 million or more. It is necessary then that we find new job opportunities for these younger workers who are annually entering the work force.

Additionally, the problem of changing markets poses itself in the question of whether or not the needed job opportunities will appear at the right place and at the right time. The rate of increase in employment in some of the industries now being automatized does not begin to match the increase in productivity made possible by new processes. For instance, in the chemical industry, productivity rose 53 percent between 1947 and 1954, but employment rose only 11 percent. In oil refining, output increased 22 percent since 1947, but total employment fell by 10,000. Automation has made itself felt in the mining areas of my State. Whereas only a few years ago, 135,000 miners were employed in West Virginia, today less than 40,000 are employed. A continuous mining machine operated by 6 workers will load the coal originally requiring the time and labor of 40 men. The problem is not peculiar to West Virginia. The textile and shoe workers in the New England States have experienced the same sudden shift in an employment pattern which had existed for over 100 years. Further changes will create catastrophic dislocations of workers.

The distinguished senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] who is a member of the Senate Finance Committee, pointed out in presenting the 1956 amendment which brought about the same change for women workers, that the privilege of electing earlier retirement with proportionately reduced benefits is one that has demonstrated its effectiveness in the civil service retirement system, the railroad retirement system, and in many private pension plans. The principle is one which makes possible an added flexibility to the retirement program without excessively increasing the cost to the contributor.

Mr. President, I should like to refer to my amendment in the same words as those which were spoken by the Senator from Oklahoma in 1956, and shall only take the liberty to substitute the masculine gender for the feminine. An important consideration in connection with my amendment is the fact that the choice of the date of retirement is voluntary. No man will be required to retire at age 62. The choice will be his. If he does not elect to take a slightly lower benefit to qualify before age 65 and instead decides to wait until he is 65 years of age to apply, he will still be entitled to his full benefit.

There are approximately 1.8 million men who potentially would be eligible to retire at age 62 immediately if this amendment is adopted by the House and Senate. They would not be forced to retire. The choice would be an optional one, and it would be up to the individual. There are many—in fact, a majority, I would assume—of these men who would prefer to continue to work.

On the other hand, there are some who would want to retire and who should retire. Many individuals are not physically able to continue working after they reach the age of 62; yet they are not disabled to the extent that they can qualify for disability benefits. This amendment would permit those individuals to retire and make room for younger workers.

Mr. President, to summarize: The purpose and effect of the amendment, which has been adopted by the Committee on Finance, would merely accord to men the same privilege of earlier retirement on an actuarially reduced basis as has been available to women since 1956. This amendment would involve no appreciable increase in cost to the social security insurance system. Furthermore, it is not envisioned that any great percentage of eligible men will wish to avail themselves of the election which it offers.

Still, the amendment is of great importance to that relatively small number of men who, because of ill health, unemployment, underemployment, or other personal reasons, find it impossible or ill-advised to continue working until they attain the age of 65. Moreover, it should be pointed out that the benefits provided by the Social Security System are not gifts of charity or handouts from the Federal Government, but are payments actually earned and paid for by the worker and his employer. Why not, then, make it possible for those who, perhaps for adverse reasons beyond their control, wish to receive at an earlier age that which is justly theirs and for which they themselves have paid?

Mr. President, for 8 years, since I first became a Member of Congress, I have urged that the age of eligibility be lowered to 60 years for both men and women. Opposition to my proposal, both from the administration and from some Members of the Congress, has been so strong that I have come to realize that all I could hope for at this time would be to bring about a reduced eligibility age for men to 62 years. I think it better to secure half a loaf if we cannot have a whole loaf. I still believe that the eligibility age should be 60 years for both men and women, but I am very happy regarding the action taken by the Committee on Finance on my amendment. It represents a victory for which I have striven for so long. I wish to express my gratitude to the majority leader, the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], for the very wonderful support which he has given to me in this matter; and I also appreciate the work done by the able and distinguished senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], a member of the Committee on Finance and the author of the 1956 amendment. Senator KERR has at all times, as has Senator JOHNSON, been most cooperative and sympathetic to my position and interested in the proposal. I wish to thank, too, the other Senators who joined in cosponsoring my amendment. I think the RECORD should show their names, and they are as follows: Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. CLARK, Mr. DODD, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. HART, Mr. HARTKE, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina, Mr. LONG of Hawaii, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. MOSS, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. MUSKIE, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. YARBOROUGH, and Mr. YOUNG of Ohio.

Mr. President, I felt that there would not be another good opportunity to present an amendment of this nature for approximately 2 or even 4 more years, until such time as a social security bill again comes over from the House; and whenever a social security bill does come from the House, it customarily reaches the Senate at a late date in the session. The situation governing in this instance, therefore, is no different from what it has been in the past and probably will be in the future. I hope, Mr. President, that the Senate will lend its full approval to my amendment permitting men to retire at age 62, and I trust that the House conferees will be agreeable to it. Moreover, I hope that the President will attach his signature to the bill which finally passes, providing medical benefits to the aged, and incorporating this very plausible and humanitarian amendment lowering the eligibility age for men.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, a letter from the Honorable Arthur Flemming, Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. The Secretary's letter explains the position of the administration in connection with my proposal to lower the age.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE,
Washington, D.C., May 26, 1960.

Hon. ROBERT C. BYRD,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BYRD: This is in further reply to your letter of April 13.

As I wrote you earlier, I asked the Social Security Administration for a report on your question about lowering the eligibility age for old-age and survivors insurance benefits to 62 for all workers. The Commissioner of Social Security has informed me that their study of the retirement age question indicates that the disadvantages of lowering the eligibility age for benefits to 60, which I mentioned in my letter of January 7, would also apply to a proposal to make benefits available at age 62.

I know there are compelling reasons for trying to find a solution to the problems of older people who are not able to find work. I do not believe, though, that lowering the eligibility age under the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance program is the best solution to the unemployment problems of the aged. In view of the lengthening lifespan of our people it seems to me that we must try to move in the direction of making it possible for all people to continue in active employment as long as they need or wish to. I am afraid that any lowering of the eligibility age for benefits would tend to result in less attention being given to the real problem of improving employment opportunities for older people.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR FLEMMING,
Secretary.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate finishes its business today, it stand in recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DECLINE IN BITUMINOUS COAL PRODUCTION

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, the bituminous coal industry—approximately one-third of whose total current capacity is in West Virginia—has not experienced the upturn in production that was anticipated for 1960. On the contrary, output has remained almost constantly abreast of the 1959 figures, which amounted to only 410 million tons for the full 12 months.

Despite tightening of the restrictions on residual oil import quotas, coal continues a heavy loser in the unfair struggle with this product of alien refineries. Importers, since the end of World War II, have so methodically and effectively captured numerous coal markets on the east coast that they are now attempting to claim these outlets on a permanent basis while continuing their raids wherever else along the seaboard domestic fuel producers remain in business.

I intend to speak to this subject at length before Congress adjourns. It is imperative that the executive department give more consideration to miners whose work has been swept away by the black tides of this foreign fuel. Because the White House gives diplomatic expediency preference over economic need, it is obvious that only congressional action will ever cut back the oil import volumes to a point where American mines will once again have an opportunity to sell their product to traditional consumers now being served by international oil. Meanwhile, we who are conscious of what too much imported oil is doing to business in our home States must insist that the administration at least impose the restrictions which it established as a security measure. I refer to the 1957 import levels, which the White House agreed upon as the limit needed to safeguard America's defense, but which level has since been disregarded under withering pressure from importing oil companies.

I should like to tell Senators that the enactment of the coal research bill this year is appreciated by the people of West Virginia. We are expecting the Department of the Interior to set up shop and put the coal research program into operation as soon as possible. We do not foresee a spectacular rise in demand for coal evolving from the early efforts induced by the legislation, yet there can be great hope for the immediate future if the program is properly directed and implemented. Stephen F. Dunn, president of the National Coal Association, offers this recommendation:

> Eventually considerable efforts should be directed to basic research, but we believe that an initial all-out program of applied research can bring about the quickest benefits. This approach, we believe, can give an upward thrust to coal demand in a relatively short period.

I concur in this analysis. Coal research can ultimately provide benefits for indirect as well as direct consumers of coal. It can be the medium of a miscellany of consumer goods which have thus far not been conceived in man's mind. It can serve to narrow the gap between cost of liquid and gaseous fuels from crude oil and from coal by synthesis, thus acting as a price stabilizer on future energy supplies.

Michael F. Widman, Jr., director of the Research and Marketing Department of the United Mine Workers of America, discussed coal's possibilities with members of the Division of Gas and Fuel Chemistry of the American Chemical Society in Cleveland some weeks ago. Here is a paragraph from his address:

> Research has found ways to produce coal cheaply. Now research must find ways to use coal in more and more ways. This is the job that is in store for coal. I hope that some of you will be a part of the program to expand coal usage through research.

Mr. Widman then outlined technical and scientific developments over the years which have made coal the most efficient fuel for the generation of electricity; which have made it more attractive—from the standpoint of price and availabilty—in large industries and small commercial plants, apartment houses, office buildings, schools, hospitals, and other institutions. He also discussed his own organization's activities devoted to expanding coal markets. Mr. Widman has a number of sound ideas as to how the new Federal coal research program should move forward. Mr. Dunn, who is also president of Bituminous Coal Research, Inc., likewise stands ready to cooperate with the authorities at the Department of Interior. I hope there will be close liaison between responsible Government officials and industry and union authorities so that no time will be lost in getting the program under way and quickly pursuing its maximum potential.

Mr. President, I have been deeply interested in Federal coal research since I joined with Representative JOHN P. SAYLOR, of Pennsylvania, in support of legislation in the House several years ago. I feel a deep personal satisfaction in the knowledge that it has finally become law. I intend to ask the Department of Interior to keep me closely informed of its intentions and actions with respect to this program in order that I may in turn relay such information to the Congress. Before this month is out, I hope that officials of the Department of Interior, Mr. Dunn, Mr. Widman, and I can sit down and review the plans that have been drawn up in consequence of the legislation's enactment and in anticipation of actual research and development endeavor on the part of all concerned. I shall, of course, report immediately to the Senate on the outcome of this proposed meeting.

Mr. President, research brings progress. An article published in the August 1, 1960, issue of the United Mine Workers Journal, amply describes some of the benefits which will accrue to the public with the passage of the coal research bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From United Mine Workers Journal, Aug. 1, 1960]

COAL RESEARCH FOR PROGRESS

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—The following article concerning recent developments in the field of coal research was prepared for the Journal by the UMWA's Research and Marketing Department.)

Coal, buried beneath 33 out of 50 States, built America. Coal, our most precious natural resource, supplies 55 percent of all electricity generated in America. Coal has worked a modern industrial miracle by mechanizing its mines to an amazing degree. Coal has maintained a stable price level since 1950. Coal miners enjoy the highest wages of any industrial workers in the world. Yet, coal faces a struggle for existence.

The Congress of the United States recognized the vital importance of a healthy coal industry when it passed the coal research bill, H.R. 3375, in the 2d session of the 86th Congress. The President of the United States concurred in the judgment of the Congress when he signed H.R. 3375 into law.

The enactment of the coal research law placed a major responsibility for new methods of coal utilization upon the Federal Government.

The passage of H.R. 3375 underscored one very significant point. Coal, like every other modern industry, must constantly strive to meet the changing needs of a growing America. The only way to do this is by constant innovation, by a steady and unrelenting quest for new products or improvements upon the old.

The new era in coal must reflect the determination by industry, labor, and Government to transfer a part of the genius of production to the search for new and better products.

NEW RESEARCH EFFORTS IN PUBLIC INTEREST

The job cannot be assigned properly to any one group. Certainly industry stands to benefit because of its huge investments in plant and equipment. The UMWA realizes that only if the industry prospers can its membership prosper. The Government is committed by H.R. 3375 to develop to the utmost degree our most valuable natural resource in the public interest.

A researcher approaching the problem of coal should possess several important qualities.

First, he should be unprejudiced. Too often men close to coal have become so bogged down with past failures, they are unwilling to consider future victories. Surely a resource such as coal will have many uses yet undreamed of. A closed mind can hardly see the future while being mired in the past.

Above all, the coal research executive must be dynamically aggressive. Coal cannot live in the past. It must go forth to meet its future confident of its ability.

Certainly all of this is a tall order. But we do not believe that an industry which doubled its productive efficiency in 10 years, an industry which reached a remarkable plateau of cordial labor relations, an industry which entered so readily into such a unique organization as the National Coal Policy Conference, will not be able to supply the necessary personnel to achieve another revolution in the 1960's.

Think about coal research possibilities. They encompass the whole structure of our economy. Collectively they represent the future of a nation and an industry.

The country depends upon natural gas and petroleum for many of its chemical needs, besides a great deal of its motive power. The peacetime prosperity and wartime sufficiency of America is dependent upon an ample supply of petroleum and natural gas.

Upon these two products the huge petroleum industry has grown. It varies from the petrochemical plants of Texas to the corner gasoline station. It has placed America on wheels and on wings, and it has meant industrial progress and military might.

But the whole complex is built upon a sharply limited reserve of both oil and natural gas. Domestic petroleum, for example, has only 12 years' supply at present consumption. Natural gas with 22 years' reserve is more ample but hardly adequate.

Against this background we find the growing demands of America for energy sources, for chemical products, and for synthetics of every kind.

This gap can be filled with coal. Coal can be converted to liquid or gas. Many officials point out the great need for studies on coal gasification. Probably W. A. Koehler, director, Engineering Experiment Station, West Virginia University, put the case most succinctly when he stated in the "Coal Age Mining Guide Book" of July 1960:

"Coal gasification and the synthesis of gas products are very important to the future utilization and market strength of coal. These areas should figure heavily in the coal research program as also should fundamental studies on physical and chemical properties."

Further advance in liquid petroleum and synthesized gas research will undoubtedly prove difficult. But when it is accomplished the results would constitute a most gigantic step forward for coal and the Nation.

Think of it. Huge new industries springing up in now depressed coalfields. Demand for coal increasing not by thousands of tons, but by millions.

The new age in America will be characterized by a host of new products. One of the most promising sectors of growth will be in the chemical industry. America requires chemical products worth billions of dollars each year. Because of this demand the chemical industry has become a giant, sprawling across the Nation and in a constant state of growth.

For many years coal held an important place in chemical production. Now our position is under severe attack. Instead of expanding with the times, the coal industry is hard pressed to maintain what it has.

The reason for this situation, we believe, is twofold: (1) Lack of vision and (2) lack of research.

We have witnessed the rise of a huge petrochemical industry in the country. Each year it grows. Suppose that coal would display the same inventive spirit, the same willingness to try the untried. Isn't it possible for West Virginia coal to be the source of carbon chemicals, instead of Venezuelan oil? Can't the Pennsylvania anthracite industry assume a part of the burden of supplying vital chemicals to the Nation?

All of these things are possible, if only those forces now dedicated to coal's future, the coal industry, the UMWA, the railroads, and the Federal Government would seize the opportunity to grow rather than stagnate.

GREAT POTENTIAL IN COAL CHEMICALS

Dr. George R. Hill, Fuels Engineering Department, University of Utah, cites the need when he says in Coal Age:

"Research on coke and chemicals, and physical and chemical properties should be stressed. Chemicals from coal are more varied and intrinsically more valuable than those from petroleum, yet no coal-chemical industry comparable to the petrochemical industry exists. Research lack is one basic difference."

Tragically, after over 200 years of coal use we still do not know many of the basic qualities of coal. Despite the years when coal was king, despite the tremendous advances in scientific know-how, coal has remained in the Middle Ages. But the competitors of coal advanced. They built huge industries by devising new ways to serve, by reconciling past practice with present technology to supply future needs.

Recent newspaper accounts tell of the development of a fuel cell. According to the reports the fuel cell will be a great boon in applications requiring a large amount of power in a relatively small space.

If successful this would be a tremendous advance. But yet, isn't it merely power in another form? Shouldn't coal, the basic source of power in America, serve as the power source for the fuel cell?

Before a whole host of technical objections are raised by learned scholars, a look at the potential might be in order.

Space ships will need something like the fuel cell. Rockets are becoming an integral part of our everyday life. Our world is reaching for the stars. Our civilization has transcended its planet.

All of this will require fuel. But limitations demand the fuel be in a different form. Research will determine the form. Research will also decide upon the fuel.

Of course, the fuel cell has many more mundane uses. In locomotion, in powerplants, and a whole host of new products, the fuel cell will assume a role of importance. We hope that coal will assume a role of importance.

Sometimes ideas for research possibilities come from the most unlikely sources. A locomotive engineer wants to burn coal in present diesel engines.

Crazy? On first glance it would appear so. But Dr. Diesel, the inventor of the diesel engine, actually started his experiments with a coal-fired diesel engine. An associate of Dr. Diesel operated a coal-fired diesel engine in Germany for many years.

Here again potential approaches the fantastic. We are talking in terms of 30 million tons of coal in the railroad market alone. Imagine the effect of 30 million additional tons of production in West Virginia, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, or any other coal-producing State. Consider the savings on fuel costs by the railroads.

Visualize the effect of such an invention on the entire internal combustion field. A low-cost fuel would be available in huge quantities to serve the voracious appetite of the Nation for power. Cars, trucks, stationary powerplants, all present great possibilities for large new markets.

Last year a corporation not connected with coal in any way decided to find a new use for coal. They did this in an incredibly short space of time. Now, thanks to their efforts, coal may pave the Nation's highways.

Coal is largely carbon. Carbon is basic in the development of all organic compounds. In addition, the range of products available from coal staggers the imagination. Perhaps the very size of the product range overwhelms the timid or the cynical.

But what a potential exists in this one field. The vast array of synthetic products will soon be dwarfed by an unparalleled surge in new synthetics.

Consider the importance of manmade goods which were unknown a few years ago. Nylon, orlon, acrilon, pharmaceuticals of all kinds have become indispensable in our lives. In each instance research pointed the way to the discovery of new and better ways to live.

Coal can share in this road to progress. The ability to invent is not held by one group. But the extent to which the executives in coal possess the necessary imagination to try new methods will determine the role coal will play in our future.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call may be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. HAYDEN, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Rules and Administration was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3830) to provide for the establishment of the Roger Williams National Monument, and it was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, in accordance with the order previously entered, I move the Senate stand in recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 8 o'clock and 59 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess, under the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Tuesday, August 16, 1960, at 10 o'clock a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate August 15 (legislative day of August 11), 1960:

CHAIRMAN, JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF

Gen. Lyman L. Lemnitzer, U.S. Army, for appointment as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff for a term of 2 years, vice Gen. Nathan F. Twining, U.S. Air Force, effective with his retirement.

IN THE NAVY

The following named officers of the line and staff corps of the Navy for temporary promotion to the grade of rear admiral, subject to qualification therefor as provided by law:

Line

Rawson Bennett, II	Robert E. Moore
John O. Miner*	Magruder H. Tuttle
Theodore A. Torgerson	Harold G. Bowen, Jr.
Emerson E. Fawkes	Charles A. Curtze
Edward A. Ruckner	Luther C. Heinz
Odale D. Waters, Jr.	Ralph L. Shifley
Charles J. Palmer	Paul Masterton
Harry L. Reiter, Jr.	George P. Koch
Robert B. Fulton, II	George F. Pittard
Joseph C. Wylie, Jr.	William M. McCormick
Earl R. Eastwold	Robert L. Townsend
William A. Stuart	Herman J. Kossler
George R. Luker	Noel A. M. Gayler
William H. Groverman, Jr.	Kenneth L. Veth
	Draper L. Kauffman
George W. Pressey	Eugene B. Fluckey
Francis E. Nuessle

Medical Corps

Langdon C. Newman*
Harold J. Cokely

Supply Corps

Charles A. Blick
John W. Bottoms

Chaplain Corps

Joseph F. Dreith

Civil Engineer Corps

William C. G. Church
Peter Corradi

Dental Corps

Eric G. F. Pollard

WITHDRAWAL

Executive nomination withdrawn from the Senate August 15 (legislative day of August 11), 1960.

POSTMASTER

Oras D. Miller to be postmaster at Sidney, in the State of Arkansas.

* Indicates ad interim appointment.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, AUGUST 15, 1960

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Harold L. Gore, associate pastor, Memorial Baptist Church, Arlington, Va., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee that, this day, we may call upon Thee as free men in a free society, each as his conscience may direct, believing with strong conviction that Thou art the author of liberty as well as the author of life. Grant, our Father, that we, who so cherish the prerogative of choice, may not so abuse it as to divest it of all meaning, but that under the restraint of wisdom, devotion to truth, and the discipline of love may create that society in which all men are free to be changed into Thine image and so become the sons of God. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, July 2, 1960, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 12326. An act making appropriations for civil functions administered by the Department of the Army, certain agencies of the Department of the Interior, the Atomic Energy Commission, the Tennessee Valley Authority and certain study commissions, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists on its amendments to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. ELLENDER, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. MCCLELLAN, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. HILL, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. KERR, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. DWORSHAK, Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota, Mr. MUNDT, and Mrs. SMITH to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED

Bills of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 299. An act for the relief of Dalworth C. Ebner and John Wessels; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 675. An act to regulate the practice of physical therapy by registered physical therapists in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 708. An act for the relief of Ante Gulam; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 882. An act for the relief of the heirs of J. B. White; to the Committee on Agriculture.

S. 1377. An act for the relief of Blagoje Popadich; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 2427. An act for the relief of Wiktoria Stefania Cranak; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 2709. An act directing the Secretary of the Interior to convey to the city of Flandreau, S. Dak., any interest remaining in the United States to certain property which it conveyed to such city by the act of August 21, 1916 (39 Stat. 524); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

S. 2979. An act to authorize the Administrator of General Services Administration to make grants in cash to the Convalescent Hospital of Washington, District of Columbia, Inc., for the purpose of enabling the corporation to establish a convalescent and chronic disease hospital in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 3146. An act to authorize the Commodity Credit Corporation to donate dairy products and other agricultural commodities for use in home economic courses; to the Committee on Agriculture.

S. 3147. An act relating to interest rates payable on obligations of the United States purchased by the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S. 3432. An act for the relief of Salvatore Briganti; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 3507. An act for the relief of Captain Ernest Mountain; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 3533. An act to protect farm and ranch operators making certain land use changes under the Great Plains conservation program against loss of acreage allotments; to the Committee on Agriculture.

S. 3727. An act to authorize the bonding of persons engaging in the home improvement business, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 3759. An act authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to convey certain lands to Auburn University, Auburn, Ala.; to the Committee on Agriculture.

S. 3769. An act to amend certain provisions of the Securities Act of 1933, as amended; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 3770. An act to amend certain provisions of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, as amended; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 3771. An act to amend certain provisions of the Trust Indenture Act of 1939, as amended; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 3772. An act to amend certain provisions of the Investment Company Act of 1940, as amended; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 3773. An act to amend certain provisions of the Investment Advisers Act of 1940, as amended; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to do that before we have a few unanimous-consent requests?

Mr. GROSS. Yes, I do, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Evidently no quorum is present.

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

SENATE

TUESDAY, AUGUST 16, 1960

(Legislative day of Thursday, August 11, 1960)

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our Father, grappling with the tasks of a new day of deliberation, we implore Thy enabling grace on the chosen representatives of the Republic who, in the legislative process, by their words, decisions, and influence here weave the fabric of the national and international life.

We would also remember before Thee those whose calling it is to report to the waiting millions at home and around the listening world what is said and done in the Nation's lawmaking Chambers.

We pray Thy guidance on members of the vital profession who on printed page and on the speaking air pour forth their conclusions and interpretations, thus coloring the attitudes of an unnumbered host.

Grant those who wield such power the inner candor never to suffer themselves to be used to deceive or drug the mind of the people with falsehood or prejudice.

Cause those whose writing and speaking are channels of public information and understanding to realize that they have a sacred function, and that the cause of righteousness and freedom may be saved by their courage, or lost by their distortion, cowardice, or silence. In the place in which we stand, make each of us the messenger of Thy truth to our generation. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, August 15, 1960, was dispensed with.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we have the usual morning hour, and that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

Mr. ELLENDER. I object.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, let me ask what the request was.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. For a morning hour, and for a limitation on statements in connection therewith.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

MEMORIAL

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a memorial signed by Marilyn Routsong, for the Founding Church of Scientology, the Church of American Science, and the Hubbard Association of Scientologists, International, of Washington, D.C., remonstrating against alleged prejudice and discrimination of certain branches of the Federal and District of Columbia Governments, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

INCREASED APPROPRIATIONS FOR PRESIDENT'S MUTUAL SECURITY CONTINGENCY FUND

Mr. FULBRIGHT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an original bill (S. 3855) to increase the authorization for appropriations for the President's mutual security contingency fund for the fiscal year 1961, and for other purposes, and submitted a report (No. 1836) thereon; which bill was read twice by its title and placed on the calendar.

PRINTING OF THE "LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, U.S. SENATE, 86TH CONGRESS" AS A SENATE DOCUMENT

Mr. FULBRIGHT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 360) authorizing the printing of the "Legislative History of the Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, 86th Congress" as a Senate document, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That the "Legislative History of the Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, 86th Congress" be printed as a Senate document, and that two thousand additional copies be printed for the use of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON REDUCTION OF NONESSENTIAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES—FEDERAL EMPLOYMENT AND PAY

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, I submit a report on Federal employment and pay for the month of June 1960. STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD OF VIRGINIA

THE MONTH OF JUNE 1960

Civilian employees

Executive agencies of the Federal Government reported civilian employment in the month of June totaling 2,382,679. This was a net decrease of 10,722 as compared with employment reported in the preceding month of May.

Civilian employment reported by the executive agencies of the Federal Government, by month in fiscal year 1960, which began July 1, 1959, follows:

Month	Employment	Increase	Decrease
1959—July	2,370,694	3,703
August	2,364,320		6,374
September	2,345,359		18,961
October	2,348,807	3,448
November	2,372,247	23,440
December	2,364,342		7,905
1960—January	2,329,442		34,900
February	2,331,884	2,442
March	2,514,756	182,872
April	2,518,215	3,459
May	2,393,401		124,814
June	2,382,679		10,722

Total Federal employment in civilian agencies for the month of June was 1,335,462, a decrease of 13,563 as compared with the May total of 1,349,025. Total civilian employment in the military agencies in June was 1,047,217, an increase of 2,841 as compared with 1,044,376 in May.

Civilian agencies reporting larger decreases were Commerce Department with 38,534 and Treasury Department with 1,971. Larger increases were reported by Agriculture Department with 11,020, Post Office Department with 6,771, Interior Department with 3,791, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare with 1,472 and Federal Aviation Agency with 1,046. Increases in Agriculture and Interior Departments were largely seasonal.

(The June figure reflects a decrease of 40,097 in Commerce Department temporary employees engaged in taking the 18th Decennial Census. In June temporary census employees totaled 16,174, including: 12,255 enumerators, 3,319 crew leaders and 600 clerks and others.)

In the Department of Defense increases in civilian employment were reported by Department of the Navy with 2,284, Department of the Army with 1,677 and Office of the Secretary of Defense with 125. Department of the Air Force reported a decrease of 1,245.

Inside the United States civilian employment decreased 7,751 and outside the United States civilian employment decreased 2,971. Industrial employment by Federal agencies in June totaled 557,917, an increase of 2,526.

These figures are from reports certified by the agencies as compiled by the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures.

Foreign nationals

The total of 2,382,679 civilian employees certified to the committee by Federal agencies in their regular monthly personnel reports includes some foreign nationals employed in U.S. Government activities abroad, but in addition to these there were 177,801 foreign nationals working for U.S. military agencies during June who were not counted in the usual personnel reports. The number in May was 178,299. A breakdown of this employment for June follows:

Country	Total	Army	Navy	Air Force
Belgium	3			3
England	3,251			3,251
France	22,066	17,901	4	4,161
Germany	80,128	68,112	59	11,957
Japan	62,024	20,779	15,886	25,359
Korea	6,171	6,171
Morocco	3,537		853	2,684
Netherlands	40			40

SUMMARY FOR FISCAL YEAR 1960, ENDED JUNE 30, 1960

There was a net increase of 15,688 in civilian employment by executive branch agencies of the Federal Government during fiscal year 1960 which ended June 30, 1960. The total at the end of the year was 2,382,679 as compared with 2,366,991 in June 1959. The June 1960 employment figure includes 16,174 temporary employees of the Department of Commerce engaged in taking the 18th Decennial Census.

Civilian and military agencies

There was an increase during the year of 46,697 in employment by civilian agencies of the Government (including the 16,174 temporary census employees) and a decrease of 31,009 in civilian employment by military agencies. Employment by civilian agencies at the yearend totaled 1,335,462 as compared with 1,288,765 a year ago. Civilian employment by military agencies totaled 1,047,217 as compared with 1,078,226 in June of 1959.

Inside and outside the United States

There was an increase of 41,003 in employment within the United States by Federal executive agencies (including most of the temporary census employees) and a decrease of 25,315 in employment outside the United States. Employment inside the United States as of June 30, 1960, totaled 2,224,640 as compared with 2,183,637 a year ago. Employment outside the United States as of June 30, 1960 totaled 158,039 as compared with 183,354 a year ago (1959 employment in Hawaii was reported "outside continental United States"; in 1960 it was reported "inside the United States").

Employment for the year is summarized as follows:

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON REDUCTION OF NONESSENTIAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES—FEDERAL STOCKPILE INVENTORIES

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, I submit a report on Federal stockpile inventories as of May 1960. I ask unanimous consent to have the report printed in the RECORD, together with a statement by me.

There being no objection, the report and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL STOCKPILE INVENTORIES, MAY 1960

INTRODUCTION

This is the sixth in a series of monthly reports on Federal stockpile inventories under the Department of Agriculture, General Services Administration, and the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization. It is for the month of May 1960.

The report is compiled from official data on quantities and cost value of commodities in these stockpiles submitted to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures by the agencies involved.

The three agencies reported that as of May 1, 1960, the cost value of materials in their stockpile inventories totaled $15,928,426,000 and as of May 31, 1960, they totaled of $15,929,774,000, a net decrease of $1,652,000 reflecting acquisitions, disposals, adjustments, etc., during the month.

Different units of measure make it impossible to summarize the quantities of commodities and materials which are shown in tables 1, 2, and 3, but the cost value figures are summarized by agency and program as follows:

Detailed tables in this report show opening inventories at the beginning of the month in quantity and cost, transactions during the month, and the closing inventories at the end of the month. Each inventory is shown by commodity, except the national stockpile, for which commodity detail is classified.

Pertinent information and explanation are set forth in notes accompanying the respective tables. Statutory authority and program descriptions are shown in the appendix to the report.

The inventories covered by the report are tabulated in detail as follows:

Table 1: Agricultural price-support program inventories under Commodity Credit Corporation, Department of Agriculture, May 1960, including agricultural commodities, strategic and critical materials acquired by exchange or barter, and special acquisitions under the Defense Production Act.

Table 2: Strategic and critical materials inventories under General Services Administration, May 1960, including materials in the national stockpile, Federal Facilities Corporation tin inventory, Defense Production Act purchase program, the supplemental stockpile of materials acquired by exchange or barter of agricultural commodities, etc., and inventory in transit from Commodity Credit Corporation to the supplemental stockpile.

Table 3: Civil defense stockpile inventory under the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, May 1960.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

The Department of Agriculture defines the content of the columns as follows:

Program and commodity: Lists each commodity in the form in which it exists when extended support, and in some instances in a form to which the supported commodity is processed or converted to increase marketability. The commodities are grouped under the appropriate statutory subclassifications as "Basic," "Designated nonbasic," "Other nonbasic," and "Exchange."

Unit of measure: The applicable unit used in the accounting records and reports of the Corporation.

Inventory, beginning of month: Quantity: In number of units. Cost value: All inventories are recorded in the accounts at cost. "Cost value" is comprised of the initial cost of the commodity plus storage, handling, transportation, and accessorial expenses paid or accrued up to the date of reporting. The initial cost of inventories acquired by delivery of collateral securing loans is the unpaid balance of the notes plus storage and other charges advanced, any equities due or paid to producers on warehouse-stored collateral (by Public Law 85-835, and beginning with 1959 crop production, the Corporation will not make equity payments to borrowers on unredeemed price support loan collateral, title to which it acquires on or after maturity of the loans), and the net value of any quantity or quality differences determined upon delivery of farm-stored collateral. Amounts paid to lending agencies participating in the loan program for crop years prior to 1958 were recorded as a part of inventory cost.

Adjustments: Warehouse settlements, exchanges and transfers (net): Warehouse settlements include the net differences in quantity and/or value represented by the net of overdeliveries, premiums, underdeliveries, and discounts arising from movement of commodities. Exchanges represent the net change in quantity and/or value for inventories exchanged or in process of exchange. On completed exchanges, the change in value represents differentials due to location, quality, and quantity. Unprocessed commodities removed from inventory for conversion or processing (on a contractual or fee basis and excluding conditional sales) are included as a reduction of inventory. Processed commodities acquired as a result of this conversion or processing are included as an addition to inventory.

Acquisitions: As reflected in accounting records and reports; and includes commodities acquired by delivery of collateral securing loans, commodities purchased under terms of purchase agreements, commodities purchased directly from producers or processors as a part of the support operation but not under purchase agreements; and processed commodities acquired by purchases which offset conditional sales of unprocessed commodities from inventory. The cost value of acquisitions is described under the explanation of the cost value of inventory.

Carrying charges added to investment after acquisition: Total costs of storage, handling, transportation, and other accessorial expenses incurred during the month.

Disposals: As reflected in accounting records and reports. Inventory transactions generally are recorded on the basis of transfer of title. Disposition commitments are not reflected in the accounts. Cost value: Represents acquisition value plus applicable amount of carrying charges. The amount of cost allocated to commodities removed from inventory is determined with the view of retaining in the inventory accounts the cost of commodities remaining on hand. The cost allocated to commodities removed from price support inventory is generally computed on the basis of average unit cost of the commodity reflected in the inventory accounts for the applicable crop year and general storage location. In the case of commodities generally stored commingled (e.g., bulk grains and bulk oils) the crop year is determined on the first-in, first-out basis. In the case of commodities stored in identified lots, the crop year is determined by lot identification.

Inventory, end of month: Closing inventory after transactions for the month have been applied to the inventory at the beginning of the month.

TABLE 2.—Strategic and critical materials inventories under General Services Administration, May 1960: Including materials in the national stockpile, Federal Facilities Corporation tin inventory, Defense Production Act purchase program, the supplemental stockpile of materials acquired by exchange or barter of agricultural commodities, etc., and inventory in transit from Commodity Credit Corporation to the supplemental stockpile

EXPLANATORY NOTES

The General Services Administration defines the content of the columns as follows:

Program and commodity: Identifies the program and the minerals, metals, fibers, and oils acquired under the program.

Unit of measure: The standard weight or measure of minerals, metals, fibers, and oils determined to be the stockpile unit of measure.

Inventory, beginning of month: Opening inventory represents quantity and cost of material in storage at the beginning of the accounting period.

Adjustments: Represents increases (+) or decreases (−) of material in inventory other than increases from acquisitions or decreases from disposals. Decreases occur from theft, loss incurred while in transit to stockpile location, repacking from one type of container to another, beneficiation of a low-grade material to a higher grade, and the removal of material for sampling and testing purposes. Increases occur from return of material previously removed for sampling and testing purposes and from quantities received at storage locations in excess of quantities billed by the contractor. A new chemical analysis of the materials may cause an increase or decrease where the weights are based on chemical and moisture content. Increases or decreases are also made from findings of audits of inventory and accounting records.

Acquisitions: For the National Stockpile and Defense Production Act acquisitions include open market purchases at contract prices; intradepartmental transfers at market or appraised value at time of transfer; transportation to first permanent storage location; and, beneficiating and processing cost in upgrading materials. For the supplemental stockpile acquisitions include the market value or CCC's acquisition cost whichever is the lower at time of transfer from CCC.

Disposals: Cost of disposals are calculated at the average unit price of inventory at time of removal from inventory. For the national stockpile inventory disposals consist of sale of materials that by their nature would deteriorate if held in storage for lengths of time; and, sale of materials that have been determined to be obsolete or excess to the needs of Government. For the Defense Production Act inventory disposals consist of sale of materials that have been determined to be obsolete or excess to the needs of Government.

Inventory, end of month: Closing inventory represents quantity and cost of material in storage at the end of the accounting period.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

The Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization defines the content of the columns as follows:

Commodity: Composite groups of many different items.

Unit of measure: Shown only for engineering supply units and hospital functional units; not feasible by other composite groups.

Inventory-quantity: Shown only for two items, namely, engineering supply units and civil defense emergency hospital functional units. It is not feasible to furnish quantity figures on the other commodity groups because they are composite groups of many different items. To report quantities, it would be necessary to list several hundred different items.

Inventory-cost value: The dollar value figures on commodities in the civil defense stockpile inventory reflect essentially the actual costs of the commodities. No transportation, delivery, or storage costs are included. However, these statements should be qualified by the fact that the total inventory includes Government excess property items valued at over $2 million (a little more than 1 percent of the total), which were acquired by Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization at little or no cost. These materials are received into the inventory on one of three value bases: Items similar or identical to items purchased in the open market for stockpile purposes are accepted at the average unit cost for similar items purchased; the remaining items are accepted at a current fair value, if such has been determined, or at the original acquisition cost to the Federal Government, if a current fair value has not been determined.

Adjustments: Represents inventory pricing adjustments resulting from recalculation of fixed average unit prices transfers of commodities from one composite group to another, etc., during the month.

Acquisitions: Materials placed in inventory during the month, including return to inventory of items previously released from inventory for reworking, etc. Value stated in terms of actual costs of the commodities.

Disposals: Materials removed from inventory during the month, including items released from inventory for reworking, etc. Value stated in terms of average unit costs.

Inventory at end of month: Closing inventory after transactions for the month have been applied to the inventory at the beginning of the month.

U.S. Department of Agriculture—Commodity Credit Corporation

The Price-Support Program

Price-support operations are carried out under the Corporation's charter powers (15 U.S.C. 714), in conformity with the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1421), the Agricultural Act of 1954 (7 U.S.C. 1741), which includes the National Wool Act of 1954, the Agricultural Act of 1956 (7 U.S.C. 1442), the Agricultural Act of 1958, and with respect to certain types of tobacco, in conformity with the act of July 28, 1945, as amended (7 U.S.C. 1312). Under the Agricultural Act of 1949, price support is mandatory for the basic commodities—corn, cotton, wheat, rice, peanuts, and tobacco—and specific nonbasic commodities—namely, tung nuts, honey, milk, butterfat, and the products of milk and butterfat. Under the Agricultural Act of 1958, as producers of corn voted in favor of the new price-support program for corn authorized by that act, price support is mandatory for barley, oats, rye, and grain sorghums. Price support for wool and mohair is mandatory under the National Wool Act of 1954, through the marketing year ending March 31, 1962. Price support for other nonbasic agricultural commodities is discretionary, except that whenever the price of either cottonseed or soybeans is supported the price of the other must be supported at such level as the Secretary determines will cause them to compete on equal terms on the market. This program may also include operations to remove and dispose of or aid in the removal or disposition of surplus agricultural commodities for the purpose of stabilizing prices at levels not in excess of permissible price-support levels.

Price support is made available through loans, purchase agreements, purchases, and other operations, and, in the case of wool and mohair, through incentive payments based on marketings. The producer's commodities serve as collateral for price-support loans. With limited exceptions, price-support loans are nonrecourse, and the Corporation looks only to the pledged or mortgaged collateral for satisfaction of the loan. Purchase agreements generally are available during the same period that loans are available. By signing a purchase agreement, a producer receives an option to sell to the Corporation any quantity of the commodity which he may elect within the maximum specified in the agreement.

The major effect on budgetary expenditures is represented by the disbursements for price-support loans. The largest part of the commodity acquisitions under the program result from the forfeiting of commodities pledged as loan collateral for which the expenditures occurred at the time of making the loan, rather than at the time of acquiring the commodities.

Dispositions of commodities acquired by the Corporation in its price-support operations are made in compliance with sections 202, 407, and 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949, and other applicable legislation, particularly the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 (7 U.S.C. 1691), title I of the Agricultural Act of 1954, title II of the Agricultural Act of 1956, the Agricultural Act of 1958, the act of August 19, 1958, in the case of cornmeal and wheat flour, and the act of September 21, 1959, with regard to sales of livestock feed in emergency areas.

Defense Production Act Program

The programs authorized by and certified to the Secretary of Agriculture under the provisions of the Defense Production Act are administered and operated through the Commodity Credit Corporation.

All present and past programs involve the acquisition and disposition of agricultural commodities or products thereof. Commodities acquired are entered in and maintained through the inventory accounts of the Corporation. As the commodities are disposed of, the realized gains or losses are recorded by CCC as a receivable against the Secretary of Agriculture. Administrative expenses of the Corporation are recorded in this receivable; and interest is computed monthly on the total amount of CCC's investment at the same rate per annum as that paid by the Corporation on its borrowings from the Treasury.

The net total of realized gains and losses, CCC's administrative expenses, and CCC's interest expense represented a payable item under the revolving fund.

The recording of realized gains or losses represents a cash basis, inasmuch as the amounts recorded represent the net results of actual dispositions. Values of inventories on hand at reporting date are not included in these fund accounts and, therefore, allowances for losses are not included. Administrative and interest expenses are accounted for on an accrual basis. All values are at cost.

When a program is completed, the Secretary of Agriculture secures funds by issuing interest-bearing notes to the Treasury and reimburses CCC. Interest on the notes issued by the Secretary is accrued monthly, compounded semiannually, as an accrued liability of the revolving fund.

General Services Administration—Strategic and critical materials stockpiling and related programs

1. National Stockpile

The Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act (50 U.S.C. 98–98h) provides for the establishment and maintenance of a national stockpile of strategic and critical materials. GSA is responsible for making purchases of strategic and critical materials and providing for their storage, security, and maintenance. These functions are performed in accordance with directives issued by the Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization. The act also provides for the transfer from other Government agencies of strategic and critical materials which are excess to the needs of such other agencies and are required to meet the stockpile objectives established by OCDM. In addition, GSA is responsible for disposing of those strategic and critical materials which OCDM determines to be no longer needed for stockpile purposes.

General policies for strategic and critical materials stockpiling are contained in DMO V–7, issued by the Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization and published in the Federal Register of December 19, 1959 (24 F.R. 10309). Portions of this order relate also to Defense Production Act inventories.

2. Tin Received From Federal Facilities Corporation

Public Law 608, 84th Congress (50 U.S.C. 98 note), provided, among other things, for the continuation of operation of the Government-owned tin smelter at Texas City, Tex., from June 30, 1956, until January 31, 1957. It provided also that all tin acquired by the Federal Facilities Corporation by reason of such extension should be transferred to GSA.

3. Defense Production Act

Under section 303 of the Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App. 2093) and Executive Order 10480, as amended, GSA is authorized to make purchases of or commitments to purchase metals, minerals, and other materials, for Government use or resale, in order to expand productive capacity and supply, and also to store the materials acquired as a result of such purchases or commitments. Such functions are carried out in accordance with programs certified by the Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization.

4. Supplemental Stockpile

As a result of a delegation of authority from OCDM (32A C.F.R., ch. I, DMO V–4) GSA is responsible for the maintenance and storage of materials placed in the supplemental stockpile. Section 206 of the Agricultural Act of 1956 (7 U.S.C. 1856) provides that strategic and other materials acquired by the Commodity Credit Corporation as a result of barter or exchange of agricultural products, unless acquired for the national stockpile or for other purposes, shall be transferred to the supplemental stockpile established by section 104(b) of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 (7 U.S.C. 1704(b)). In addition to the materials which have been or may be so acquired, the materials obtained under the programs established pursuant to the Domestic Tungsten, Asbestos, Fluorspar, and Columbium-Tantalum Production and Purchase Act of 1956 (50 U.S.C. App. 2191–2195), which terminated December 31, 1958, have been transferred to the supplemental stockpile, as authorized by the provisions of said Production and Purchase Act.

Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization—Civil defense stockpile program

This stockpiling program, under authorization of Public Law 920, 81st Congress, section 201(h), is designed to provide some of the most essential medical and engineering supplies for emergency use in event of enemy attack. Materials and equipment not normally available or not present in the quantities needed to cope with such conditions are stockpiled at strategic locations. The Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization stockpile procured to date including medical supplies, emergency engineering equipment, and radiological instruments is stored and maintained in a nationwide warehouse system consisting of medical and general storage facilities.

EXPLANATORY NOTES RELATING TO THE REPORTING OF STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL MATERIALS ACQUIRED BY EXCHANGE OR BARTER OF AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES

Surplus agricultural commodities in the Commodity Credit Corporation's price-support inventory may be exchanged or bartered for strategic and critical materials under the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 (Public Law 480), and other basic legislation including the CCC Charter Act, as amended, the Agricultural Act of 1954, and the Agricultural Act of 1956.

Except for small amounts which may go to the national stockpile, the strategic and critical materials acquired by Commodity Credit Corporation under the barter program are transferred to the supplemental stockpile.

Direct appropriations reimburse Commodity Credit Corporation for materials so transferred from the price-support inventory.

The General Services Administration is charged with the custody and management of strategic and critical materials, and becomes the responsible reporting agency when title to these bartered materials is placed in the supplemental stockpile.

For purposes of this report, strategic and critical materials acquired by barter may appear in three inventories, reflecting the stages of the transfer of title.

1. The Department of Agriculture reports those to which the Commodity Credit Corporation still has title, prior to transfer to the supplemental stockpile.

2. The General Services Administration reports those which have been transferred from the Commodity Credit Corporation exchange inventory in two parts:

A. Materials for which title is "in transit" from Commodity Credit Corporation to the supplemental stockpile.

B. Materials for which title has passed to the supplemental stockpile.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD OF VIRGINIA

The cost value of materials in nine Federal stockpile inventories as reported by the Agriculture Department, General Services Administration, and Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, on May 31, 1960, totaled $15,926,774,000. May activity in these stockpiles resulted in a net decrease of $1,652,000.

Net change in these stockpile inventories reflects acquisitions, disposals, and adjustments. May activity and end-of-the-month totals are summarized:

[In thousands]

Inventories by agency and program	Cost value, May 1960
	Net change during month	Total, end of month
Department of Agriculture:

These figures are from reports certified by the agencies involved as compiled by the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures.

STORAGE AND HANDLING

This month for the first time the report includes a column showing storage and handling costs as reported by Commodity Credit for its price support inventory. These costs for May totaled $45,739,000. It should be noted that these storage costs are for only two of the nine stockpiles covered by the report. Effort is being made to extend reporting to show storage costs inall inventories.

INCREASES AND DECREASES

Major net decreases in cost value during May were reported as follows: $30 million in cotton; $13 million in corn; and $10 million in the national stockpile. These were partially offset by major net increases including $16 million in milk and butterfat; $15 million in grain sorghum; and $9 million in wheat.

AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES

Of 23 agricultural commodities in Commodity Credit's $7.2 billion price support inventory on May 31, 1960, those leading in cost value include:

Wheat, with 1.2 billion bushels at a cost of $3.1 billion;

Corn, with 1.2 billion bushels at a cost of $2.1 billion; and Cotton, with more than 5.2 million bales at a cost of $922 million.

STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL MATERIALS

Strategic and critical materials are shown in six inventories totaling $8.5 billion, including the $6.2 billion national stockpile for which itemized detail is classified. Combined figures from the other five inventories show materials (in all grades and forms) leading in cost value as follows:

Aluminum, bauxite, etc., with 6.1 million tons at a cost of $461 million;

Tungsten, with 84 million pounds at a cost of $341 million; and

Manganese (and ores), with 4.5 million tons at a cost of $299 million.

CIVIL DEFENSE SUPPLIES AND EQUIPMENT

The civil defense stockpile is shown in seven composite groups totaling $172 million. More than 60 percent is in medical bulk stocks valued at $106 million.

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

The following favorable report of a nomination was submitted:

By Mr. CHAVEZ, from the Committee on Public Works:

Col. Herbert N. Turner, Corps of Engineers, to be a member and secretary of the California Debris Commission.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KEATING:

S. 3852. A bill to simplify the payment of certain miscellaneous judgments and the payment of certain compromise settlements; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See the remarks of Mr. KEATING when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. PROXMIRE:

S. 3854. A bill for the relief of Mr. and Mrs. Laszlo Segesdi; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FULBRIGHT:

S. 3855. A bill to increase the authorization for appropriations for the President's mutual security contingency fund for the fiscal year 1961, and for other purposes; placed on the calendar.

(See the reference to the above bill when reported by Mr. FULBRIGHT, which appears under the heading "Reports of a Committee".)

By Mr. BARTLETT:

S. 3856. A bill to convey Fort Amezquita Military Reservation, P.R., to the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico; to the Committee on Armed Services.

S. 3857. A bill for the relief of Marlys E. Tedin; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BRIDGES:

S. 3858. A bill for the relief of Hsien-Chi Tseng; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. EASTLAND:

S. 3859. A bill for the relief of Willie Lee Young and Minnie May Kees; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

PROVISION OF FOOD TO NEEDY PEOPLES IN MEMBER STATES OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. FULBRIGHT, by request, submitted a concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 114) expressing the support of the Congress for a United States initiative in the United Nations looking toward the development of plans whereby all members of the United Nations can work through the United Nations system to provide substantial quantities of available foods to needy peoples in member states, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FULBRIGHT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 360) authorizing the printing of the "Legislative History of the Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, 86th Congress" as a Senate document, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

(See the above resolution printed in full when reported by Mr. FULBRIGHT, which appears under the heading "Reports of Committees".)

SIMPLIFICATION OF PAYMENTS OF CERTAIN JUDGMENTS AND SETTLEMENTS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to simplify the payment of certain miscellaneous judgments and the payment of certain compromise settlements. The purpose of the bill is to provide a simplified procedure for the payment of judgments against the United States, of State and foreign courts, and for the payment of compromise settlements in cases against the United States. Under the provisions of the bill such judgments and compromise settlements would be paid in the same manner as judgments rendered by district courts against the United States under present law.

Under the present law, judgments—not in excess of $100,000 in any one case—rendered by the district courts against the United States are paid out of moneys in the Treasury upon certification of the Comptroller General. On the other hand, judgments of a State or foreign court against the United States and settlements by the Attorney General are presently payable only by the enactment of specific appropriations legislation except in a case in which the agency whose activities gave rise to the litigation has an appropriation which may be properly charged with this type of expense.

The bill is strongly recommended by the Department of Justice, the Department of State, and the other interested Government agencies. The Department of Justice pointed out in its report that enactment of the bill would enable the Government to "realize substantial savings of interest payable on judgments" and "advantageously to settle cases which cannot now be compromised."

This bill does not and is not intended to wave any immunity from suit of the United States. It also provides that judgments of State and Foreign courts shall only be paid after certification by the Attorney General that it is in the interest of the United States to pay the same, thus precluding automatic payment in cases in which such judgments are considered to have been improperly rendered.

A similar bill is now pending in the other body and has been favorably reported by the House Committee on the Judiciary. I do not know of any objections to the bill and I hope it will be speedily approved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3852) to simplify the payment of certain miscellaneous judgments and the payment of certain compromise settlements, introduced by Mr. KEATING, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROVISION OF FOOD TO NEEDY PEOPLES IN MEMBER STATES OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, by request, I submit, for appropriate reference, a concurrent resolution which would express the support of the Senate for a U.S. initiative in the United Nations looking toward the development of plans whereby all members of the United Nations can work through the United Nations system to provide substantial quantities of available foods to needy peoples in member States.

This proposal has been requested by the Secretary of State in a letter to the Vice President of August 12, 1960, and I am submitting it in order that there may be a specific resolution to which Members of the Senate and the public may direct their attention and comments.

I reserve my right to support or oppose this concurrent resolution, as well as any suggested amendments to it, when the matter is considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I ask unanimous consent that the concurrent resolution be printed in the RECORD at this point, together with the letter from the Secretary of State to the Vice President with regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and under the rule, will be printed in the RECORD; and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 114) expressing the support of the Congress for a U.S. initiative in the United Nations looking toward the development of plans whereby all members of the United Nations can work through the United Nations system to provide substantial quantities of available foods to needy peoples in member States, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas the United States has an abundance of food more than adequate to meet the needs of its own people; and

Whereas the peoples of many less fortunate nations suffer from shortages of food, which cause human suffering and retard economic progress; and

Whereas it is the tradition of the United States and consistent with its humanitarian ideals to draw upon its resources to relieve the suffering of needy peoples in other nations and to assist them in their efforts toward a better life; and

Whereas the United States has undertaken a food for peace program and has joined with the other members of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations in supporting the freedom from hunger campaign; and

Whereas the United Nations and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations are in a position to play an important role in the making available of food for needy peoples: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States supports the intention of the President of the United States to express at the forthcoming session of the General Assembly of the United Nations the willingness of the United States to continue furnishing food to less favorably situated peoples and also to join with other members of the United Nations and specialized agencies in developing plans whereby all members able to do so can work through the United Nations system to provide, without disturbing normal markets, substantial quantities of available foods to needy peoples in member states.

The letter presented by Mr. FULBRIGHT is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., August 12, 1960.

The Honorable RICHARD M. NIXON,
President of the Senate.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: The President, in his message to the Congress on August 8, referred to "a proposal to be presented in September before the General Assembly of the United Nations, whereby we and other fortunate nations can, together, make greater use of our combined agricultural abundance to help feed the hungry of the world" and asked that Congress prior to the convening of the United Nations Assembly approve a resolution endorsing such a proposal.

I am transmitting herewith for the consideration of the Congress a draft resolution expressing its support for a United States initiative in the United Nations looking toward the development of plans whereby all members of the United Nations can work through the United Nations system to provide substantial quantities of available foods to needy peoples in member states.

Adoption of such a resolution by the Congress would measurably strengthen the position of the United States in making such a proposal and I earnestly hope that favorable action will be taken by the Congress at this time.

Most sincerely,

CHRISTIAN A. HERTER.

PRINTING OF REVIEW OF REPORT ON GILA RIVER AND TRIBUTARIES, TUCSON, ARIZ. (S. DOC. NO. 116)

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I present a letter from the Secretary of the Army, transmitting a report dated July 19, 1960, from the Chief of Engineers, Department of the Army, together with accompanying papers and illustrations, on a review of report on Gila River and tributaries in the vicinity of Tucson, Ariz., requested by resolution of the Committee on Public Works, U.S. Senate. I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed as a Senate Document, with illustrations, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF FRASER WILKINS TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE REPUBLIC OF CYPRUS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to announce that the Senate today received the nomination of Fraser Wilkins, of Nebraska, to be Ambassador to the Republic of Cyprus.

In accordance with the committee rule, the pending nomination may not be considered prior to the expiration of 6 days.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. GORE:

Keynote address delivered by Senator CHURCH at the Democratic National Convention, on July 11, 1960, and editorial comment.

By Mr. HAYDEN:

Address to be delivered by Senator ROBERTSON at the convention of the Virginia State Sheriffs' and City Sergeants' Association, Richmond, Va.

By Mr. DOUGLAS:

Statement by him, to be delivered at the silver anniversary convention of the Catholic War Veterans of the United States of America, meeting this week in Chicago, Ill.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage of employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCGEE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

REQUEST FOR AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET DURING SENATE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee; the Subcommittee on Investigations of the Government Operations Committee; the Subcommittee on Agricultural Investigations of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; and the Public Works Committee be permitted to sit during the session of the Senate today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall object—let the RECORD show that Members of the minority have filed with the minority leadership objection to having those committees meet during today's session.

Therefore, Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

ATTENDANCE BY VICE PRESIDENT NIXON ON DUTIES AS PRESIDING OFFICER OF THE SENATE

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, we read and hear much lately about a so-called truth squad contemplating touring our country to spread its own dubious brand of enlightenment. May I make it clear that I do not question the motives of these patriotic Americans—merely their premises and judgment. I do not pretend to be a one-man truth squad, nor am I a member of any so-called truth squad. Certainly, I am not a self-appointed vigilante.

Quite out of curiosity, however, I undertook, during the first week of this very important session of the 86th Congress, to determine with complete accuracy the length of time that the Vice President of the United States presided over the Senate. Mr. President, to assist me in this connection, I availed myself of the use of a stopwatch. In addition, in the interest of absolute accuracy, I enlisted the aid of colleagues and friends.

I report, Mr. President, that, from the opening of this special session on August 8 to adjournment last Saturday evening, the Vice President of the United States presided over the Senate precisely 2 hours, 55 minutes, and 40 seconds.

I choose at this moment to refrain from any further comment except to state that article I, section 3 of the Constitution of the United States provides that the Vice President "shall be President of the Senate but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided."

Of course, the Standing Rules of the Senate also repeat this provision, giving to the Vice President the duty and responsibility of presiding over the Senate. Mr. President, in reading the Constitution of our country, there is very little that is stated there regarding the duties of the Vice President other than to preside over the Senate and to cast a vote in event of a tie.

I make no comment over the fact that the honor and responsibility of presiding over the Senate have been relinquished by the Vice President and that his duties and responsibilities, as stated in the Constitution, were carried on by Senators.

Sometime near the end of the last session of Congress I reported to the Senate, in praising the distinguished junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], that he had up to that good hour presided over the Senate of the United States for 104 hours, while the Vice President of the United States, whose duty it is to preside over the Senate, had presided a period of 24 hours. I did not have a stopwatch then, but that was the figure I obtained, and I am certain it was accurate.

The Senate had been in session last week from the opening on August 8 to the time of adjournment last Saturday evening, for a total of 57½ hours. It would appear to me, if I were a member of a truth squad, so-called, noteworthy that the Vice President fulfilled his constitutional obligation of presiding over the Senate less than 3 hours of the 57½ hours, or approximately—in fact, I was going to say approximately 5 percent of the time—but I figured it out, and I ascertained that the Vice President presided last week 5.1 percent of the time that the Senate of the United States was in session.

This session was called as the present distinguished Presiding Officer, the junior Senator from the State of Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE] knows, to consider some pending legislative proposals and to pass four appropriation bills—in other words, to clean up what was left undone, and get out.

Finally, may I say in this connection, that the comment which has been made to this good hour, seeking to reflect on the industry and attendance of a distinguished Senator of this body—and so there will be no mistake about it, I refer to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]—is without foundation, is entirely unwarranted, and is, in fact, picayunish.

By the same token, it is my view that the Vice President is not to be condemned for his failure to preside at all times or during the majority of the time that the Senate is in session.

As a matter of fact, except for statements made on this floor, I would have given this failure of the Vice President in presiding during the first week of this session—the fact that the Vice President presided only 5.1 percent of the entire time that the Senate was in session last week—the charity of my silence.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I will yield in a moment. I am about to conclude.

Mr. President, the people of the United States have great intelligence and common sense and excellent judgments. They know that these two distinguished and outstanding Americans, the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts, and the Vice President—I refer to JOHN F. KENNEDY and RICHARD NIXON—who are candidates of their respective parties for the Presidency of the United States. The people know and they appreciate that both of those leaders have a lot of territory to cover and a great deal to say between now and November 8. The people of the United States want to see them and they want to hear them.

So I simply feel, Mr. President, in making these brief remarks, that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President——

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I surrender the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am a little astonished that my good and genial friend from Ohio would bring up this subject, for two reasons: first, because we have watched him preside over the deliberations of this body with great fairness and dignity, and that opportunity might not have been vouchsafed to him had there not been a vacancy in the chair at that time. He has always conducted the duties of that position with impartiality, and we have enjoyed looking up there at his sunny face when he has presided.

The second, and most important, reason why I am astonished at my good friend from Ohio is that he has, by these remarks, served to accent the very basis upon which the Vice President of the United States will unquestionably, as will his party, found his principal campaign for the highest office in the land. He has not been a "sit-in" Vice President, or a leatherbound Vice President. He and his distinguished running mate, Ambassador Lodge, have participated at the highest levels in the policymaking decisions of this Government.

That has been the tradition which President Eisenhower has carried forward to a degree unparalleled in the history of our Nation. We have had genial, pleasant, beloved Vice Presidents who have enjoyed sitting in the comfortable chair now graced by the distinguished junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE], and often graced by my friend from Ohio. That is the easy road. That is perhaps the most pleasant road. However, the Vice President of the United States, under his present tenure, has not seen fit to adopt the easy course. He has left that chair to participate in decisions relating to domestic policies. He has left that chair to carry the message of our Nation to the four corners of the globe, and to do so successfully.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. In just a moment I shall be happy to yield.

In other words, the Vice President has not been circumscribed by the four corners of this room. The four corners of the globe have been the area where he has done his distinguished work.

Under the leadership of President Eisenhower, Vice President NIXON has had a very important role to play in the foreign affairs of this country. America has been lucky to have a Vice President who was inclined to take that attitude toward his position and to do his job, not only here but also all over the world.

I daresay, Mr. President, that the next Vice President, whoever he may be, will very much follow and emulate in that respect Vice President NIXON. Indeed,

Vice President NIXON has announced that his Vice President, if elected—Ambassador Lodge—will take an even greater role in policymaking decisions and in representing our Nation in foreign countries.

I do not wonder that an effort is made to attack the Vice President's record by our political friends across the aisle. As an experienced world traveler and troubleshooter, the Vice President possesses the experience and international know-how which are so important in a candidate for the Presidency. He has been a positive and constructive advocate for the free world. What is more, he has indicated, as I have said, that when he is elected Mr. Lodge will play a much more far reaching role even than he has played in the foreign affairs of the United States.

Knowing the candidate for Vice President on the Republican ticket, we certainly are all aware, as is all America, that he, like our present Vice President, is no novice in foreign affairs.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. My friend from Ohio announced ahead of time that he was going to do what he has done. He is a very diligent Senator. I have not had a stopwatch. I did not bring up the subject of the failure of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts to answer to rollcalls during this session. It is a fact that there have been 159, of which he has answered 39, but that is something for him to account for. He may have a view of his duties here which corresponds to that of the Vice President. I do not see the parallel myself, but that may be his position. I shall not try to answer for him.

I do not agree with another thing which the distinguished Senator from Ohio said, because, in announcing that he was going to do this, he said he admitted his action might seem a little petty. My friend from Ohio is never petty. He is a good friend of mine. We served in the House together. We have served in the Senate together. We have always had cordial relationships with each other.

While I am astonished by his action, I am very happy, Mr. President, that he has seen fit to bring up a point which we on our side of the aisle are very happy about and very proud of—that is, the record of the Vice President of the United States both in this Chamber and outside it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. The distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE] asked me to yield first, so I yield to him first.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President I am grateful to my distinguished colleague from New York. I think the chances are he is trying to develop in his own mind the thoughts he might have in response to the observations made by my distinguished colleague from Ohio, and the chances are that inadvertently he missed the point.

The point made by my distinguished colleague from Ohio is not in criticism of the Vice President of the United States, because he recognized that position. He has developed the thesis that these two men who have been chosen by their parties owe it to the people of this country to get out of this Chamber and to go before the people of the country to explain, to discuss, and to debate the issues of this day, for one of these men is going to guide the destinies of the people of this country and, I might say, the destiny of all civilization.

There has been chiding and there has been ridiculing on the part of the Republicans in reference to the absences of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator has been nominated by his party. If he misses a vote or two here, or if he misses 10 or 20 votes, it could well be insignificant when measured against the tremendous problems which confront this world. I think JOHN KENNEDY owes it to the people of this country to leave this Chamber and to go to the people to explain the issues which cannot be properly explained on the floor of the Senate.

I repeat, I think my distinguished friend from New York missed the point. All the Senator from Ohio said was, "If you are going to criticize JOHN KENNEDY for not being here, then I am bringing up the constitutional obligation of the Vice President to be here."

My distinguished friend from New York says that the Vice President has every reason not to be present. We agree. However, why do Senators keep picking on the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts has not answered all the rollcalls? Why?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am very happy to respond to my friend from Rhode Island. I have not picked on the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. Attention has been called in the press, and I believe by some Members of the Senate, to the fact that the Senator did miss, this year, 120 out of 159 rollcalls.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. KEATING. Not at this moment. The duty of a Senator is quite different from that of the Vice President.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. KEATING. The duty of a Senator, generally speaking——

Mr. PASTORE. Will the Senator yield to me at that point?

Mr. KEATING. I will yield in just a moment.

The duty of a Senator, generally speaking, is to be present to answer to rollcalls. We all miss rollcalls from time to time. I have not criticized the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts in this Chamber. I may later make some remarks on that subject. It has been the subject of comments in the press, when he has been absent on political forays, in contrast with the absences of the Vice President, which have related, with a very few exceptions, to his duties as a part of the policymaking machinery of this country.

I am very happy that the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE] has interpreted the words of the Senator from Ohio. He has placed a somewhat different emphasis on them from the one I inferred.

Mr. PASTORE. I did not place any emphasis at all. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. No. It was a different emphasis from the one which I expected or that I gathered from the remarks of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG] or from his statement in the press that he intended to make the remarks. It is true that at the close of his remarks he did say that his statement was in answer to allegations made by some Members on this side that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] had not been attending to his duties on the floor. I think personally that such a statement probably would be improper coming from me. At least it might be construed as an unfriendly act. The Senator from Massachusetts is as good a friend of mine as is the Senator from Ohio, and I hope he still is.

However, the position of a Senator and that of one who occupies the position of Vice President are entirely different. There is no parallel at all. I quite agree with my friend from Rhode Island that all the candidates must state their case to the country.

Yesterday we picked up the newspapers and read about the fight which the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] was making for the medical aid plan. It must have been a skirmish in some area other than on the Senate floor.

I anticipate that there will be absences again by both these gentlemen during this special session, but what I have pointed out is the affirmative. I am very happy that this subject was brought up because it emphasizes the ground on which, in my judgment, the campaign of the Republican candidates for President and Vice President will to a large extent be based.

Mr. PASTORE. If the Senator from New York has finished, I should like to have the floor.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield to the distinguished Senator from California.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] is completely correct. The Vice President of the United States, the incumbent and the office, require no defense as a result of any mathematical calculation computing the number of minutes or hours served in presiding over the U.S. Senate.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. I do not.

The age of the Alexander Throttlebottoms in American Government has long since gone. The responsibility of the officeholder of the second highest, most responsible position in American Government is not discharged under the Constitution, as I see it, merely by sitting in the Presiding Officer's chair all day long every day, presiding over the debates and speeches in this Chamber.

In this nuclear age in which we live, I think it is to the great credit of President Eisenhower that he has clothed Vice President NIXON with great responsibilities unknown in past administrations.

I mention only one. The Vice President is Chairman of the Commission on Equal Job Opportunities Under Government Contracts. I think in that office, as a member of the executive branch of the Government, the Vice President has served this country notably and well.

I make the point that when the chips have been down in this Chamber, and when the responsibility of the presiding officer has been to determine important legal or procedural questions under the Constitution and our own rules, it is to the high credit of the Vice President of the United States that on every such occasion he has presided. As a fine and courageous lawyer he has rendered his decisions to guide the Senate. At the conclusion of his 8-year tenure as Vice President he will have left behind him a standard which may well be the standard for future incumbents of the office of Vice President.

I thank my friend for permitting me to make that observation.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President——

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I appreciate the very pertinent remarks of the distinguished Senator from California. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am quite surprised that many of our colleagues on the other side of the aisle would take it unto themselves to call attention to the amount of time the Vice President sits or does not sit in the chair. I say that because it is likewise an obvious invitation to those on this side of the aisle to criticize one of our colleagues who is conspicuous for his absence from this Chamber. It is not something that either or any of the other Senators on this side enjoy doing, because we all realize the responsibilities involved in being a nominee for the Presidency of the United States. In fact, I think we would be wise to carry the suggestion of my friend from Rhode Island further, and all go home. I think the country is beginning to get wise with respect to this political rump session that is doing nothing.

But when my friend from Ohio utilizes a stopwatch, as he would with a runner on a field or in a boxing match, to determine how much time the Vice President is sitting in the chair of the Presiding Officer, I suggest that it is probably our duty to call to the attention of the American people the number of hours which the other nominee is serving.

There is a bill before the Senate, the minimum wage bill. It is the creature of the Senator from Massachusetts. It has been under consideration by the Senate since last Wednesday night. I wish I had had a stopwatch. I would like to have held it on him to see how often he has been present. I think he has been engaged in debate for less than 300 or 400 words. He was not here at all yesterday that I know of, and yet his bill was the order of business.

We observed in the headlines in the Washington Evening Star yesterday: "KENNEDY Fights for Medical Bill." Where was he fighting for it? I cannot find any forum in which he was fighting, unless it might have been one day when he was in New York.

As I say, it is distasteful to bring this subject to the floor of the Senate. But if the Senator from Ohio persists in attempting to ridicule the Vice President of the United States and our candidate for the Presidency, I shall employ the same procedure from this side.

Where is the Vice President at this moment? He is at a leadership meeting in the White House. He cannot be present.

Where is the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]? I do not know. He might be on his yacht. He might be at home. He might be in his office. But he is not here. The order of business is the minimum wage law, and he should be here pushing the bill, because he and his party have promised to the people of the United States a minimum wage bill. There is a responsibility that I do not think is being met.

I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of my friend from Arizona. The propensity to be elsewhere apparently was in the mind of our distinguished friend from Massachusetts well prior to the conventions, and there need be no further comment.

I have not heretofore called attention to the absences of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. I do not know that I shall do so again. I would not have mentioned it now had it not been for the remarks made on the other side.

RISE IN PERSONAL INCOME ANNOUNCED BY SECRETARY MUELLER

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am delighted today to call attention to an important economic development which hits at the pocketbook of every American. The Department of Commerce yesterday released personal income figures for 1959 showing a 6-percent rise over 1958 and an increase of $23 billion in total personal income.

Before anybody questions these figures and what they mean, I want to set the record straight. Whereas, personal income increased by 6 percent in 1959, the Consumer Price Index rose by only 1 percent. The conclusion is obvious. The increase in per capita personal income is an increase in real income bringing greater opportunities and chances for new experiences to the people of our Nation.

The Federal Government, of course, has had a role to play in bringing about this and other increases in personal income. But I would like to suggest, Mr. President, that the Government's part is a relatively small one. The real job was done by the people. That is the way a free enterprise economy, like the American economy, works, and that is the way it should work.

The American economy continues to grow because our automobile plants and the workers who make automobiles want to make and sell more cars, because independent shoe store owners want to sell more shoes, because the airlines want to increase passengers, because new industries want to sell you new products, because people who have services to provide want to improve these services so that sales will increase.

Mr. President, there are indeed areas in our country wherein economic conditions are not favorable and unemployment is unduly high. We must do something about this. Both the Eisenhower administration and majority in the Congress have long supported legislation to aid our Nation's depressed areas. However, the two have not as yet been able to get together on the best approach to this dilemma.

There is presently in the Congress an area redevelopment bill of which I am a cosponsor and which is backed by the administration. It is similar in many respects to the bills introduced and supported by the majority. If all of us got together, I believe our bill could be enacted this week. Americans would then be on the way toward developing and implementing a needed program to help areas which, to date, have not shared in the full fruits of our Nation's economic prosperity.

Mr. President, all of us are proud of the vitality and prosperity of America's free competitive economy. The people of the whole free world are proud of it too. The striking contrast between the economic spirit of East and West Germany, West Germany being prosperous and free—and East Germany suffering economic woes, strikingly illustrates the inherent strength of a competitive economy. I submit that this contrast is "exhibit No. 1" in support of economic freedom.

Mr. President, I submit also the figures which I cited above and which I have interpreted briefly, and I ask unanimous consent that a press release by the Commerce Department on these figures, dated May 15, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the press release is ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL RISE IN PERSONAL INCOME IN STATES IN 1959—FORTY-FIVE STATES SHOW ADVANCES RANGING UP TO 11 PERCENT

The flow of personal income rose to new highs in nearly every State in 1959 under the impetus of expanding business, the Office of Business Economics, U.S. Department of Commerce, announced today.

For the country as a whole, personal income totaled $381 billion last year, a rise of $23 billion, or 6 percent over 1958. With consumer prices up about 1 percent from 1958, the advances in the main represented increases in real purchasing power.

In most States, the gains ranged from 5 to 10 percent; in three, consumer incomes were lower in 1959 than in 1958. In every State, the dollar volume of nonfarm income was of record proportions last year, with the increase over 1958 amounting to 4 percent or more.

Per capita personal income (total income divided by total population) equaled $2,166 in 1959—about $100 more than the $2,069 recorded in 1958. In view of the 1-percent consumer price increase already noted, most of the per capita income rise represents an improvement in real per capita buying power.

Average incomes were highest—more than $2,600—in the States of Delaware, Connecticut, Nevada, New York, California, Illinois, and New Jersey. In these seven States and the district of Columbia, income ranged from one-fifth to more than one-third above the national average. Figures for each State are shown in the accompanying table.

DISPOSABLE INCOME

The OBE annual accounting of regional income changes, to be published in the forthcoming August issue of its monthly magazine Survey of Current Business contains State estimates of disposable income—personal income less personal tax and nontax payments—for selected years 1955–59. This is the most comprehensive measure of consumer purchasing power available on a geographic basis. As shown in the accompanying table, individual States and regions vary substantially in volume of disposable income.

Of 1959 disposable income of $335 billion, more than $138 billion—two-fifths of the total—was received by residents of five States: New York ($39 billion), California ($36 billion), Illinois ($23 billion), Pennsylvania ($22 billion), and Ohio ($19 billion). There were six States with disposable incomes of less than $1 billion last year.

There are wide geographic differences in per capita disposable income—a measure of the quality or type of consumer market. Among States, highest average disposable income was in Delaware ($2,516). Top averages among larger States included Connecticut ($2,460), New York ($2,350), and California ($2,334).

INCOME CHANGES IN 1959

Increases in aggregate personal income from 1958 to 1959 were associated closely with economic size of the regions. Consumer incomes in the Mideast, Great Lakes, Far West, and southeast—the four largest regions—climbed between $4 billion and $6 billion each. In the southwest and New England States, incomes were up $1½ billion, while in the Plains and Rocky Mountain areas, the rise was $750 million and $500 million, respectively.

Among individual States, the largest advance in total income—$3½ billion—occurred in California. Other top-ranking expansions in 1959 include New York ($3 billion), Illinois and Ohio ($1½ billion, each) and Pennsylvania (nearly $1¼ billion). Together, these five States accounted for almost half of the $23-billion-nationwide rise in consumer incomes last year.

Percentage increases in Florida, Arkansas, Mississippi, Nevada, California, and Hawaii were 10 percent or a little better.

California ranked among the top States in the income advance—both in dollar volume and in percentage terms. Florida misses this special category by only a small margin. The 1959 income experiences of these two States represent extensions of past above-average economic records. Both over the three decades since 1929, and in the more current postwar period, Florida ranks No. 1 in the Nation with regard to relative gain, while California stands fifth.

In contrast to the moderate upturn characterizing economic conditions throughout most of the country, personal income declines of about one-tenth occurred in North Dakota and South Dakota, and of 2 percent in Montana. There was little change in Kansas and Nebraska. In each of these five States, the dampening influence was an unusually large drop in farm income.

Numerous factors influenced State variations in the rate of change in personal income last year. Economic developments with most pronounced geographic impact include the sharp recovery of manufacturing, following the 1957–58 business decline, and the reduction in farm income.

On a national basis, earnings of persons engaged in manufacturing accounted for nearly $9 billion of the $23 billion rise in total income. In every region, the increase in factory earnings was the largest contributors to the upturn in income last year. In the heavily industrial Great Lakes States, nearly two-thirds of the total advance occurred in the manufacturing division.

Government payments to persons were a major element bolstering consumer income and demand during the downphase of the production cycle in 1957–58. In the recovery of last year income from Federal sources continued to rise but at a lesser rate than income from other sources. The small rise in income from Government reflected mainly a decline in unemployment insurance benefits—a result of economic recovery—which offset in part the rise in other Government payments.

Income from agriculture was down one-eighth in 1959, reflecting lower prices for farm products, rising production costs, and the elimination of the acreage reserve program of the soil bank. Farm income changes in individual States, as contrasted with the 13-percent national decline, ranged from advances of one-fourth in several important farm States to reductions of 50 percent.

The influence of farm income on the geographic distribution of income is pointed up by the fact that in eight of the nine States where personal income rose least, or actually declined, the experience is traceable directly to agriculture. Similarly, spurts of roughly one-fourth in income from farming provided primary impetus for the gains in overall income registered in two of the States with top-ranking income gains last year.

INCOME IN ALASKA

Included for the first time in OBE's annual report on State income are estimates of personal income in Alaska. A special release on the results of the Alaska survey was issued by OBE on last July 8. Personal income received by residents of that State totaled $556 million in 1959; per capita income amounted to $2,550. Of the total flow last year, $281 million, or one-half, was paid out by private industry; $239 million, or 43 percent, by the Federal Government; and $37 million, or 7 percent, by State and local governments.

The Survey of Current Business is available from field offices of the Department of Commerce or from the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D.C., at an annual subscription price of $4, including weekly supplements; single copies, 30 cents.

ATTENDANCE OF THE SESSIONS OF THE SENATE

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I think we should have the air cleared once and for all on the matter of the constitutional responsibility of being present in the Senate. There may be justifiable reasons—and I am one of those who feels that there are—why the Vice President cannot sit in the Senate from the moment the bell is rung as we convene to the moment that the bell is rung when we recess or adjourn. I realize that the Vice President of the United States has many extraneous responsibilities that must be fulfilled in conformity with the office he occupies; responsibilities intended to promote the welfare of this great Nation of ours.

I would be the last to criticize the Vice President for not being here through every minute that the Senate is in session. But when a Member on this side of the aisle rises to say that there is a responsibility for the Vice President to preside, when the Constitution provides that he must, and another Senator says that a Senator should be here to respond every time the roll is called, then I am afraid my colleagues should go back to read the Constitution of the United States. There is equal responsibility.

If a Senator is compelled to be here or be subject to criticism because he did not answer all 159 rollcalls, since he answered only 39 of those rollcalls, we get an idea of the sort of propaganda that is going to be spread. After all, my distinguished friend from New York did not take these figures out of thin air; he must have had all of his staff reading the RECORD to check every rollcall, and the number came to 159.

Finally, they discovered that Senator JOHN KENNEDY was at the primaries, speaking to the people of West Virginia, to the people of New Hampshire, to the people of Massachusetts, and possibly even to the people of Rhode Island and Connecticut, in order to win the Democratic nomination for the Presidency of the United States.

What is wrong with that? Republican innuendo after Republican subtlety is becoming a little disgusting to the junior Senator from Rhode Island. If Senators want fairness, let them extend fairness. They have repeatedly chided the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts because he was not on the floor to answer all of those rollcalls.

I remind Senators that this tactic has all been calculated. It has all been documented by the campaign committee.

I submit that JOHN KENNEDY had a right to go to the people of the country to try to win the nomination as the Democratic nominee. The junior Senator from Rhode Island would have done the same, and the junior Senator from New York would have done the same.

No man can stand on the floor, after reading the Constitution, and say that a Senator is more obligated than the Vice President to be here to carry out his constitutional mandate.

I concede that each of these men had occasion to be absent and each of them had a justifiable reason for being absent—both the Senator from Massachusetts and the Vice President.

I am not being critical of the Vice President. I believe he has done a splendid job in carrying out the tasks which were assigned to him by the President of the United States.

All this cheap propaganda is an attempt to persuade the people that JOHN KENNEDY has been a slacker. That is the implication, that he is a slacker—failing to live up to his responsibilities. How utterly ridiculous.

Here is a man who in the murky waters of the Pacific, when his PT boat was sunk from under him, swam 2 miles with one of his men on his back to bring him to shore, and then to bring his crew to safety. Yet the implication is made on the floor of the Senate that JOHN KENNEDY is a slacker.

He has lived up to his responsibilities. The Senate has called the roll 159 times, and he was here, they say, for only 39 of them. As far as the Senator from New York is concerned, it would not make any difference if the Senator from Massachusetts had been here 160 times out of the 159 rollcalls; he would still be against the Senator from Massachusetts.

Whom are these people trying to beguile? Certainly they are not beguiling the American people. These men had a right to be where they were, to carry out their responsibilities according to their conscience and their heart and their mind. If a man in this country wants to become President he ought to go out and fight for it. That is what JOHN KENNEDY did. If Mr. NIXON is doing it, all credit to him; he has a right to do it. But as he has the right, so has JOHN KENNEDY the right.

When the distinguished Senator from New York makes his speech, I hope he will invite the junior Senator from Rhode Island to be here, because I want to be here to listen to it and answer it.

I say to Senators, let us do away with this frivolous talk. It does not convince the people of the country.

The distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] made the observation that the minimum wage bill is pending. Look at the tactics which have been employed. We could not even get a unanimous-consent agreement. Senators on the other side of the aisle would not even rise and say, "I object." The minority leader had to rise and say, "I have been instructed to object." We do not even know who is giving the instructions any more.

Of course, there is no attempt here to bring the session to a conclusion because, somehow, the Republicans have conceived in their own minds the idea that it might be politically advantageous for them to keep JOHN KENNEDY here and to keep Mr. NIXON on the move. That is what it amounts to; that is the way the junior Senator from Rhode Island construes it.

If we are to have a vote on the bill, let us have a vote. I am ready. I have been here all the while. I missed being with my family last weekend, just as many Senators made the same sacrifice. We did nothing on Saturday. We did nothing on Monday. We shall do nothing on Tuesday. We shall do nothing, perhaps, on Wednesday. This matter will drag and drag and drag. Why? Because some Senators do not want the Senate to vote on minimum wages. They do not want this body to vote on this important measure.

Now a platform of 21 new measures has been proposed, and it is desired that they be enacted before we adjourn. Anything to keep JOHN KENNEDY here until November 9. Whether that happens or does not happen, it is my considered opinion that the White House will be graced, come 1961, by the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts, who will have become President, and the chair of the Presiding Officer will be occupied by the distinguished senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PASTORE. Now I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I shall not prolong the discussion; I shall simply say that I share entirely the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Rhode Island that we should vote and get ahead. Let us move ahead with the measure before us and vote on it.

I call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to the fact that the delay in voting on the minimum wage bill has been because a member of his party has had an amendment pending and was insistent that it not be voted upon until today; and that he then expects to offer another amendment. I do not know what the position of other Senators will be, but I shall be willing to agree to a limitation of debate. I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island that we should get on with the business of the Senate and conclude our deliberations. We should not be here at the expense of conducting urgent matters which are properly called the people's business.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I never said, even once, that the junior Senator from New York did not want to vote on the bill. The RECORD will show that a suggestion was made by the distinguished leader of the majority, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], that there be a unanimous-consent agreement; but objection to limited debate, in order to bring discussion on the bill to a conclusion, came from the other side of the aisle.

I daresay the distinguished Senator from Arizona will welcome a delay in the vote. It will please him. However, I never said for a moment that it was the Senator from New York who objected to a limitation on debate. I believe that on the minimum wage bill, he is on the side of the people. The Senator from New York agrees with me in that respect.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President——

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I have the floor.

Mr. BUSH. I understood that a request had been made for a morning hour.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It was objected to.

Mr. BUSH. I withdraw my statement.

Mr. PASTORE. I appreciate the generous gesture on the part of the Senator from Connecticut.

I dare say that the Senator from New York will vote favorably upon the minimum wage bill. However, that position is not shared by certain Republicans and by some Democrats. I never said there was unanimity about the bill one way or the other.

I am simply commenting on the constant lament on the part of certain Senators that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] answered only 39 rollcall out of 159, and then keep repeating it. I keep saying to myself, "Why? What does it prove?"

Where was this man? The implication is, perhaps, that he was out on his yacht. I do not know whether he was. I know PASTORE was never on the yacht. But JOHN KENNEDY is doing his business as a U.S. Senator as the nominee of the Democratic Party. Whether or not he happens to be on the floor of the Senate at a particular moment, to the dissatisfaction of certain Republicans or certain Senators, does not prove that he is not on the job, and doing a swell job. Everytime any Senator rises to criticize JOHN KENNEDY for not being here, the junior Senator from Rhode Island will rise to defend him.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PASTORE. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. I simply remind the Senator from Rhode Island that the whole altercation this morning was not started by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], but by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG]. He brought up the whole matter.

Mr. PASTORE. Oh, but the genesis of the altercation was on the other side of the aisle. It is true that in retaliation the distinguished Senator from Ohio adopted a very dramatic procedure in order to make the point. Perhaps it was a little more dramatic than the junior Senator from Rhode Island might seek to stage. He dramatized the situation by using a stopwatch in order to measure the time. I do not know how much more accurately time can be measured in that way, if it is to be measured at all.

But why did the whole matter start? Because some Senator on the other side of the aisle began to make the point that the junior Senator from Massachusetts was not here to answer every rollcall. So in order to show that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander—that is, in order to prove that what Mr. KENNEDY was doing was what Mr. NIXON was doing—the Senator from Ohio brought the matter up this morning. But that was not the beginning of it.

I have heard this controversy time and time again. I say to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], for whom I have the highest admiration and affection—and he knows it—the sooner we stop these tactics, the better off all of us will be. I hope we have heard the end of the discussion concerning the number of rollcalls the junior Senator from Massachusetts answered or did not answer, because the quicker we get down to a consideration of the issues and the important problems which confront the Nation, the better off we and the Nation will be.

Now I yield the floor.

SENATOR LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, the Washington Evening Star of yesterday, August 15, published an article entitled "Faithful SALTONSTALL in Trouble," written by William S. White, a distinguished reporter who formerly was on the staff of the New York Times and is now, I believe, a writer for a syndicate. Mr. White is the author of a book entitled "Citadel," which is about the U.S. Senate. He is also the author of the book entitled "The Taft Story," which relates to the late distinguished Republican leader, Senator Robert A. Taft.

More than that, I think it fair to say that Mr. William S. White is one of the most respected newspapermen who have ever served any organization on Capitol Hill.

Mr. White has paid a very warm tribute to the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts LEVERETT SALTONSTALL. I have read many comments about Senators, but I have never read one which was so beautiful, wholehearted, and fine an endorsement of a man as I read in Mr. White's editorial of last evening.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial may be printed in the RECORD following my remarks, which I wish to expand a little further.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, the editorial states that because Senator SALTONSTALL is running for reelection in Massachusetts, which is the home State of the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], who is running for the Presidency, this would seem to be a tremendous stumbling block to the reelection of Senator SALTONSTALL and would seem to give Governor Furcolo, his opponent, a very great advantage.

We have observed, over and over again, how a presidential candidate has carried a State, and a senatorial candidate has failed to do so. We have seen remarkable reverses, the very thing Mr. White has written about. In the last election, for instance, when President Eisenhower won in 1956, I recall that the Republicans lost senatorial elections in Pennsylvania, Colorado, and Oregon, all of which it was thought they had excellent chances of winning. But the voters in those States decided otherwise; and although President Eisenhower carried those States by tremendous majorities, the Republican senatorial candidates in those States lost.

I do not want to wish Governor Furcolo any particular bad luck; but I must say that I think it is quite "in the cards" that in view of the distinguished opposition he has on his hands, he may very well find himself in the same position in which some of the Republican nominees who lost when President Eisenhower was winning in their own States found themselves.

Mr. President, why are we so confident about the chances of reelection of the able senior Senator from Massachusets, LEVERETT SALTONSTALL? It is because his record of service to the people of that State is highly unusual. It goes all the way back to 1921 and 1922, when he was assistant district attorney of Middlesex County. In 1923, and for 13 years thereafter, he was a member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives. He was speaker of the house during 8 years of his service there. He was elected Governor of the State of Massachusetts in 1938, and was reelected in 1940 and in 1942. He served as chairman of the New England Governor's conference and of the national Governors' conference in 1944. He was elected to the Senate of the United States in 1944, for the unexpired term of Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, who had resigned to enter the Army. He was reelected to the Senate in 1948, for a 6-year term; and he was again reelected, in November 1954, for a 6-year term which expires next January.

Mr. President, the name of SALTONSTALL in the State of Massachusetts is synonymous with honorable public service; and Senator SALTONSTALL is so well-known and so widely respected throughout his own State that, despite any popularity advantage which might accrue to the Democratic ticket because of Senator KENNEDY, who is the Presidential nominee on the Democratic ticket, that it is my sincere belief that the great record of service of Senator SALTONSTALL in Massachusetts will result in his reelection, regardless of which candidate for the Presidency carries the State of Massachusetts.

[From the Washington Evening Star, Aug. 15, 1960]

FAITHFUL SALTONSTALL IN TROUBLE

(By William S. White)

The lost and forgotten campaign—the campaign nobody notices much—needs some attention, too. The struggle for the Presidency is largely obscuring a series of less dramatic but deeply significant contests involving the U.S. Senate.

Not the least of these contests engages one of the finest ever to sit in the Senate in our time, LEVERETT SALTONSTALL of Massachusetts.

The tone of the Senate—which is after all the world's most powerful forum of debate and action—is in the end the tone of the Nation. A seat there is representative, for good or for ill, of far more than a single State. In the wrong occupancy it can become a national strongpoint for a wild emotional "liberalism" which can think only of some misty tomorrow—or of an obstructive ultraconservatism which can think only of the long-departed yesterday.

A Senator of the United States, that is to say, can become an immensely important force—to his State, yes; but, even more, to his country.

Such an important force for tolerant common sense is Senator LEVERETT SALTONSTALL. After 16 years of unpretentious and quietly distinguished service he is now hard pressed for reelection.

FEELS KENNEDY DRIVE

His trouble, so far as one can gather, is not that he has not done a good job. It arises mainly from the circumstance that the Democrats chose his fellow Senator from Massachusetts, JOHN F. KENNEDY, as their Presidential nominee.

Whether or not KENNEDY is to be able to win the whole country, no one doubts he will do very well indeed in his native New England. The strong probability is that as head of the Democratic ticket he may carry many a lesser candidate along with him. Specifically, he may well so carry Foster Furcolo, the probable Democratic candidate for SALTONSTALL'S place in the Senate.

There is irony in this. For SALTONSTALL and KENNEDY—the one an old-line Yankee Republican, and the other a brisk young Democrat—have not only always got along well together in jointly looking after their State. They have also liked and respected each other as representatives not merely of two parties but of two cultures—the old culture of the Boston Brahmins and the new culture of the up-and-coming Americans of Irish background.

By choice and taste I am not partisan as a political writer and this column is not partisan. But it unashamedly is pro-SALTONSTALL—not as a Republican, but as a man; not as a politician seeking office but as a Senator of the United States who has long honored the office he already holds.

This correspondent has nothing whatever against Mr. Furcolo and raises no question of his ability and promise. But this correspondent also has a deep and candid and strictly nonpolitical affection for the institution of the Senate.

TRUE SENATE TYPE

It is a respect and affection that goes especially to those superior men—their party being absolutely irrelevant—whom he once called the Senate type. SALTONSTALL is precisely such a type.

He is not brilliant; but he is sturdy and strong in these hard, rough times. He is a faithful partisan, a member of his party's leadership in the Senate. But he is also much more than a partisan. He is a good man for the whole United States of America, whenever and wherever we are in danger in this world.

I never saw him do a mean or ugly thing. I never saw him flinch when his duty lay clear before him. I never saw him condone unfairness even when it might have benefited him and his party. It is not merely that he is a gentleman. For the accident of birth made him that and he deserves no special credit for it. The big thing is that he is a man—m-a-n. And he has well and decently earned his place in the regard of some of the most acute judges of their fellow men on earth, the Members of the Senate.

For, perhaps oddly, the Senate doesn't care much about what a man's party is. It cares about what he is.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BUSH. I am happy to yield.

Mr. KEATING. I read with gratification the laudatory column written by the distinguished journalist, William White, who is not as a rule given to this style and tone of writing. When an especially able and sophisticated Washington journalist devotes a full column to praise a Member of this body, it is indeed unique. I can think of only two or three Members of this body—perhaps more—on both sides of the aisle who might so eminently justify a tribute as warm and far-reaching as that by Mr. White with reference to our distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL].

Senator SALTONSTALL has been a tower of strength in this body, and I know that countless Members on the other side of the aisle would agree.

If I may be permitted a personal comment, let me say that Senator SALTONSTALL has been a very great friend and ally to me during the short time I have been a Member of this body.

It is my sincere hope that the predictions which our friend, the Senator from Connecticut, has been bold enough to make will turn out to be accurate.

Mr. BUSH. I thank the distinguished Senator from New York for his comments on this matter.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I commend my friend from Connecticut for inserting in the RECORD an excellent article published in the Washington Evening Star of last night commenting upon the service and character of U.S. Senator LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, of Massachusetts. It is fair to say that no Member of this body is held in higher respect by his colleagues than is Senator LEVERETT SALTONSTALL of Massachusetts. Known by his impeccable integrity and by his great intellectual capacity in very truth he represents the best interests not only of all the people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts but also all the people of the United States.

Several weeks ago I had the honor to speak at my party's convention in Massachusetts. I saw there evidence of the great respect which his fellow citizens have for the senior Senator from Massachusetts. So far as I am concerned, I know that LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, a distinguished Republican U.S. Senator, will stand upon a long and honorable record as a public servant to his State and to his Nation. I have no doubt he will campaign successfully as a true representative of the best interests of the people.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I am delighted that my distinguished friend from California has added his voice to the accolade of approval of our good colleague from Massachusetts. I wish to emphasize the great record of the Senator from Massachusetts about which the Senator from California spoke at the end of his remarks today. He has served his State and Nation for a period of 40 years. I reemphasize the point which I made earlier in my remarks, that it is inconceivable to me that the people of a State with so high a degree of intelligence and education as exists in the State of Massachusetts could possibly reject a man of the quality of LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, a man who has so faithfully, ably and well served his State over a period of 40 years.

As I said before, the name of SALTONSTALL, not merely over a period of 40 years, but generations, has been synonymous with public service in the State of Massachusetts. I am grateful that my friend has added his word of approval.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank my able colleague.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am delighted that I returned from the White House in time to concur in all the expressions which are being made with respect to our distinguished friend and colleague from Massachusetts. He is truly a seasoned statesman and a seasoned legislator. There is about him that fine restraint, sometimes called New England reserve, which has much to do with impelling him also to approach every legislative problem in the national interest and on a high level. I have served with him in season and out on the Appropriations Committee. We have served together in the leadership meetings with the President, in the policy committee, and our own party conferences. His perspective and his viewpoint have never been dimmed or narrowed by provincial considerations. I fully subscribe to and join in the statements that were made concerning his service to his constituency in the great State of Massachusetts, but perhaps more so to the people of the United States of America. He regards himself not only as a Senator of that State, but also as a Senator of the United States of America. From that high vantage ground he has always pursued his public responsibilities.

He deserves all the acclaim we can accord him, and we do wish him well in the approaching contest. As I have said on a number of occasions, the people of the State of Massachusetts will not be serving him; they will be serving themselves best when they send back a man of such great background as a member of his legislature, as Governor of his Commonwealth, and then for a long period of time as a Senator of the United States.

Mr. KUCHEL. The eloquent comments which our Republican leader in the Senate has uttered reflect the feelings of all of us on this side of the aisle with respect to the senior Senator from Massachusetts. I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I would very briefly like to second what has been said by the minority leader, by my colleague from California, by my colleague from New York, and by my colleague from Connecticut, with reference to LEVERETT SALTONSTALL'S service. All this is not praise, and it is not extolling him. It is recognizing the facts with respect to a valuable public servant when we see one. It is recognizing a man of very high character. I know of no man who has set for himself a higher standard of probity and integrity in terms of his thinking and the thinking of others than has Senator SALTONSTALL. He graces a body like this by the climate which he creates in it.

I believe with my colleagues that the people of Massachusetts are not only well served, but that they also make a significant contribution to the deliberations of the Senate and the affairs of men by having given us LEVERETT SALTONSTALL. We hope very much that they will give him to us for many more years to come.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank my colleague from New York.

THE MINIMUM WAGE BILL

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I could not help but hear, today, the discussion which took place with respect to consideration of the pending minimum wage bill. My mind went back to the colloquy which occurred before we left here for Sunday, with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], who is his party's nominee for the highest office in the land, about the fact, which I think needs constant emphasis, that, as my friend and colleague from New York [Mr. KEATING] has made so crystal clear, there are a very substantial number of Members on this side, as there are on the other side, who are very anxious to get on with the pending business and to vote on the minimum wage bill.

Mr. President, I point out that a number of us tried to facilitate that, not only by urging it, but also by removing from the consideration of the minimum wage bill any of the discussion with respect to the very hotly debated subject of civil rights, upon which so many of us feel very keenly.

I say that because I think the debate is not partisan. I think the Senators who are engaged in it are entitled to great credit. The country needs to be aroused to the fact that, without regard to party, there is here a very solid coalition in favor of the passage of a minimum wage bill, which is being frustrated and delayed by some who feel that they might profit by delay.

I wish immediately to point out that my dear friend and colleague, the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], who is quite sincerely opposed to the bill, is here, and that he was very wise and statesmanlike in making it clear, the other day, as soon as he had an opportunity to do so, that so far as he is concerned, he is not pretending to lead the Republicans, or anything of the sort.

The country should have very clearly in mind, therefore, the fact that there may be quite sincere opposition and deeply held opposition, and that the Senator from Arizona is ready to meet the issues as they come up, and that there is also support for this particular measure on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I should like to point out that yesterday we spent almost the entire day on other matters. We were here a considerable number of hours, but only two speeches on the subject of the minimum wage bill were made. I think the total amount of time spent on that subject on yesterday was about 1½ hours.

Those of us who are opposed to this measure or the Members of the Senate who wish to see the measure changed before it is passed have not been the ones who have been delaying action on it; and I may point out that this has not been a partisan matter. Only a handful of Republican Senators and only a handful of Democratic Senators have spoken to the subject.

So I cannot agree with anyone who says action on this bill has purposely been delayed. It has not been.

I repeat what I said the other day: that were we in a regular session of the Congress, I can assure my friend, the Senator from New York, that consideration of this bill would take 3 weeks; and he knows full well that it would, because this bill is an extremely complicated one. Many members of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare are not aware of what the bill provides.

So I wish to correct any misapprehension which my good friend, the Senator from New York, may have left in the minds of some persons—namely, that the junior Senator from Arizona or any of the other Members of this body who have been engaged in debating this measure have been purposely delaying action on it.

I may say there was a very good chance—in fact, I would say an excellent chance—that we could vote on yesterday on the pending amendment. But some Senators talked about the medical care bill almost the whole day long, even though that bill is not even on the floor.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my friend for his remarks, which are quite in keeping with what I said about the way in which he has comported himself in this debate.

DESIRABILITY OF CONFIRMATION OF NOMINATIONS OF EARL KINTNER TO FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION AND ROBERT BICKS TO DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to join in the plea which quite properly and very pertinently was made yesterday by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], on the majority side of the aisle, in favor of confirmation by the Senate of the nomination of Earl Kintner to be head of the Federal Trade Commission and the nomination of Robert Bicks to be Chief of the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

I wish to emphasize one note which was intimated in the course of the excellent address by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], but which I believe deserves reiteration and emphasis. It goes to the fact that it is reported in the press that the chairmen of the respective committees which are considering these nominations felt that the ends of justice and the national interest were adequately cared for by the fact that both of these men would be serving on a temporary basis as interim appointees.

Mr. President, I thoroughly disagree as to that. I do not believe that answers the question at all. In the first place, it jeopardizes the prestige, influence, and impact which they may have on those with whom they do business. That is an extremely important point when one is engaged in activities as important as those carried on by the Federal Trade Commission or by the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice, and particularly when one is contending with interests as powerful as those with which those two agencies contend.

So I think that situation very damaging to their capability to do the jobs which those gentlemen have to do, and to the required impact they are able to have.

In the second place, these two gentlemen are of the highest quality; and I have little doubt that if a new President should desire them to retire from their offices, in order to make way for someone else, they certainly would give that the highest consideration, as would be fitting.

Mr. President, beyond anything else in that regard, giving them a temporary status does not equip them to do the job which they have demonstrated they can do so superbly well in the public interest.

That is point No. 1. Second, we are anxious to get good men in Government. Whoever wins in the coming national election—and those of us here on this side of the aisle certainly hope our side will win it, and we will work very hard to see that it does—will need dedicated public servants. When a man comes to consider whether he should go to work in Washington, he will be considering the record as well as the opportunities, and the treatment which was meted out to those who held the same or similar jobs. I do not see that this in any way is an encouragement to public servants of the quality and character of these public servants, Mr. Kintner and Mr. Bicks, who have so very capably and effectively demonstrated their contribution to the public service. It certainly is not a good precedent to leave them dangling just because some of us, or some on the other side of the aisle, may be concerned about the political advantages of not confirming their nominations for those offices in the present session. I do not think there are any political advantages in that. That is why the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is to be praised for speaking for them from the majority side.

There are a great many issues at stake in respect to the confirmation of these appointments. Whatever may be my differences with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], chairman of the Judiciary Committee, he is nonetheless a man of great responsibility here in terms of the position which he holds in the Senate. So I very much hope he may reconsider the proposition of confirming the Bicks nomination.

The same is true of my very dear friend, with whom I have served for a very long time in one way or another, the distinguished chairman of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], a man for whom I have very high regard and great affection.

I hope very much he, too, may give further consideration to the high desirability, in the public interest, of bringing up before the committee the matter of the confirmation of the nomination of Earl Kintner.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. The distinguished senior Senator from New York has performed a great service in calling our attention to this matter. Both of these nominations have been pending a long time. I have had the unique opportunity to see both of these men in action. I well remember, as a member of the House Committee on the Judiciary, the frequent appearances before us of Mr. Kintner. Very few, if any, public servants from the executive branch under any administration have impressed me as much with their grasp of the issues as did Mr. Kintner in his presentations to us. He is a man of unusual ability; and it is regrettable, indeed, that his nomination to this post has not been confirmed before this.

As for Mr. Bicks, I say to my colleague from New York that I have brought this matter up before in the Committee on the Judiciary. We were supposed to meet this morning, but an objection was made to a meeting while the Senate is in session. I anticipate, however, that we will have a meeting before the session is over—and it is my intention, if I may get recognition in that committee, to urge that his nomination be brought before us.

My senior colleague from New York and I are not only acquainted with Robert Bicks, but well acquainted, and we know of his unusual standing in the legal fraternity in the State of New York. His father is a distinguished Federal judge. His mother is a woman of unusual distinction in the community. Robert Bicks is one of the ablest young men I have ever encountered in Federal service. He has performed a conscientious and outstanding job as the Chief of the Antitrust Division. Time and again it has been brought to my attention that he has conducted himself there in a very lawyerlike and objective manner.

The problems which come before that division for consideration are complex. It is very difficult, in many cases, to know whether or not an action should be brought for a violation of the antitrust laws. There is no field of law more uncertain. I believe that Robert Bicks has displayed a maturity of judgment and initiative and an outstanding ability which thoroughly justifies the Attorney General in recommending that he be made the head of the division.

I share the hope of my senior colleague that action can be taken on this nomination at this session before we leave here. It is necessary to a proper conduct of that office that it be done. I know that the Attorney General is very anxious that it be done. I can only say that anything within my power, as one member of the committee, will be done to expedite the favorable consideration of this nomination and other important nominations pending before the committee.

Mr. JAVITS. I am extremely grateful to my colleague. He can be very helpful in the committee, and I am delighted to hear he will raise the matter personally.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. In just a moment. Let me complete this thought.

I know how effective my colleague from New York is. I am very hopeful that his action may be the fulcrum upon which this matter may turn.

I may say that Bob Bicks is a New Yorker. This is a case in which I can speak with the greatest depth of feeling. I know his family, as does my colleague from New York [Mr. KEATING]. Here is a young man not only of great capability and training and proven ability for the job, but with a family background that is most unusual in terms of giving him a tradition which entitles him to be entrusted with a very high public office.

Out of political season, we always talk about our desire to want the Federal establishment to be staffed by disinterested public servants, not carrying in their minds any political thoughts. I know of no one who would be superior to Bob Bicks from that standpoint in doing his job, whoever might be proposed from the other side, and whatever his political connections. It seems to me this is the time to say we are above politics when we come to this consideration. Indeed, it is the best kind of politics. It is in that sense that I appeal to the chairmen of the committees in respect of these nominations.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for yielding. I wish to endorse what the Senator has said about Mr. Kintner and to express the same hope he expressed.

I also wish to speak for a moment in regard to Mr. Bicks. I ardently hope that the nomination of Mr. Bicks may be reported favorably, taken up and acted upon by the Senate, because I think Mr. Bicks has earned confirmation of his nomination by distinguished service in the Department of Justice.

There is one angle which I think ought to be brought out. Our party is frequently called the party of big business. We are accused, erroneously and unfairly, I believe, of showing partiality to big business, and so forth. I think if the record were carefully examined and objectively examined it never would sustain the charge, but instead would show that we are very much the friend of small business and the friend of all business.

The important thing about the nomination of Mr. Bicks is that the nomination has run into some opposition from the field of big business. There have been big business operators who have pled that the Bicks nomination should be set aside. I simply wonder whether it is responsive to that plea from big business that our friends across the aisle are holding up the nomination of Mr. Bicks. Are they doing it at the request of big business? Why are they doing it?

Does the Senator have any comment in that regard?

Mr. JAVITS. I would say that the remarks of my colleague from Connecticut are certainly pertinent, and they bear upon the matter of getting the Bicks nomination acted on, so that these questions may not arise or be considered as germane to the proposition. I think it is pretty open knowledge that the Republican fund raisers find it very difficult in some areas of business because of the fact that this great support has been vested in Bob Bicks, in terms of the antitrust laws.

Mr. BUSH. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt further, the Senator is not implying, is he, that the Democrats might be getting the money because they are holding up the nomination of Mr. Bicks? I would not believe that could be sustained.

Mr. JAVITS. No. I think the Senator from Connecticut and I and others of our colleagues have done our utmost, even though this is a hot political season, to keep, as much as we can, the things we are trying to do clear of those implications and to not cast those colorations ourselves.

I would not believe—and I say this advisedly—that such has anything to do with the matter. I think too highly of my colleagues who are concerned to have any such view. I am quite confident the Senator from Connecticut feels the same.

I think what the Senator from Connecticut has given voice to is really a series of questions which one asks one's self when the nomination of so desirable a public servant, whose nomination has been pending so long, who appeared before the committee, who seems to have satisfied every conceivable reason why his nomination should be confirmed, is nonetheless not confirmed. The theory is advanced that he can do the job as well because he serves in an interim status, but I think we would agree—certainly the Senator from Connecticut and I would—that simply is not so.

I am very grateful to my colleague, because I think he has made more sharp the point I was trying to make.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the biography indicating the rather extraordinary record of Earl W. Kintner, acting as Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, though not confirmed by the Senate for that position, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the biography was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Earl W. Kintner, Chairman, born November 6, 1912, at Corydon, Ind., and grew up on farm in Gibson County, Ind., near Princeton. Republican. NEW USE FOR ELLIS ISLAND

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, many Americans still think of Ellis Island with a certain air of nostalgia because this spot of land in New York Harbor was once the gateway to America for millions of immigrants, the first bit of American soil they touched.

Mr. President, everybody remembers the historic words of Emma Lazarus inscribed on the Statue of Liberty, expressing this sentiment in the most eloquent way.

Today a new career for Ellis Island is being contemplated in a number of proposals to make it a center of higher learning. The need for such an institution seems to be unquestioned, but discussion over what kind of an institution it should be has led to a number of provocative proposals.

One of those proposals, Mr. President, is for an Ellis Island University, a proposal with which my colleagues should be acquainted, as set forth in an editorial in the New York Times published on August 11.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial analyzing these proposals, which appeared in the New York Times, August 11, entitled "An Ellis Island University?" printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN ELLIS ISLAND UNIVERSITY?

Discussion this week of Ellis Island's future found a majority of organization spokesmen in support of establishment of an institution of higher learning on the historic 27 acres of now unused real estate. Proposals at a special session arranged by the Federal Government's General Services Administration and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare ranged from the founding of a liberal arts college, advocated by a group of distinguished academic leaders, to the creation of a special university for foreign students or a training center for Americans preparing to serve their country abroad.

The proposals were made with the highest motives of idealism in the service of education. But before any of these plans are translated into action the practical facts ought to be fully examined.

Of the various proposals perhaps the most questionable is the idea of an institution exclusively for foreign students. One of the most important aspects of a foreign student's stay in America, at least as vital as his academic objectives, is the chance to become part of American campus life within the American community. Any segregation of foreign students on a campus of their own would, it seems to us, wipe out some major gains of the exchange idea.

There may well be similar objections to a segregated center for the training of Americans who will represent their Nation abroad. The American spirit may best be exported by men and women with the broad background of a first-rate general education coupled with high technical skills. A special center might be suspected of substituting indoctrination for education.

None of these objections would stand in the way of a good liberal arts college or, perhaps, an experimental college or university. The need for experimentation in higher education is beyond question. But before Ellis Island is selected as the site, expert estimates of costs should be obtained on everything from transportation to and from the island and problems of housing for students and faculty to the renovation and conversion of buildings. Recent surveys of college financing have turned up devastating evidence that white elephant college plants, inherited from a less functional past, are eating away at teachers' salaries and thus the quality of education. It would be especially unfortunate to see an experimental institution handicapped by an uneconomical maintenance burden.

None of these objections should prejudice the final decision or obscure the good intent of the proposals. But idealistic aims should not be endangered by lack of economic realism.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I couple this request with an urging that the General Services Administration, as speedily as possible, should bring about the consummation of some constructive use for this very historic island in New York Harbor.

CONFLICT-OF-INTEREST LEGISLATION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on the subject of conflict-of-interest legislation, there is being published today by Harvard University Press one of the most important reports on Government activities in recent years, the report of the special committee on the Federal conflict-of-interest laws of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York. At the time this report was released in preliminary form on February 22, 1960, I introduced, together with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] a bill drafted by the special committee to implement its recommendations, S. 3080. This bill has received no action in the Committee on the Judiciary, where it is pending, nor have any other bills on this important issue, which is a matter of the very basis of fair and impartial government. The one bill on this subject which has been reported to the Senate, S. 1734, which was reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on August 12, 1960, has been languishing ever since on the Senate Calendar.

Mr. President, I certainly think that this is a matter of the most urgent kind. Whenever we get into difficulty and find some public servant or public official who has not been true to his trust we always talk about the fact that we need to have a code of ethics or a standard of ethics, and just as promptly forget about the entire matter when the situation passes from the headlines.

Therefore, I think it is an act of statesmanship on our part, rather than headline hunting, to work very hard to see that such legislation is placed on the statute books out of season, when the hard day-to-day work has to be done. I hope very much that this subject will have early attention of the committees charged with studying it.

Plenty of proposed legislation has been introduced. This great report by the special committee of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York is one of the most illuminating documents I have ever read on this subject.

Mr. President, there is no dearth of experts. There is no dearth of proposals. There is no dearth of materials for action. What there is a dearth of is action. Action is what I urge, Mr. President.

I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD at this point an article from this morning's Washington Post commenting on the report of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW LEGISLATION IS URGED TO DEAL WITH CONFLICT OF INTEREST

(By Julius Duscha)

During the Civil War, enterprising Government clerks augmented their meager salaries by helping citizens to sue the Government.

Today such enterprise would quickly lead to a conflict-of-interest investigation by a congressional committee.

But 100 years ago there were no investigations on Capitol Hill. Many Senators and Representatives were as busy prosecuting claims against the Government as were the clerks who had access to the files.

Some Members of Congress even bought space in Washington newspapers to advertise their availability as claims prosecutors.

Although Washington is now relatively free from such flagrant violations of Government trust, many other conflict-of-interest matters remain unresolved.

In a book published today, "Conflict of Interest and Federal Service," the Association of the Bar of the City of New York urges Congress to write a new statute to deal with conflicts of interest among Government employees.

The report notes that much of the present conflict-of-interest legislation was passed by Congress as a result of the excesses of a century ago and is as obsolete as a Civil War cannon.

"As Government has grown in size," the study points out, "it has undertaken many new functions formerly private and has become a more or less overt force in many more. * * *

"The importance of the new mixed economy to modern conflict of interest problems cannot be overemphasized. * * * It has infinitely multiplied the contacts between citizens and the Government, between private economic interests and the Government. * * *

"As the line between private and public blurs into a broad gray band, the possibility of joint or overlapping interests increases, the whole premise of conflicts regulation begins to be undermined."

Elsewhere, the report says:

"In the United States today we cannot hope to build a system of restrictions that will keep all persons connected with the Government from acting in any matter in which they have a personal interest. Such a system is a mirage."

The report says it is a mirage because "in our mixed economy * * * we can no longer hope to keep our interests in neat identifiable compartments."

As an example, the report cites scientific activities, where "Government, industry, and educational institutions are operating full blast on a partnership basis."

"It has become archaic, impractical, and inconsistent in such a situation," the report goes on to note, "to say that a scientist may not work for Government unless he ceases to work for industry or for an educational institution."

"We are deliberately constructing institutions of dual, or blended, loyalties, and must be prepared to live with the conflict of interest consequences," the report concludes.

The report, published by the Harvard University Press, is the result of a 2-year study financed by a $72,500 grant to the bar association from the Ford Foundation.

The association's 10-man special committee on the Federal conflict of interest laws, which was responsible for the report, was headed by Roswell B. Perkins, a former Assistant Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and included Charles A. Horsky, a prominent Washington lawyer.

Directed by Bayless Manning, professor of law at Yale University, and Marver H. Bernstein, professor of politics at Princeton University, the report is the first comprehensive study of conflict-of-interest problems.

The legislative recommendations were made public last February. They include prohibitions against Federal employees receiving money or gifts from persons with which they deal in an official capacity. Also, a Federal employee would be barred from acting in any matter in which he has a personal financial interest.

The legislation would, however, ease the present restrictions on activities of former Federal employees in their dealings with the Government. The prohibitions would apply only to matters which came before an employee when he worked for the Government.

The proposed bill also would allow a businessman who accepts, say, a Cabinet post to keep his rights in a pension plan or other "security oriented" compensation program financed by private industry.

The report does not go into the problems of congressional conflicts of interest, except to note that they are many.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I read with great interest the book entitled "Conflict of Interest and Federal Service" recently issued. The book should emphasize to the Nation and particularly the Congress, the need for strengthening and bringing up to date our conflict-of-interest statutes. This volume actually consists of a report prepared by a special committee of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, under the able leadership of Roswell B. Perkins, which first appeared in February of this year.

This comprehensive report is a milestone in the study of the relation between ethical conduct and governmental service. It represents a vital contribution to the study of how best to attract and hold in Federal work, individuals of the highest ability and integrity.

Following the issuance of this report in February, I joined with my senior colleague from New York [Mr. JAVITS] in introducing a broad ethics bill based on the recommendations of the bar association special committee. This measure, S. 3080, seeks to codify various conflict-of-interest laws, repeals those which are now obsolete, and extends their application to cover more people in the Federal service. The bill places main reliance on administrative and civil remedies for those who violate the proposed rules and regulations. Charged with overseeing the application of the law would be an administrator appointed by the President and serving within the Executive Office. I know that my senior colleague [Mr. JAVITS] shares this view.

A principal shortcoming of S. 3080 is that it does not apply to Members of the House and Senate and their employees. This is a subject in which I have long taken an interest, since I feel that we in Congress should be subject to just as tight restrictions as any other Federal employee with regard to conflict-of-interest problems. However, I ought to point out that the special committee which drafted this bill did recommend that a study be made of the subject of conflict of interest and Congress—a proposal which is embodied in a bill I previously introduced to create a Commission on Ethics in the Federal Government.

It is my hope that publication of this volume yesterday will spur action in this vital field. There has been an abundance of talk but a woeful lack of action by Congress on this subject. It is important for the future of our Nation that we clarify once and for all the conflict-of-interest status of Federal workers, including Members of Congress. To do this we must codify the present laws, and we must update and strengthen them.

This is a task which should be delayed no longer. S. 3080 provides a reasoned, practical basis for the congressional action I hope will be forthcoming.

I commend my colleague for calling attention to the publication of this very important work on the subject.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I thank my colleague for his comments and join him in the statement which we have both stood for so constantly, and which we think is only fair and just, that Members of Congress and their employees should be treated the same as other Federal employees, and also to pay tribute to our distinguished fellow New Yorker, Roswell B. Perkins, who has taken the leadership of the Bar Association of the City of New York in this endeavor.

"LEADING QUESTION"—CIVIL RIGHTS VOTE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, during the "Leading Question" broadcast of Friday, August 12, 1960, on which I appeared with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] a statement made by me regarding the vote in the Senate last week when the greatest part of the majority voted to table even a minimal civil rights bill at this time has led to a misunderstanding which I wish to clear up immediately.

To set the record straight, four Democrats voted with an overwhelming majority of Republicans on Tuesday, August 9, against a motion to table the extremely moderate civil rights legislation introduced by the minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. Those Democrats were Senators PAUL DOUGLAS, PHILIP HART, PAT MCNAMARA, and WAYNE MORSE. They have long been associated with the cause of civil rights and their support was most welcome, coming as it did at a time when many of their Democratic colleagues who normally join forces with us on civil rights did not vote with us on this occasion.

A constituent of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] heard the "Leading Question" broadcast and understood me to say that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] had cast his vote for the tabling motion, when, in fact, he did exactly the opposite, along with the three other Democratic Senators noted earlier.

The Senator from Illinois has a consistent and courageous record on civil rights. During his very first year in this body he joined in the fight to invoke cloture during the filibuster against the FEPC bill, and he has been very active in a leadership position in that fight ever since.

It would be exceedingly unfair to the Senator from Illinois to allow any such misunderstanding as I apparently created, quite unwittingly, to remain of record. Therefore I have hastened at the earliest moment to make perfectly clear to his constituents the unimpaired record which he has always had upon this question, carried out with full consistency by his vote a week ago today.

COMMITTEE MEETING DURING SENATE SESSION

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator withold that suggestion momentarily?

Mr. ELLENDER. I withhold it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] has a request he would like to make. I understand he has cleared it with the minority leader. I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Arkansas may have permission for the Permanent Investigating Subcommittee of the Committee on Government Operations to meet during the sessions of the Senate today and tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I discussed the matter with the Senator. This is very important business that his subcommittee must discharge. I regret I was not on the floor earlier when the request was made. I must say that I had hoped that perhaps the Committee on the Judiciary might meet this morning, because there are a number of matters it must dispose of. However, I understand the time has now gone by. I would have agreed to any request in that connection, but I could not be here, because of other matters. I understand now that the request will be made on Friday, and that will be quite agreeable.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I understand that the request is for the subcommittee to meet today and tomorrow.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes; today and tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I renew my suggestion that a quorum is not present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage of employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, since last Wednesday we have been attempting to get a vote on proposed minimum wage legislation. Now it appears that the proponents of the pending amendment are willing to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement which would become effective at 2 o'clock and would allow an hour on each side on the pending amendment.

I ask unanimous consent that on the pending Holland amendment, beginning at 2 o'clock the time for debate be limited to 2 hours, 1 hour to be controlled by the proponent of the amendment and 1 hour by the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky will state it.

Mr. COOPER. If the unanimous-consent agreement were entered into, would it preclude the offering of an amendment to the Holland amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The agreement would only limit the debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to include the request of the Senator from Kentucky in the time limitation. Does the Senator have any idea how much time he would like to have?

Mr. COOPER. No; it might depend on questions I should like to address to the Senator from Florida. In order to be protected, I shall submit the amendments. I am not certain that I shall call them up. That will depend on the explanation made of the Holland amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I shall amend the proposed unanimous-consent agreement to include the Holland amendment and amendments thereto.

Mr. COOPER. I have no objection to that. I send my amendments to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The agreement is limited to 2 hours. Without objection, the agreement is entered.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Has the agreement been entered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The agreement has been entered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Chair ruled that it had been entered.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I was seeking recognition. I understood we were considering the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the agreement be vitiated. Although the Chair announced that it had been entered, the Senator from Florida had sought recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLAND. I appreciate the action of the Chair in vitiating the agreement. I have no objection to the agreement, and I hope it will be entered into. I offered, 2 or 3 days ago, as the RECORD will show, to follow the course being taken now.

What I wish to make clear is that in view of the fact that some Senators have expressed fear that the amendment might apply to other than agricultural labor, I have proposed to reword the amendment so as to make it very clear that it will apply only in the agricultural field, because that is the only field to which it was intended to be applied.

Mr. President, I send to the desk a substitute amendment and ask that the proposed unanimous-consent agreement be applicable to it, rather than to the amendment in its original wording. I have copies of the substitute amendment for Senators who have expressed some interest in this subject matter. That was the only purpose for which I desired to be recognized.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute amendment be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 24, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

"SEC. 11. Except as may otherwise be expressly provided by law, the Secretary of Labor shall have no power to regulate, either through the withholding of benefits or services or otherwise, the wages or hours of employment of employees employed in agriculture (as defined in section 3 (f) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938)."

On page 24, line 7, strike out "SEC. 11" and insert "SEC. 12".

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I renew my request, and ask that it apply to the substitute Holland amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, is it understood that if I call up one of my amendments, it will be included in the unanimous-consent agreement which provides for 2 hours of debate?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. My understanding was that the unanimous-consent request would cover my amendment and any amendments thereto. It is quite agreeable to me to have any amendments thereto considered under the same time limitation. I have no objection to the request.

Mr. COOPER. I should like to make it clear that I am not yet certain that I shall call up my amendments. That will depend on the explanation to be made by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, do I correctly understand that, in accordance with custom, the provision requiring germaneness will be contained in the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes; the usual form will be followed.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the agreement is entered.

The unanimous-consent agreement, as subsequently reduced to writing, is as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, That, effective at 2 o'clock, during the further consideration of the amendment by the Senator from Florida, Mr. HOLLAND (a modification of his amendment designated as "8–12–67—E") and all amendments thereto, debate shall be limited to 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of the amendment and the majority leader: Provided, That no amendment that is not germane to the amendment shall be received.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

REPORT ON PROMOTION OF PEACE AND STABILITY IN THE MIDDLE EAST—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting herewith the fifth report to the Congress covering activities through June 30, 1960, in furtherance of the purposes of the joint resolution to promote peace and stability in the Middle East. This report supplements earlier reports forwarded to the Congress.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 15, 1960.

(NOTE.—Only copy of report transmitted to the House of Representatives.)

REPORT ON U.S. PARTICIPATION IN THE U.N.—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the United Nations Participation Act, I transmit herewith the 14th annual report, covering U.S. participation in the United Nations during the year 1959.

Once again in 1959 the United Nations demonstrated its value in promoting the goals of peace which the people of the United States hold in common with the great majority of the peoples of the world. Especially significant were United Nations actions in response to a request for help from Laos; in promoting cooperation in the peaceful use of outer space; in furthering the economic and social welfare of peoples in rapidly or newly developing nations; and in guiding and assisting the rapid, historic evolution of dependent peoples toward self-government or independence.

1. When the Kingdom of Laos asked the help of the Security Council in preserving its freedom and independence, the Council dealt with the situation swiftly and effectively. Its decision to send a subcommittee to Laos provided a tranquilizing influence and was followed by further important steps.

The crisis developed from attempts by the Communist bloc to subvert the independence of Laos. Rebel forces within the country were receiving active support from the Communists in north Viet-Nam. Communist propaganda emanating simultaneously from Hanoi, Peiping, and Moscow sought to confuse world opinion.

In these circumstances, the Lao Government appealed to the United Nations for assistance. Over Soviet opposition the Security Council adopted a resolution introduced by the United States establishing a factfinding subcommittee consisting of Argentina, Italy, Japan, and Tunisia.

This subcommittee visited Laos to obtain the facts of the situation at first-hand. Its presence there immediately had a quieting effect. Fighting abated, and the threat to the nation's independence was reduced.

After completing its inquiry the subcommittee issued a report on its findings which helped the Security Council and world opinion to understand better the danger confronting Laos.

In November Secretary-General Hammarskjold visited Laos. He reached the conclusion that one way to speed the return of stability to Laos was to provide international aid and guidance in economic development. He later sent a personal representative, Mr. Sakari Tuomioja, a former Prime Minister of Finland and Executive Secretary of the Economic Commission for Europe, to consider how the United Nations could best assist Laos in this field. Before the end of the year Mr. Tuomioja completed a report recommending a broad economic and technical assistance program for the development of the country.

The Security Council's action on Laos also opened up new possibilities for action in the Security Council free of the veto. In establishing a subcommittee in spite of an attempted Soviet veto, the Council showed that it would not allow the use of the so-called double veto to prevent it from taking a step which was clearly procedural under the Charter.

2. Peaceful cooperation in the realm of outer space took an important step forward in December 1959 when a new United Nations Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space was established by the General Assembly. This step resulted from extensive discussions at the United Nations among representatives of the United States, the Soviet Union, and other interested states. Thereby new possibilities have been opened for cooperation in a field which, like that of atomic energy, promises widespread benefits to mankind.

The basis for this forward step was laid when the original Ad Hoc Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space was set up by the General Assembly in December 1958. This Committee met in May and June. It prepared a valuable report which described existing international interests in this field, suggested technical areas where international cooperation could immediately contribute to progress, and identified potential legal problems.

However, the Committee had to conduct its work without the participation of the U.S.S.R., Czechoslovakia, and Poland, who refused to accept the General Assembly's decision on composition of the Committee. India and the United Arab Republic thereupon also declined to attend. Nevertheless, the Committee under the able chairmanship of Japan was able to perform much useful exploratory work, and its report provided a sound basis for further consideration of the peaceful uses of outer space during the 14th session.

In December, after long negotiations at the 14th session of the General Assembly, the Soviet Union decided to participate in a new Outer Space Committee of 24 members. The General Assembly thereupon established this new group and asked it to study outer space programs which might appropriately be undertaken under United Nations auspices and the nature of legal problems that might arise in outer space.

The General Assembly also assigned to the Outer Space Committee responsibility for working out proposals for an international scientific conference of members of the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies on the peaceful uses of outer space, to be held in 1960 or 1961. The Soviet Union's suggestion of such a conference was immediately welcomed by the United States. It can bring about an important exchange of knowledge in both the science and the technology of outer space.

3. Again in 1959 the General Assembly gave expression to the widespread desire for a sound and workable system of controlled disarmament, and showed its interest in the efforts of the powers principally involved to work out such a system.

In August 1959 the United States, France, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union agreed to set up outside of the United Nations framework a new 10-nation Committee to explore possible avenues by which progress might be made in the disarmament field. In addition to these four states its membership includes Bulgaria, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Italy, Poland, and Rumania. It first convened at Geneva in March 1960.

In announcing the formation of this group, the four countries emphasized that the establishment of this Committee "in no way diminishes or encroaches upon the United Nations responsibilities in this field." They also made clear their intention to keep the United Nations Disarmament Commission informed of the progress of the deliberations and to submit reports to it regularly.

Disarmament took up a major part of the debates of the 14th General Assembly. Altogether, the Assembly heard the views of 65 member states, including those of the United States, United Kingdom, France, and the Soviet Union. A resolution was unanimously adopted which expressed the hope that "measures leading toward the goal of general and complete disarmament under effective international control" would be agreed upon in the shortest possible time. The resolution also transmitted various disarmament proposals, including those of the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom, to the new 10-nation group for its consideration. Also submitted to this group was an Irish proposal calling for study of the problem of further dissemination of nuclear weapons.

Two resolutions were passed relating to nuclear weapons tests. The first, addressed to the three powers negotiating in Geneva for an end to such tests, urged them to continue their efforts to reach an agreement "including an appropriate international control system," and meanwhile to continue their present voluntary discontinuance of nuclear testing. The other resolution requested France not to hold its scheduled tests in the Sahara.

4. The tragedy of Communist China's actions in Tibet confronted the United Nations with a serious challenge.

In early March world opinion was shocked by the brutal actions of the Chinese Communists in their efforts to impose communism on Tibet by force. Later the Dalai Lama, the spiritual and temporal leader of the Tibetan people, was forced to flee. From his asylum in India he appealed to the United Nations to consider the plight of his countrymen.

The situation in Tibet was of direct concern to the General Assembly in fulfilling its Charter responsibility to promote universal respect for fundamental human rights and freedoms. Over the opposition of the Soviet Union the Assembly adopted a resolution sponsored by Malaya and Ireland in which it expressed its grave concern over the situation in Tibet and called for respect for the fundamental human rights of the Tibetan people and for their distinctive cultural and religious life.

5. The United Nations once again gave attention to the continuing repression of the people of Hungary.

Both the Soviet Union and the Hungarian regime have consistently refused to permit the United Nations Special Representative on Hungary, Sir Leslie Munro, to enter Hungary on behalf of the United Nations. In spite of this intransigent attitude, he compiled an impressive report on current conditions in Hungary which, among other matters, noted that Hungarian patriots of 1956 were still being put to death.

On the initiative of the United Nations Special Representative and the United States, the General Assembly again placed the question of Hungary on its agenda. The Soviet delegate strongly opposed inscription of an item on Hungary, claiming that it would be contrary to what he called the "spirit of Camp David"—a theme which the Soviet Union sought to exploit throughout the session.

Ambassador Lodge immediately and correctly replied that nothing took place during discussions at Camp David with Premier Khrushchev which would require the United Nations to ignore or condone what was happening in Hungary. He emphasized that if the Soviet Union wished to live up to the spirit of Camp David it should abide by the United Nations resolutions on Hungary and cooperate with Sir Leslie Munro in his efforts to carry out his mandate.

The United States, together with 23 other nations, introduced a resolution deploring the disregard of the Assembly's resolutions by the Soviet and Hungarian authorities and calling upon them to cooperate with the United Nations Representative. This resolution was adopted by a large majority. In addition, the Assembly once again refused to accept the credentials of the representatives of the Hungarian regime. Together, these actions demonstrated the world community's indignation over the continued Soviet-inspired repression in Hungary.

6. The problem of the future of approximately one million Arab refugees from Palestine, most of whom are now in Jordan, the Gaza Strip, and Lebanon, has been a matter of concern to the United Nations since 1949.

This problem required thorough reexamination by the General Assembly in 1959 because the mandate of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees was due to expire June 30, 1960. The United States has continued its substantial support for this major United Nations activity in the interest of the well-being of the refugees and the stability of the area. UNRWA has done an effective job in providing relief to the refugees at a low per capita cost.

The Assembly took several constructive steps in an effort to better the present situation and to find a solution to this pressing problem. It unanimously extended UNRWA's mandate for 3 years with provision for a review at the end of 2 years. It urged the acceleration of programs to make more of the refugees self-supporting. It asked that irregularities in the distribution of relief rations be stopped. Finally, it requested the Palestine Conciliation Commission to make further efforts to secure the implementation of the Assembly's decision in 1948 that the refugees wishing to return to their homes and to live at peace with their neighbors should be permitted to do so and that compensation should be paid for property left behind by those not choosing to return.

The United States stressed during the debate that a fundamental solution of the problem must be sought by all available means.

7. The Assembly made a further significant contribution to stability in the Middle East by voting continued support for the United Nations Emergency Force.

UNEF consists of about 5,000 soldiers from seven countries, patrolling the armistice demarcation lines between the Egyptian part of the United Arab Republic and Israel. It is a remarkable demonstration of what international cooperation can do to help keep the peace.

The cost of maintaining UNEF is the collective responsibility of all member nations who are assessed for its upkeep on the basis of their contributions to the regular budget of the United Nations. However, the Soviet Union has refused to pay any of its share. A number of member states have found difficulty in paying even small amounts. In an effort to reduce the burden on these countries, the United States and a few other countries have made voluntary contributions over and above their regular shares during the past few years.

At its last session the Assembly adopted a resolution under which the voluntary contributions amounting to about $3½ million will be applied to reduce by 50 percent the assessments of members beginning with those with the smallest assessments.

For our part, the United States will continue to support UNEF because we firmly believe it constitutes a major bulwark of peace in the Middle East.

8. The review and possible revision of the United Nations Charter continue to attract considerable interest.

With the full support of the United States, the General Assembly decided again at its 14th session to continue its Committee on Arrangements for a Charter Review Conference and asked the Committee to report again no later than the 16th session of the Assembly. The United States continues to favor the holding of a review conference whenever a substantial majority of the member states believe that the international climate is conducive to constructive review.

9. As at the 13th and earlier sessions, the Assembly, once again by a sizable majority, decided not to consider the question of Chinese representation. As a result, the position of the Government of the Republic of China in the United Nations was maintained.

10. The General Assembly also once again reaffirmed its desire, against Soviet opposition, to bring about the unification of Korea on the basis of genuinely free elections under United Nations supervision.

11. The United Nations contributed further in 1959 to progress for dependent peoples toward the Charter goal of self-government or independence. In recognition of the rapid progress they have made, the General Assembly acted to terminate United Nations trusteeship in three trust territories in Africa—Cameroun, Togoland, and Somalia—as well as in Western Samoa in the Pacific. The first to achieve independence was Cameroun. A distinguished United States delegation headed by Ambassador Lodge attended the Cameroun inaugural ceremonies on January 1, 1960.

In six other trust territories the United Nations trusteeship system continues to encourage progress in advancing the people toward self-government or independence.

12. It is especially gratifying for Americans that the General Assembly, in reviewing the progress of dependent territories throughout the world, commended the United States for bringing about full statehood for Hawaii and Alaska. On July 4, 1959, the new 49-star American flag was raised at the United Nations, and the 50-star flag replaced it this July.

13. Multilateral action for economic advancement of underdeveloped countries was given added impetus in 1959 as a result of a series of developments in which the United States took an active and leading role.

The financial resources of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development were doubled and the capital of the International Monetary Fund was increased by 50 percent. The United States, pursuant to congressional action, has increased its subscriptions to these two international financing institutions.

The Board of Governors of the World Bank approved the United States proposal to establish an International Development Association as an affiliate of the Bank. We hope that this institution, which is designed to assist the underdeveloped countries by financing long-term, low-interest projects which cannot be considered by the Bank under its charter, will become operational in the latter part of 1960.

The United Nations Special Fund, which resulted from the initiative of the United States, began its operations on January 1, 1959, with pledges totaling about $25.8 million of which the United States contribution amounted to about $10.3 million. Pledges for 1960, including the United States share, will total an estimated $38.8 million—half again as much as in the first year.

The Special Fund added significantly to the effective work of the United Nations Technical Assistance Program which conducted its activities in 1959 with financial resources amounting to about $29.7 million. The United States contributed about $11.9 million of this amount.

The United Nations is a growing organization—growing both in membership and in maturity. Each year it has been confronted with new issues and, in meeting them, has demonstrated anew what great value it has for man in his quest for peace with justice. Given our sustained and vigorous support, it will continue to advance the interests of the American people and of free nations everywhere.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting the nomination of Fraser Wilkins, of Nebraska, a Foreign Service officer of class 1, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the Republic of Cyprus, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

NONGERMANE DEBATE AND DESIRABILITY OF AMENDING THE SENATE RULES

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, since we shall mark time as regards our further consideration of the pending bill until 2 p.m., under the unanimous-consent agreement, I should like to address myself to a nongermane subject which has to do with amendment of the Senate Rules, which recently I have been advocating.

As I stated last week, on the floor, before the end of this week I intend to submit, for the consideration of the Committee on Rules and Administration, a series of proposed changes in the Senate rules, intended to expedite Senate action on pending measures.

Today, I should like to state for the record some facts which convince me that the resumed session of the Senate which began a week ago Monday indicates quite clearly the desirability of making a rather drastic change in the rules.

First, I should like to discuss the action of the Senate in connection with the Antarctic Treaty. The basic facts in connection with the treaty are that it was made the pending business when the Senate began its session at noon on Monday, August 8; and it was ratified toward the middle of the legislative day of Wednesday, August 10. However, ratification of the treaty was accomplished by the utilization of a unanimous-consent agreement. Goodness knows how long it would have taken us to ratify the treaty if unanimous consent had not been obtained. I am glad it was obtained; but I point out that one Senator who might have desired to hold up Senate action on the treaty indefinitely could have done so for an interminable length of time.

I suggest that next January there are likely to be many important measures which cannot be dealt with by unanimous consent; and if they cannot be dealt with by unanimous consent, many of them may never be dealt with at all.

To return to the treaty, let me say it became the pending business, as I have stated, when the Senate met at noon, on Monday, August 8. That day the Senate was in session for 7 hours and 52 minutes. But only 29 percent of the total debate that day, exclusive of the morning hour was devoted to the treaty. The total amount of time, exclusive of the morning hour, was roughly 4 hours 45 minutes. Exclusive of the morning hour only 1 hour and 23 minutes were devoted to consideration of the treaty.

Senators may ask how I have obtained these facts. They are the result of studies made during the course of the present session, both before and after the recess, by members of my staff who sat in the gallery and have read the RECORD and have timed the proceedings sufficiently to enable them to determine that it takes about 3 minutes, on the average, to deliver remarks which occupy one column of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. One column of the RECORD is 9 inches long, as the RECORD is printed. In making this time determination, we, of course, exclude matter which appears in the RECORD but was not actually spoken.

So, Mr. President, out of a total of almost 8 hours on Monday, August 8, that the Senate was in session, only 1 hour and 23 minutes were devoted to consideration of the treaty.

On Tuesday, August 9, the Senate met at noon and adjourned at 8:54 p.m. On that day, exclusive of the morning hour, the Senate spent 3½ hours on the treaty, 2 hours on nongermane business. Out of almost 9 hours in session only 3½ were spent on the treaty.

A unanimous-consent agreement was entered into just before the end of the session on that day. As a result of that agreement, on Wednesday, when the Senate met at 9:30 in the morning, and adjourned at 9:28 that evening—in short, there was a 12-hour legislative day then—the Senate devoted less than 3½ hours to consideration of the treaty, all of it immediately after the morning hour.

I conclude that the total amount of time, in hours, devoted to consideration of the treaty during that 3-day period was 8 hours and 15 minutes, which actually was only 44 percent of the time, exclusive of the morning hour, when the Senate was in session.

Mr. President, I conclude that a rule of germaneness would have very much expedited our ratification of the treaty. I also conclude that we cannot much longer afford, in the modern world, to put ourselves in a position in which we can legislate only by unanimous consent.

I turn now to the proceedings since we ratified the treaty. Senators will recall that after we ratified the treaty, we moved promptly and successfully to consideration of the public works appropriation bill, which, after no more than reasonable debate, was passed, also on Wednesday. With respect to that appropriation bill, I have no adverse comments to make, insofar as a need for a change in the rules is concerned.

However, after the vote on Wednesday afternoon on the public works appropriation bill, the business now pending, the amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act, as amended, was called up; and we have been on that business ever since. It was taken up by us on Wednesday of last week. It is now Tuesday of this week; but we have not been able to get even a single amendment to a vote.

Last Wednesday we spent a little more than 1 hour on the amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

On Thursday, the Senate convened at 10 a.m. and took a recess at approximately 7 p.m. On that day the Senate spent approximately 5 hours on the Fair Labor Standards Act amendments. The debate that day was generally germane, because we spent only a relatively small amount of time—about 15 percent of the time, exclusive of the morning hour—on nongermane matters. The Senate took a recess early that day, because we had been advised that we would not be able to vote on that day, and there was not much point in remaining in session any longer, since no other Senator desired to speak, and since, under the rules, Senators who controlled the floor and the debate on the amendments had indicated that they would not permit a vote to be taken then.

On Friday we came in at noon and recessed at 5 minutes before 10, there was no morning hour. The debate was largely germane, but again, after a 10-hour session, we were unable to bring even one amendment to a vote.

On Saturday we came in at 9:30 in the morning and recessed at a quarter to 7, and again despite a lot of politiking most of the time was spent on a germane discussion of the bill. Again, however, we were unable to bring even a single amendment to a vote.

I do not have as yet my analysis for yesterday, but I will undertake to put it in the RECORD either late today or tomorrow.

The point I make is that the Senate, since Wednesday afternoon, has been immobilized by the action of a very small group of Senators, acting completely within their rights and completely in accordance with the present rules, who were unwilling to have the Senate proceed to serious consideration of the bill. I suggest that this condition cannot be permitted to continue next January if, as most of us on this side of the aisle hope, the Democratic candidates are successful, and it is our obligation to put through the Democratic platform, which I, and I know most of my colleagues on this side of the aisle, take very seriously indeed, and do not view with that cynicism with which the press has regarded it.

I make these preliminary comments only to lay the groundwork for comments I shall make later with respect to specific changes in the rules which I think are desirable.

Mr. SCOTT rose.

Mr. CLARK. I am about to yield the floor. Does the Senator want me to yield to him?

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator yields the floor, I ask for recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I agree with my senior colleague that it is important to bring the pending bill to a vote, no matter how individual Senators may feel about it. Certainly, some form of minimum wage bill, in my opinion, ought to be enacted, and ought to be enacted as quickly as possible; and I certainly would not want to be in any way responsible for the delay in prompt action on this or many other bills.

After all, we have a considerable backlog here. We have the President's recommendations, on which the batting average at the moment is zero zero zero.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, I yield to my senior colleague.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not true that the majority leader has made several attempts to persuade the Senate to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement with respect to the pending business, and that in each instance the minority leader has said that he has instructions from a member of the Senator's party to oppose the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, I am not aware whether that is a fact as to each instance. I recall on one instance the minority leader made some statement to that effect, but I am equally aware of the fact that a number of objections have come from the Senator's own side of the aisle at various times, having to do with procedural matters, which is surely in the province of each Senator to do.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will yield briefly again, I think the RECORD will show—and I shall not labor the point—that the official objection to a unanimous-consent agreement with respect to the Fair Labor Standards Act, however, in each instance was made by the minority leader, who stated that it was at the request of the members of the Senator's party.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. In order to clear this up, there has been one attempt by the majority leader to have a unanimous-consent agreement, and I was right back of the minority leader and would have objected. I told him earlier that if I were in the Chamber I would object. I am the culprit, but I see nothing wrong with it, because that is a part of our legislative right, I would say, and I look upon it as a duty to prolong the debate so we can discuss this question.

I might say to my friend from Pennsylvania that we spent the entire day yesterday talking about medical care for the aged, and there were only two speeches made on the subject of minimum wage, and the one I made late in the evening was made so we could have a full session lasting until 9 o'clock. I could just as well have made it today. The delay has not been occasioned by either party on either side of the aisle. This subject has bipartisan interest. There are Senators on the Democratic side opposed to the minimum wage bill just as we have Senators on the Republican side who are opposed. I think it is very worthwhile that we have engaged in this debate, because it is becoming very clear that the Kennedy bill is filled with very dangerous gimmicks. While I agree that some form of minimum wage bill will pass the Senate, I am very hopeful it will not be the bill in its present form.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield to my senior colleague with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. CLARK. I have no quarrel with the action taken by the Senator from Arizona. I think he was entirely within his right under the present rules. I do disagree with him that the debate has been particularly enlightening. I do not think very many people have listened to it. I seriously question whether many Senators have even bothered to read it, although I have read a good bit of it myself. The point I am making is that there is need for a rule of germaneness, and the fact that we spent a good part of yesterday discussing medical care indicates that need.

We had been advised by our friend from Florida that we were not going to be permitted to vote on the minimum wage subject yesterday, anyhow, and we might as well have talked about medical care for the aged as anything else while we were waiting for my good friend from Florida, and he knows he is my good friend, to permit the Senate to move forward.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SCOTT. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. May I say, in the first place, any Senator could have asked for a unanimous consent agreement for a vote on my principal amendment, an amendment of which I happened to be the first sponsor, but in which I am joined in presenting by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. I offered last week to have a unanimous consent agreement to vote on that amendment today—

Mr. CLARK. Is that offer still good?

Mr. HOLLAND. That is the so-called principal amendment, which covers the continuation of the exemption now in the present law of the so-called retail outlets within State lines and service establishments. No Senator seemed to take any advantage of the offer or to accept my suggestion to that effect.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit me to ask the Senator from Florida a question?

Mr. SCOTT. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is the Senator's offer still good, and may I so advise the majority leader?

Mr. HOLLAND. No; the offer of the Senator from Florida is now subject to a changed situation. When the Senator from Massachusetts on Saturday morning tried to move right into an immediate third reading of the bill, without giving any chance for adequate discussion of the retail and service amendment, I offered another amendment, which I know is greatly desired by the producers of perishable agricultural commodities throughout the Nation, vegetables and fruit in particular, and it is that amendment which is now replacing, on Tuesday, on today's agenda, the principal amendment which I had offered to have come up at this date. I simply wish to have the RECORD show that I offered, so far as I was concerned—and I could not speak for the entire Senate—to try to set a time for consideration of the retail and service amendment, with a vote today. That offer did not seem to appeal either to the majority leader or to other Senators generally, because no Senator offered a unanimous-consent request in that regard.

The fact that we have another amendment pending and another unanimous-consent request for a vote today results from the impatience of the Senator from Massachusetts, who endeavored to force the bill to a third reading on Saturday morning in spite of the fact that the Senate knew my own principal talk in support of the exemption amendment had not been made. The Senate knew that the minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], had given notice he desired to make a speech upon that amendment and wished to be allotted in any consent agreement sufficient time to make his speech. The Senate knew there were other Senators, including the able Senator from Louisiana, who has since made his speech, and the able Senator from North Carolina, who has since made his speech, who wanted to be heard on the exemption amendment.

However, without consideration of the fact that we had had very little debate up to that time, and that many deeply concerned Members of the Senate had not been allowed to be heard at all, there was an impatient effort to force the bill to a third reading.

I do not know whether the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania was on the floor at that time, but the RECORD will bear out what I am stating.

Since I had the other shorter amendment, which I felt could be debated more speedily, I offered that amendment. I had hoped we could finish consideration of that amendment yesterday, and I believe we might have if it had not been for the fact that the medicare bill seemed to claim the attention of the Senate yesterday. I simply wish to have the RECORD reflect the fact that after starting late last Wednesday, we shall have spent in debate, when the first vote comes at 4 o'clock this afternoon, less than 5 days upon this matter, which is certainly a serious matter of great concern to a great many people. Of that time one full day, practically all of yesterday, was devoted to a debate by those concerned with another important question which is among the items preferred for treatment by this extended session; that is, the medicare bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I will yield to the Senator in a moment, if I am permitted to do so by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania.

I do not think anyone should become unduly impatient about the situation. We are not, in this session, confined even in the informal way we are trying to confine ourselves to any one subject matter. I can easily understand how the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], my distinguished junior colleague [Mr. SMATHERS], the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], and the able Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] would feel about the medicare question. Perhaps other Senators were engaged in the debate, but those were the four who were speaking when I happened to be in the Chamber. I can understand how they would feel that the medicare question is important enough to take up the time of the Senate. I find no fault with them whatsoever in that regard, because we have to pass legislation on that subject matter, and presumably it will be the next subject to be considered. Any debate which is put into the RECORD at this time may, and should, cut down the time required for consideration when that bill is before the Senate.

I hope my friend will not be impatient, and I hope he will rely for most of his statement on what he has admitted—he will always admit the facts—that in the days when we were permitted to do so the advocates and the opponents of the minimum wage bill have pretty well taken the time and occupied the attention of the Senate with debate which the Senator has called germane to the consideration of the bill.

I have one more point and I shall be through. We cannot make our colleagues read our statements. We cannot force our colleagues to come to the floor and hear our statements. If the Senate has a rule which would require either one of those things, if it is practical in its operation, I would certainly like to hear about it. That is the principal thing we require in the Senate, a willingness to subject ourselves—and I am not talking in any "holier than thou" attitude at all—to the arguments of others who may feel differently from the way we feel ourselves.

We have a bad habit in the Senate. We are practicing it in this debate, as I gladly admit to my friend from Pennsylvania. We have a habit of staying away when something is being said that we do not wish to hear or with which we do not agree.

If the Senator has a rule which would change that practice, I, for one, would be intensely interested in hearing it.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. In the meantime, I do not think anybody can say that undue time has been occupied or that there has been a loss of time from considering important matters which will come before the Senate or which have already come before the extended session of the Senate. The only exceptions to that statement which the Senator from Florida has heard have been the numerous indulgings in political matters. I think all of us realize at this particular time we must expect a good amount of that. I am not surprised to find that is the case. I would be surprised if we did not have a great deal of political discussion. We have the two presidential candidates on the floor every day. One of the vice presidential candidates is acting as majority leader, and the other vice presidential candidate is a former Member of the Senate and a member of the club. Both of the leaders of the two great parties are here every day on the floor—the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON], the leader of his great party, and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON], the leader of his great party. Numerous other Senators are participating in one way or another in this pleasant quadrennial game we like to indulge in in this country, the matter of a presidential election. I would be surprised if there were not some discussion of political matters. I would think it was a group of doctors, grocers or farmers, those people so vitally affected by our legislation, rather than Senators, if there were not a great deal of political discussion.

So in yielding to my friend, if I am permitted to do so, I wish to say, basing my opinion upon several years of observation of the way the Senate acts, I think the Senate has pretty well stuck to its job. So far as the Senator from Florida is concerned, I am glad to have one of the amendments made the subject of very limited debate for this day, for disposal by a vote at 4 o'clock, since that will be less than 5 days from the time we began discussion of the bill.

I now yield to the Senator, if the Senator from Pennsylvania will permit me to do so.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, before I yield to my senior colleague, may I make another point, because I suspect that will give my senior colleague something further to say.

I note that truth, temporarily crushed to earth, has erected itself again to its full stature.

I wish to pursue the point I was making about the nonexistent batting average on performance in a minute. As a matter of fact, the promises made at Los Angeles were 258 specific promises, not one of which has been kept or even, with one exception, seriously attempted to be kept.

My purpose in arising at this time is to point out that had the majority party seriously desired to get action on a minimum wage bill it could have gotten action in the regular session. There were many who felt that way. There were many who felt that we should not adjourn but that we should recess only for the time of the conventions.

Among those who felt we might get action on this measure advocated by the junior Senator from Massachusetts was my senior colleague. He and I were agreed that action should be had. In fact my senior colleague from Pennsylvania, on the 11th of May 1960, said with reference to minimum wage legislation—I think it is also with reference to the junior Senator from Massachusetts:

> I think the Senate will pass a minimum wage increase if we can just get "Sonny Boy" back from the cricks and hollers long enough to report it out of his committee.

Since these promises were made, and since whoever is the "Sonny Boy" who has been referred to—of course, I do not offer any effort to translate, for I am sure the senior Senator from Pennsylvania will furnish us with further identification—I say, as Robert Browning said in "The Pied Piper of Hamelin," "If we've promised them aught, let us keep our promise." Robert Browning did not attend the convention at Los Angeles, but if he had, I am sure he would have felt there ought at least to be a serious attempt to keep 1 or 2 of the 258 promises made there.

I now yield to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania for reply.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator will indulge me, I would prefer not to do so at this time. May I repeat the words of the majority leader that "once a national chairman, always a national chairman." I should like now to ask my friend from Florida——

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I yielded to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania with the understanding that he would make further comment about "Sonny Boy" and his failure to push the measure in May because he was in the "cricks and hollers." I do not see why we did not get this bill acted upon then, as the senior Senator from Pennsylvania thought we should.

Mr. CLARK. Will the junior Senator from Pennsylvania permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND]?

Mr. SCOTT. I shall permit the senior Senator from Pennsylvania to take any form of extrication he chooses, including yielding to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CLARK. I have made my comment on what the junior Senator from Pennsylvania has said.

I should like to ask my friend from Florida if he is prepared at this time to advise his colleagues when he will permit his principal amendment to come to a vote?

Mr. HOLLAND. I think that question would arrogate to the Senator from Florida a great deal more influence in this matter than he possesses. He does not have the power of deciding the question.

The Senator from Florida would be happy to have the principal amendment come to a vote tomorrow or the next day, or as soon as the principal arguments in support of the amendment by Senators who have very deep convictions about it have been made. The Senator from Florida has already shown, by making two suggestions for unanimous-consent agreements, one of which has finally been agreed to, that he is not disposed to hold this subject under extreme debate. He announced in the very beginning that he did not want to be considered as in any way making himself a party to an unlimited discussion, which has sometimes been referred to by my distinguished friend as a filibuster. To the contrary, he wanted this matter to be disposed of.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator from Florida agree to a unanimous-consent request agreement with repect to his principal amendment at this time?

Mr. HOLLAND. No; the Senator from Florida would rather have his amendment disposed of at 4 o'clock. He hopes it will prevail. If it does not prevail, he may wish to do some work on his fences, which may thereby appear not to be as strong as he had hoped they might be. He also wishes to confer with Senators on both sides of the aisle, which shows conclusively that this is not a partisan question.

My friend the junior Senator from Pennsylvania speaks of platforms in a way that surprises me somewhat, because as a former chairman of the national committee of his great party—and I ask his pardon for forgetting that fact when I enumerated some of the reasons why I was not surprised by the intrusion of some political discussion from time to time——

Mr. SCOTT. It looks as though I will never live that down.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator has not evidenced in the Senate any disposition so far as I have observed to get away from his political background.

Mr. SCOTT. I am proud of my political party.

Mr. HOLLAND. I was sure he was. The point I am getting at is that I thought political platforms of great political parties were very serious matters to be submitted to the electorate and to be debated in the hustings from one corner of this country to the other. The country is becoming more and more remote. Now we shall debate issues from Alaska to Florida and from Maine to Hawaii. Then, after all the debate has transpired and all the discussion that will appeal to anybody's mind has taken place, there is a referendum in which the votes of over 60 million citizens are cast, and after that referendum has been held, then, as the Senator from Florida understands, we have an expression on platforms. But up to that time all the expressions that we have had on platforms that I know anything about have been political discussions of the type that have been taking place in the Senate from day to day. I regard them as such.

I do not hold the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] too seriously accountable for the commitments he has made here, because I know that in a sense he has his fingers crossed. I know that in the platform of my own party there are many features of which I do not approve. It is inconceivable to me, with our country as vast as it is now, that there can be anything but general declarations of principle covering all vital phases of political life, domestic and international, with which everybody in the Nation would agree 100 percent in connection with either of the platforms. So I think we must all realize that this political discussion is natural. It is to be expected. It does not mean very much. It is only a matter of blowing off steam, which the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania and others will be blowing off on the hustings after we leave here.

Personally I hope that we will leave as quickly as possible, because this Chamber gets pretty full of the political steam that is blown off. There is likely to be an explosion. There is likely to be something that would reflect anything but credit upon the Senate.

So far as the Senator from Florida is concerned, this is the first word that might even conceivably be attributed to politics that he has uttered in the 8 days of this session, and I hope he will never have to utter another one. But he does not feel that his distinguished friend, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania, shows the erudition in the political field which would be expected of one who has had so much experience, one who has been chairman of a great political party, and who has done a very fine job in that high responsibility. He does not think the Senator should be as surprised as he appears to be that there is some political boiling over taking place from time to time on the floor of the Senate.

I thank the Senator for allowing me to make these few remarks.

Mr. SCOTT. I congratulate the Senator from Florida on his wholly virginal approach toward public office, because I think it is indeed remarkable that he has been elected so often. I know that he has the respect and admiration of the people of his State. But I do not quite understand how one so completely free of politics, so virginal, so unvested with political interest, ever managed to reach this body.

Mr. HOLLAND. If the Senator will yield for a brief comment, the Senator from Florida tried to confine his comments with reference to his attitude to the 8 days of this session. The Senator from Florida has spoken on the hustings in his own State, and in other States, and expects to do so again in due time. But he does not think the Senate is the appropriate place for that kind of discussion. He does not recall that he has ever participated, on any earlier occasion, in a debate so nearly political as this.

Mr. SCOTT. I congratulate the Senator on his 8 days of political chastity. I now yield to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. HOLLAND. If the Senator will allow me to do so, I think it would be a good thing for the country if there were more chastity in this same field.

Mr. SCOTT. I certainly agree with the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Florida knows that there is no Member of the Senate for whom I have greater affection and respect than I have for him. However, when he says that it is usual, after political conventions, and after the writing of party platforms, to discuss those platforms on the hustings and then let the people act on them before Congress in special session treats with them, he is in error. If my memory serves me correctly, in 1948, when the President of the United States, Mr. Truman, called Congress back into extraordinary session, he said of our platform pledges, "If their promises as expressed in their party platform are worth 5 cents, they should enact them all in 2 weeks."

At that time, as you can well suppose, there was a great deal of discussion of what was in our platform. In Mr. Truman's view it would be highly proper that we discuss these matters now. Democratic promises should be redeemed. According to Mr. Truman, the time and place to redeem them is right here and now, if they are worth anything.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Maryland is correct. Not only did President Truman address the Congress of that time, and say, "You can accomplish these promises in 2 weeks," but he somehow was able to convince the country of the same thing.

The difference today would seem to be merely a difference of the calendar. We are asked to believe that promises made in July at Los Angeles are not intended in any segment or portion thereof, not even by a jot or tittle, to be performed until January, once the elections are safely past.

We are now dealing with the calendar. It is my impression—and I feel that my party's position is very clear on it—that any promises made in July the public expects us at least to try to keep, in as great a degree as feasible, consistent with the length of the session, in August.

Therefore, we are now being told, and the country is being told, that the Democratic Party did not intend to keep any of its promises in August, but will go to the country on a record of campaign promises ignored, and will then ask for the trust of the people of this country that "if you will believe us, what we did not even try to do in August, we will undertake to do in toto in January."

This is an assumption of gullibility on the part of the American public which I reject.

We heard from the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG] this morning, who is apparently the unofficial timekeeper of the Senate, and who operates with a stopwatch for that purpose, and who seems, I gather from the context of his approach, to feel that presiding in the Chair of the President of the Senate is something like flagpole sitting. In other words, records ought to be made merely by the application of the body of a distinguished individual to leather, and that there is some special virtue in being a sitdown Vice President.

Perhaps the Senator from Ohio believes that because we have had a great many sitdown Vice Presidents, one of whom was chiefly famous for the remark "What this country needs is a good 5-cent cigar," we should not have any who do not care to make a reputation merely by plumping their posterior upon the pedestal of the Senate. Apparently the Senator from Ohio believes that the most important thing that a Vice President, who is the President of the Senate, can do is to sit here and do nothing. The duties of the Vice President as prescribed in the Constitution are simply these: The Vice President shall be the President of the Senate, and shall have no vote save in case of a tie. I believe the Parliamentarian will agree with me that that is a reasonably accurate quotation. First of all, the Vice President has no vote. Secondly, it does not even contemplate that the Vice President could take part in debate; nor is the Vice President required by the Constitution to do anything whatever except to be available in the event he wishes to break a tie, in which case he need only be available if he wishes to vote in the affirmative, because in a tie vote where the Vice President would normally vote in the negative, if he were a Senator, would already have been defeated, because it is a tie.

The Vice President has announced that the next Vice President, in his judgment, should have an even greater role in government; that he should not be expected to spend all his time sitting down. We are very fortunate in having as our vice presidential candidate Ambassador Lodge, who puts his country before his party in his service at the United Nations. We are equally fortunate in having a Vice President who does not operate by stop watch and does not attempt to establish sitdown records, or is interested in flag pole sitting achievements, but who is concerned about carrying out the responsibilities vested in him by the Constitution and by the Executive, who frequently presides over the National Security Council and attends Cabinet meetings, who heads Government commissions, and who makes official visits in the name of the United States and in the name of the President of the United States, and with signal success.

Such a post, it seems to me, is a good deal more dignified than merely the requirement that he sit and sit and sit, until the Senator from Ohio is so tired of seeing him sitting that he will put his stopwatch away.

Actually, as we all know, once the Vice President has left the chair and has designated another Senator to act for him temporarily, the post passes to the majority party by designation of the President pro tempore the Senator from Arizona. Therefore if the Vice President were to preside over the Senate indefinitely, hour after hour, how great would be the howls, how painful would be the screams of injustice, of tyranny, of obstruction, and interference with the orderly processes of this great deliberative body; how many on the other side of the aisle would say, indeed, "This ain't right," because, being the majority party, they expect to put Senators in the Presiding Officer's seat as the acting President pro tempore.

We all know that is a job that many of us have accepted because it is a duty, that it goes very often to the most junior Members of the Senate, and is one which we enjoy. We can have our photograph taken in front of the flag, when the Senate is not in session, and send the photograph home, in the hope that people will believe that the picture was taken while the Senate was in session. In that way we can try to make a big thing out of presiding over the Senate. However, we are not fooling anyone. The people of the country want a working Vice President, and they want an effective one.

My final thought is that I would like to know whether the junior Senator from Ohio or anyone else in the Senate feels that the next Vice President, whether he be the Ambassador to the United Nations or the majority leader, should spend all his time as a sitdown Vice President. In fact, I would like to know whether the majority leader's leader believes that, if he becomes President, the majority leader should spend all his time in the chair. Anyone who knows the majority leader knows that that would be an intolerable condition with which to confront him. No one would wish him that kind of misfortune.

I revert to the fact that the majority leader himself, on the 8th of July 1960, at Los Angeles, said:

> The Vice-Presidency is a good place for a young man who needs experience. It is a good place for a young man who needs training.

I do not think the majority leader meant it was a good place to sit and doze and wonder when the Senate will adjourn, so he can get out of the Chamber and continue to do nothing somewhere else.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I wish to express my sympathy to the newly elected Senator from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK], who has been the principal occupant of the chair during the week since the Senate returned from the conventions. I would not have expected the Vice President to occupy the chair during all the hours of debate in this entire session of Congress; however, I wish we might get an agreement from the Republicans that they would either have the Vice President occupy the chair or else appoint a Republican Senator to occupy the chair while the Republicans are making speeches on the floor of the Senate.

It seems to me that that is a reasonable request. Certainly it is not fair to expect that during this short session the junior Senator from North Dakota should have had to listen to so many irrelevant, boring speeches.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, some Members of the Senate, in the closing days of our assembly about a month ago, felt that we should not again meet after the two political conventions. It was the expressed view that the meeting which we are now having ought not to be held. That view was held on the basis that inevitably politics would dominate the discussions on the floor.

Other Senators thought that politics would not be the prime consideration motivating us in our action.

To me, it was inevitable that if we returned after the conventions and before the November election, there would be no objective consideration of proposed legislation, but that the principal purpose of the session would be to lay the groundwork, fair or foul, for success in November.

Some Members of this body, at this time, either inadvertently or purposely, profess great astonishment that we are indulging in politics. If one is of the belief that politics was not to be expected, I suggest that there is lacking an intelligence which ought to reside with the high office occupied by the Members of the Senate.

In my opinion, when it was decided to have the Senate reconvene in August, it was then intended to make this meeting one, primarily, of political consideration.

It is to be expected that Senators on this side of the aisle will be charging against Senators on the other side of the aisle that politics is being played. The converse of that statement is true, namely, that Senators on the right side will be charging those on the left side with similar conduct.

In my opinion, we could have taken care of this business before the political conventions; but we decided to come back. Whether it was so stated or not, the purpose was to make the Senate a political forum. We are witnessing exactly what should have been anticipated when we decided, at the end of June, that we would return at this time. We have now been here for 1 week. We are considering some proposed legislation which has been declared to be of primary importance. Other pieces of proposed legislation are, I believe, equally important. I believe they should be considered, but they have been rather inadequately mentioned.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA] yesterday discussed a bill of that nature. I should like to repeat what I have already said on that subject. Since 1958, the Department of State has been asking for legislation to authorize the Secretary of State to exercise some control over the issuance of passports to Communists who go to Russia to make reports of what they know exists in our country respecting our military posture. Two years have passed, and we have taken no action. The prospects now are that no action will be taken in this session. The subject is considered unimportant and negligible, as it concerns the security of our country.

Francis Powers will be tried in the Soviet Union tomorrow on a charge of espionage. The world will be told that foul America indulges in the unsavory practice of spying. Yet the Senate will do nothing toward providing the State Department with the power to control the issuance of passports to avowed and known Communists who travel back and forth between the Soviet Union and the United States. That is an important piece of proposed legislation. However, it will not be considered. It will not be considered because the political profit to be made from it is not adequate.

If we are having politics at this session, that is exactly what we should have expected. I repeat my statement. Any Senator who professes innocence in this matter, who says that he did not expect politics to be the primary consideration at this session, does not possess the intelligence which ought to reside in a person who occupies what is supposed to be the high Office of Senator of the United States. It would have served our country better if we had finished our work before the holding of the political conventions; thus sparing the country the political push and pull that we are suffering.

COMPLIMENT TO SENATOR BURDICK

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I desire to compliment and commend the present occupant of the chair, the distinguished junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK]. He has been in the chair, I believe, during his brief tenure in the Senate, for a greater length of time, than any of his colleagues. He has had to suffer, I think, undue and unusual punishment because of the many political speeches, from both sides of the aisle, to which he has had to listen.

It is my understanding that the Senator from North Dakota, a distinguished Senator in his own right, is also at the present time still, technically speaking, a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of North Dakota, because the House, at least until yesterday, did not have the opportunity, because of a motion made to adjourn the House, a quorum not being present, to read his resignation from that body.

Nevertheless, in view of the services performed by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota in presiding over the Senate, I believe he is entitled to the thanks of all of us. He has performed his work ably and with distinction. He has made some difficult decisions, and he has honored us with the dignity and decorum with which he has presided.

PROPOSAL FOR CHANGE IN METHOD OF ELECTING THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], the majority whip, upon the speech he made yesterday with respect to conventions and campaigns. It was a speech which, in my opinion, needed to be made. I am delighted that the Senator from Montana, as a representative of our leadership, made it. Many of us have felt for a long time that the present method of selecting a President and a Vice President is inadequate in many ways.

A number of us in the Senate have tried to meet this problem. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] introduced a proposed constitutional amendment which called for the holding of a national primary. So did the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS].

I have introduced a proposed constitutional amendment which calls for a national primary, too. I have talked to a number of other Senators, on both sides of the aisle, who believe we should explore, at least, the ways to amend, change, and improve our method of selecting our President.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am in complete agreement with the Senator from Wisconsin about the need to make a change in the electoral college system.

I do not profess to know what change should be made or in what form the new arrangement should be. But I think both of the national conventions showed, above all else, that both parties have to write their platforms to satisfy the politicians of one State or the politicians of one city in the Nation. I do not say that in a derogatory way about that State or that city. It just so happens that in the years since the Constitution was written—and the last time article II, which pertains to the electoral college, was amended was 1804—New York City and New York State have grown to have the greatest concentration of population in the Nation. So I think it is a natural result that at the conventions the politicians of both parties from the State of New York and from the city of New York are going to make their desires felt, because it is important to the candidates for election to the Presidency that they have the New York votes. I suggest that a similar development may occur with respect to California, which is fast becoming the largest State in the Union. So we are going to have to satisfy the one big State in the East and the one big State in the West.

Although most of the time these considerations work to the betterment of the country, I do not think the platforms should ever reflect the thinking of only one section. Instead, they should reflect the thinking of the entire Nation.

So I am glad that, once again, so much interest is being manifested in this matter.

I recall that once before, I attempted to do something about it, by means of the Mundt-Goldwater bill; and I sent to the Senator from Florida a telegram in which I said I was in complete agreement with him and welcomed the effort to have something done about the present outdated system of selecting our President.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Arizona.

I understand that when the present Republican nominee for the Vice Presidency, Ambassador Lodge, was a Member of the Senate—at that time I was not a Member of this body—he was the leader in the Senate, along with Representative Gossett, of the House of Representatives, in connection with the Lodge-Gossett proposal which would have obviated the difficulty to which the Senator from Arizona has referred.

As the Senator from Arizona has pointed out, the fact that a tiny majority in New York State or in California can swing the result of a presidential election means that there is a tendency to concentrate to a very great extent on any available swing minority of the people of New York or the people of California, and perhaps relatively ignoring the broad public interest of the people in the rest of the country.

On the other hand, if the situation were such that the candidate who received the largest popular vote would be elected President—for instance, a candidate who received 51 percent of the vote, whereas his opponent had received 49 percent—I agree wholeheartedly that to have the election determined in that way would be a great improvement.

That was not the principal burden of my proposal, although I think the Senator from Arizona is correct when he says it should be considered.

I am particularly interested in the many overall defects of the present national convention system in which some States have unrepresentative primaries. Many States have no primaries. In cases in which there is no primary the people of that State are prevented from expressing their views in regard to the one whom they wish to be elected President of the United States.

I agree with the Senator that unless we take this action now, this matter will very likely be forgotten, because general interest in such matters tends to die rather quickly.

Therefore, I think the speech made by the Senator from Montana is a very important one, and I sincerely believe that the matter should be given consideration by us next January.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. As one who voted for the Lodge-Gossett proposal when it passed the Senate some years ago, let me say that I believe the answer is to have direct election of the President, and to eliminate electors and the electoral college.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I would be enthusiastically in favor of doing that.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Some can find various reasons for arguing to the contrary, based upon historic usage. But the Senator from Wisconsin knows as well as I do that no matter what formula is used, unless there is direct election of the President, in any close race, so long as there is an electoral college between the people and the one they elect, it is possible for a candidate who lost the election by a million votes still to win over a candidate who received substantially more votes than he did.

The answer to the undue advantage which some minorities in some parts of the country have is to let everyone vote, and to let every vote count as one vote, and to let the candidate who receives the largest number of votes in the presidential election be elected President of the United States.

After all, that is the way the elections in all the States are handled.

The present system permits of uncommitted electors. Recently the State of Louisiana failed by only one vote to have uncommitted electors in connection with the balloting for the Democratic Party's candidate.

What would that mean? It would mean that after the people had elected the electors, the electors could vote for anyone for whom they chose to vote—for Mr. NIXON, for Mr. KENNEDY, or for anyone else, so long as he could meet the constitutional requirement in regard to being a native-born American.

Furthermore, as the Senator from Wisconsin knows, in the event that no candidate received a majority of the votes in the electoral college, the election would be thrown into the House of Representatives. In that case, each State would vote as a unit, and each State would have only one vote. That situation constitutes just the opposite extreme. In the first instance, New York is given too much weight; but if the election were thrown into the House of Representatives, New York would be treated completely unfairly, because at that time a State such as Nevada would have as much effect on the outcome of the election in the House of Representatives as would the State of New York. Nevada, with only 1 Member of the House of Representatives, would then have as much effect as would New York, which has more than 40 Members of the House of Representatives.

So the only logical answer which would seem to overcome the objections of all pressure groups, in my judgment, would be a direct popular election. I certainly hope that one of these days we shall come to it.

Perhaps the Senator's recommendation would lead us in that direction; it sounds as though it would. For that reason, I commend the Senator for the proposal he is making.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Louisiana.

I think the concept of a democratic republic, which the Founding Fathers had in mind, was reflected to some extent in the electoral college idea—in other words, that the electors would vote for the man who was best suited to be President on the basis of his knowledge and his demonstrated ability. But at least, insofar as the electoral college is concerned, it has been out of date for at least 150 years of the 171 years since the adoption of our Constitution in 1789.

In my State of Wisconsin—which I think typical—I believe the overwhelming majority of the people would like to see the present method of nominating our President improved, and promptly.

MAN SEEKS JAIL TERM TO GET NEEDED MEDICAL CARE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a few days ago the Milwaukee Journal published a front page story which provides a revealing insight into the desperation born of fear which is the plight of elderly citizens in need of medical care. The article describes an elderly man in Los Angeles who held up a bank in order to get himself arrested. He had warned police of his intention, explaining "I wanted to be caught." His reason was that he felt that only in the penitentiary would he be assured of adequate medical care. He has lost one eye from cancer, and has cirrhosis of the liver.

This is one more example, perhaps more dramatic than some, of the lengths to which old people are driven in search of badly needed medical care. In order to meet this repeatedly demonstrated need, it is imperative that Congress act now to provide an adequate program of old-age medical insurance.

I ask unanimous consent that the article published in the August 10 Milwaukee Journal be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAN SEEKS MEDICAL CARE, SO HE BECOMES A ROBBER

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.—The gaunt little man shoved a gun and a note at Teller Marjorie Sances.

The note said: "No alarm. Give me your cash."

Mrs. Sances pushed over a stack of bills.

"No, not that much," he said. "Just $5."

She retrieved the stack and handed him the top bill. It was a 10.

The gunman wrote on a slip of paper: "Received $10. Dr. Scott."

Then he walked out the door of the savings and loan company into the arms of two policemen.

Gordon Elmer Scott, once a $30,000-a-year chiropractor in Beverly Hills, says he tipped off police because "I wanted to be caught."

He said he believed that the medical care he would receive in a Federal prison was his only hope for life.

He has lost one eye from cancer and says he has cirrhosis of the liver.

Monday, broke and hopeless, Scott decided to rob a bank to insure himself of medical care.

Tuesday, after being booked on suspicion of robbery, he learned that he might not get into a Federal prison after all.

The FBI has decided not to prosecute.

The case has been turned over to the city prosecutor, and Scott, a first offender, may even be placed on probation.

Even so, he will get the medical help he needs. Social workers have promised medical and psychiatric care, in or out of jail.

OIL TANKERS FOR CUBA

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, Cuba, Castro, and communism have become a three-headed Hydra which will require a supreme effort by this Government and this Nation to bring under control. Whatever transpires in Cuba, only 90 miles from the coast of Florida, concerns us now as a matter of national interest, and so the recent promise of the Soviets to ship crude oil to Cuba and the swift delivery of that oil in large tankers is important to every one of us.

In a recent article in the Baltimore Sun, Helen Delich Bentley, the maritime editor of the Sun and a nationally recognized and respected authority in the maritime field, analyzed in brilliant fashion the whys and wherefores of the Soviet ability to fulfill its promise of crude oil shipments so quickly.

In Mrs. Bentley's words:

Russia's first advantage is the failure of the Western nations to retain a unified front concerning trade with the Iron Curtain countries over the past decade.

The other major factor—

She continues—

and perhaps the more important at this time is the restrictions imposed on import oil by the U.S. Government.

It is an excellent article, Mr. President, filled with the accuracy and impartiality which characterizes Mrs. Bentley's reporting. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OIL TANKERS FOR CUBA

(By Helen Delich Bentley)

Russia's ability to ship crude oil directly to Cuba is a mainstay of the Castro (or post-Castro?) fight against American and British oil concerns. Yet Russia commands the necessary tanker tonnage for the long ocean run largely because of two practices among the Western countries which have the effect of advantaging the Soviet.

These same two factors help Russia supply India and other countries with crude oil at 5 to 15 percent below world prices, thus building up its own oil industry at the expense of free-enterprise companies all over the globe. True, India yesterday announced cancellation of oil agreements with Russia—but only after three suppliers with refineries in India had cut their price by 11 percent. In fact, worldwide price postings for crude oil are edging closer to a major break as a result of activity such as Russia is forcing in Cuba, India and like areas.

Russia's first advantage is the failure of the Western nations to retain a unified front concerning trade with the Iron Curtain countries over the past decade. Even during the Korean war, ships flying the flags of Great Britain, Norway, Denmark, Italy, and others called regularly at Red Chinese ports.

The other major factor, and perhaps the more important at this time, is the restrictions imposed on import oil by the U.S. Government. Limiting import oil to only slightly more than 1 million barrels daily, with the bulk of that from nearby Venezuela, Washington policy has forced hundreds of thousands of tons of giant supertankers "on the open market" to shop and ship anywhere that they can pick up trade.

Hungry owners have been searching for business at any price, just to keep their vessels going and hoping to be able to pay off at least the mortgage interest as it falls due. Principal payments have been lagging further behind because of the continuation of the depressed market, now entering its fourth year.

Some owners who have been drawing on their capital reserves during the past 3 years, now face bankruptcy or forced sale of their ships at prices far below the amount still due. Many already have failed. This makes the survivors still more anxious for any kind of business, including Russian business.

Knowing that approximately 6 million tons of tankers are idle throughout the world and available for charter at rockbottom prices, the Russians have been able to avoid expending great sums to build their own tankers and still are able to ship their oil all over the world at prices under those of the oil companies, which get bargains on freight rates only when they themselves are able to spot charter a ship.

Normally the oil companies have their own vessels (which must be amortized and maintained) on their hands as well as those they chartered under long-term agreements before the depressed market set in.

The import oil restrictions which are imposed by the Interior Department to protect a small, but vocal group of domestic independent oil producers are blamed for the tanker situation by the owners.

They estimate that an increase of imports by 800,000 barrels daily, or less than one-tenth of the 9 million barrels consumed in this country every day, would employ the entire 6 million tons of idle supertankers if all of the increase could come from the Persian Gulf. Even a shift in the present quota from Venezuela to the Persian Gulf area would help some because of the longer water haul. With the tankers busy filling the oil needs of the United States, there wouldn't be any left to transport Russian petroleum.

The Maritime Administration has opposed the import oil restriction program of Interior on the basis that the latter governmental branch was undermining Maritime and its efforts to build up a merchant marine under American-flag registry.

Because of the oil restrictions some of the supertankers which the U.S. Government has helped build in this country have carried nothing except grain of one sort or another—not a drop of petrol. The tanker owners would prefer their vessels being used for bulk liquids and so would the dry cargo owners whose market has been depressed further by the entrance of tankers into grain cargo hauling.

The fact that Russia was able to divert tankers to the Cuban run almost overnight is considered quite a feat in shipping circles. That accomplishment plus some other maneuvering she is doing on her cargoes to destinations other than Cuba demonstrates that her officials for all their Marxist preoccupations have become most adept in manipulating the charter market of worldwide private enterprise.

Various reports have been issued within the past 2 weeks about the effectiveness of the threat by the big oil companies, particularly the three whose refineries were seized in Cuba, to blacklist owners who charter to Russia for movement of its oil anywhere in the world. It is understood that the oil companies definitely want the impression to circulate among shipowners that their threat is very effective so that all will coldshoulder the Russians.

However, a check on the weekly ship position list published by Lloyds of London shows that a number of tankers—particularly British, Italian, and Norwegian—are in the Black Sea area. Their charters have been kept secret, as charters often are, and the work has proceeded without fanfare.

The Greek shipowners, who for the most part are trying to adhere to the plea by the U.S. Government not to make their tankers available in this trade, have pointed out again that if the British, Norwegian, and Italian tankers are free to move as they please then the Greeks are forced by naked economic necessity to follow suit.

As suggested above, one way in which the oil companies and the U.S. Government could divert these Greek tankers from Russian employment is to put the tankers to work for them.

As might be expected with an increased demand, the prices being offered for charters by the Russians are rising, but still are only high enough for an owner to break even on operating costs if he is lucky and if his tanker is already paid for. The Russians have invited charters for 1 and 2 years (unusually long on today's depressed market) at around $2.50 per ton for T–2 tankers. Small owners are chafing at the bit and are hard to restrain from signing the contracts.

Another point not emphasized or realized in lay circles is that it is difficult to reroute any ships to a completely new run on short notice. Normally it takes several weeks and sometimes months to arrange charters, particularly if the ships are to be put on a regular run such as between the Black Sea and Cuba.

To help ease this interim period, the Russians are placing as many of their own tankers as they can on the Cuban run and routing those of other countries to other areas. Further, to increase the tankers available now the Russians are actually selling their oil f.o.b. Black Sea and offering to pay the transportation costs, even though higher, if the purchasers will send in their own ships.

The Department of Interior reported last week that Russia's 1959 oil exports averaged 507,440 barrels daily. Every country in Europe—except Ireland, Spain, and Portugal—had made extensive purchases from the Iron Curtain's oil supplies. Italy led with 3 million tons.

Despite all the statements to the contrary, shipowners still believe that the depressed shipping market will provide enough tankers to the Russians for movement of their oil at a low cost anywhere in the world. Rescheduling and rearranging because of the Cuban situation will take some time, but no one believes the flow of oil from the Black Sea ever will be reduced by a lack of sufficient ships in this market. As stated above, the Lloyds Weekly Ship Movement record supports their belief already.

It was the same Lloyds report which revealed during the Korean war despite denials, that at the height of that conflict 103 freighters owned in England, Norway, Denmark, Italy, and France were under charter to Russia and her satellites and were engaged principally in transporting cargo to Red China.

During the same war the Danes were building ships for Russia.

The point made is that if Western ships were servicing the Communist bloc during the time when the United States and other United Nations troops were fighting the Reds, why wouldn't the same countries make their ships available today when only a cold war is under way and they aren't really affected?

As a matter of fact, today every country in the Western bloc is trading with Russia and her European satellites. Every nation except the United States and the Philippine Islands is trading with Red China, North Korea, and North Vietnam.

Most of this trade is subject to certain restrictions on the movement of strategic materials into the Soviet blocs, but the restricted list grows shorter every year.

The United States permits its ships to bring any cargoes available out of Russia, but only certain items can move in from this country. Again, every year the list of goods exchanged increases.

Many U.S. maritime leaders contend that this country's failure to permit trade with Red China was injurious both to the American-flag ships and to the country's own general trade balance.

U.S. FUNDS FOR CONGO QUESTIONED

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the Washington Evening Star has today published an outstanding editorial entitled "Questions U.S. Funds for Congo," written by David Lawrence. Every Member of Congress should read it.

The Congo has been independent for only a few short days. It has very clearly demonstrated its incapacity for self-government. Its troops have mutinied. They have assaulted women, including missionaries and nuns, without protest from our Government. Yet our State Department is now requesting another $100 million for the Congo.

It is my opinion that those nations in Africa which are now gaining their independence will immediately be requesting funds from our country in the form of foreign aid, and I believe our State Department will be sympathetic to making such funds available.

The people of the United States should notify every Member of Congress that they are tired of such activity; that they are tired of giving away our funds for no useful purpose; that they are tired of subsidizing governments which are incapable to governing themselves.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by Mr. Lawrence may be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

QUESTIONS U.S. FUNDS FOR CONGO—STATE DEPARTMENT PROPOSAL TO CONGRESS IN FACE OF RECENT ATROCITIES CRITICIZED

(By David Lawrence)

An amazing item came over the news ticker yesterday. It read in part as follows:

"The State Department asked Congress today for an extra $100 million in foreign-aid funds to help the violence-torn Congo and possibly other new African nations."

Not many days ago the troops of the Congo Government which is to be given American taxpayers' money committed one of the worst atrocities in human history—brutal attacks on white residents, with wholesale beatings of the men, mistreatment of the children, and rape of the women, including at least two American missionaries.

Yet, the Prime Minister of the Congo Government has called it all a lie, and not a word of regret or apology has come from the very Government whose troops were guilty of the atrocities—and whose same troops now would be supported with money furnished by the taxpayers of America.

The U.S. Ambassador in Leopoldville reported the facts at the time, and a commission of inquiry created on July 16 by the Belgian Government has just issued a preliminary report that documents case after case. The commission is composed entirely of high judges of Belgian courts and is not under control of the Government. Its report deals only with cases "among those which the commission can retain as established and proved as of now," but presents what it calls "often painful details" of the rapings of well over 100 women, including a number of nuns, most of whom were savagely assaulted—not once, but over and over again. The commission points out that the press has reported that 291 Belgian women have testified to such treatment.

No word of public condemnation, however, has come from the Department of State addressed to the Congo Government itself or to the press, expressing American disapproval of what has happened. Not so many months ago the same Department of State, however, was quick to interfere in the internal affairs of the Government of the Union of South Africa by issuing a statement condemning outnumbered police because they fired at a mob of several thousands that threatened them.

Surely, this is a precedent for public expression now about the horrors in the Congo, though there are plenty of precedents in international law, anyway, which say a government may at any time express opinions and take action when the lives and property of its citizens have been impaired.

The United Nations, itself, is subject to severe criticism for having failed to recognize the right of the Belgian troops to remain in the Congo to protect the lives and property of Belgian subjects and to secure redress for grievances suffered by them. Since the United Nations has taken over instead, then it is the duty of that organization, morally at least, to obtain redress. Yet, so far as anyone knows, the U.N. Secretary General has done nothing to require the Congo Government to administer punishment to those troops guilty of rape. So far as the U.N. is concerned, the atrocities have been ignored—as if they had not occurred.

It may be wondered what possible good can be served by giving money to an irresponsible government which has not yet shown its capacity to honor its obligations to all foreign residents. The State Department insists that the extra $100 million is needed "to restore some of the fundamental conditions that will permit a more normal life to be resumed." But how can a capacity to govern be suddenly acquired by a people hardly emerged from savagery? How can there be any respect for the lives and properties of foreigners in the future if the United States now overlooks the misdeeds of the Congo Government and turns around and gives it money?

But American taxpayers who are expected to foot the bill can still have recourse to their own Congress and insist that not a penny be appropriated to the new Congo Government until satisfactory action has been taken not only to punish the wrongdoers but to safeguard foreigners against similar attacks in the future.

The argument will be made that, if the United States doesn't help with money now, the Soviet Union will. But the truth is that the Communists have their agents in the Congo already and have played no small part in egging on the terrorists so as to create more and more complex problems for the countries of the West. Unless the Congo Government is willing to exterminate the Communist intriguers and stop trying to blackmail the West by attempting to play off Moscow against Washington, there is little justification for pouring American taxpayers' money down the drain in the Congo.

Certainly the civil rights of the white women in the Congo would seem to be as important as any other civil rights which motivate so many political demonstrations nowadays in this country.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, it is one of the basic principles of democratic government that the operations of the government machinery must be carried out in the open and must be subject to public scrutiny and judgment. If the citizens are to take an interest and a part in the business of government, they must have the necessary information to form responsible opinions. How else can the concept of popular and democratic government be carried out?

On the other hand, there is indeed, in many instances, the justifiable need to curb the free flow of information to the public because of important public considerations:

First. Certain Government information must be kept secret in the interest of national security.

Second. Quite often the giving out of certain information to the public may be adverse to the right of privacy and the interests of the people involved.

Third. At times the Government may be lacking the personnel and facilities to allow all those that desire to examine the public records free access to them.

Thus, while there is sufficient justification for limiting the public's access to specially enumerated records, it is also apparent that general secrecy in Government is one of the first indications that the machinery is not operating properly. Secrecy allows the intentioned cover-up of information that should reach the public. It permits exploitation of the public trust and of public property. It permits corruption. There is no better guarantee for clean and honest government than constant scrutiny by the public eye.

In the Ottoman Empire under the Sultans all government information was considered secret and classified. In order to obtain any information one had to bribe some high, or low, government official. But history has shown that government operating in this fashion cannot survive. If we want a Government by the people, we must keep the people advised as to what is taking place. A politically active public can exist only if we have a well-informed public.

In the past few years, there has been a constant struggle on behalf of the American press against unjustified secrecy existing in both State and Federal agencies. In this struggle no one has been questioning the right of the policymaker to the privacy of his decision. Most of the struggle was directed against secrecy in the lower and administrative echelons of Government. The struggle, likewise, in no way was intended to challenge the President in his exercise of the "Executive privilege" in matters of White House policy. The struggle was directed primarily against the claim of "Executive privilege" in areas which should be properly opened to public examination.

Several States have in recent years, passed new laws guaranteeing "freedom of information." There is now much clamor for similar legislation on the Federal level. The Senate Judiciary Committee has before it S. 2780, as reported by the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee. It is the purpose of this bill to clarify the law on the question of secrecy in Government. I believe the Judiciary Committee should give this bill its careful scrutiny and prompt attention. I believe that the public is entitled to a clarification of the laws dealing with freedom of information. Yet, at the same time, we must be certain that in considering new laws we do not invade our citizens' traditional right to privacy and do not make available to our enemies that information which must be kept secret in the public interest.

A few days ago I received a letter from the Milwaukee Journal endorsing S. 2780. I should like to have the views of Mr. Wallace Lomoe, executive editor of the Milwaukee Journal, included at this point of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MILWAUKEE JOURNAL,
July 22, 1960.

The Honorable Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: As you know, the Milwaukee Journal long has championed all measures which would help eliminate secrecy in government, be it at local, State or Federal levels. We have given time and space to reporting on "The People's Right To Know" and we have editorially supported that right. The fight for freedom of information, to make the people's business really their business (except where secrecy is vital to national security) is a never ending one; new barriers seem to appear as old ones are ripped down.

For these reasons, we are vitally interested in the prospects of bill S. 2780, introduced by Senator HENNINGS, when it comes before you as a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Our interest, I assure you, is not selfish. It is for the rights of all so that our form of government can function at its best through a fully informed citizenry.

I think we can rightly say that the Milwaukee Journal has a record of expressing its beliefs in its editorial columns. In this instance, in addition, Irwin Maier, our executive vice president and publisher, and I deem it proper, so that you would not interpret silence as indifference, to let you know personally that we of Journal management believe bill S. 2780 should be given full support. Also, Mr. Maier, in his capacity as an officer of the American Newspaper Publishers Association, and I, as an officer of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, support the hopes of our respective organizations on this proposed measure.

Respectfully,

WALLACE LOMOE,
Vice President and Executive Editor.

ATTENDANCE OF THE VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, a short time ago there was colloquy here on the floor between the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] and some of our colleagues on this side of the aisle in regard to the physical presence of the Vice President of the United States as the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

First, let me say that I am not at all upset by the fact that the Vice President is not here. I prefer to look upon the happy and enlightened countenance of the fine and able Senator from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK], who is the newest addition to the Democratic majority. This is exceedingly pleasing to all of us who long have dreamed of and planned for a better life and a better and brighter future, which of course is the spirit of the Democratic Party. I know that one of my colleagues on this side of the aisle has been keeping a "close watch", in both a symbolic sense as well as a physical sense, upon the presence of the Vice President of the United States as Presiding Officer. I think it is fair to say we do not expect the Vice President to be here all the time. I do feel, however, when we debate minimum wages, it might be interesting to find out what the wage was, by the hour, of active participation in presiding over the Senate by the Vice President; but even that may be without any relevancy to the argument. The important thing to me is that the Vice President has been here too much. Frankly, I was not for him being here at all. He has been here a little over 7½ years too much, and it looks as if he is going to be here 8 years too much. [Laughter.]

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will my able friend yield for one comment?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I could not resist. [Laughter.]

Mr. KUCHEL. I do not have a better friend here than the Senator from Minnesota. He is an eloquent and forceful spokesman for the distinguished political party to which he belongs, and he is entitled to his opinion. It is an opinion, however, that has not been shared by a majority of our fellow citizens on two occasions.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from California, who is one of my closest friends, and a gentleman for whom I have great admiration and affection, has stated what is an obvious political fact; but I might say I have some doubt as to whether the people voted for the Vice President. It seems to me they voted for a general. There was a free ride—I want that quite clear——

Mr. KUCHEL. I do not think it is quite clear, in my opinion.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Well, as the Senator has said, most respectfully, he is entitled to his opinion, and I thank the Senator.

But the point I want to get to my colleagues in the Senate is the fact, not, may I say to my esteemed friend from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], who has the stopwatch, so to speak, under the Vice President that the Vice President has been here too little—he has been here too much.

Listen to the record of the tiebreaking votes the Vice President has cast, which reveal the fact not only of physical presence, on occasion, but also of the philosophical presence of the Vice President.

I notice, for example, that since he became Vice President in January 1953, Mr. NIXON has cast eight tiebreaking votes in the Senate.

He voted twice to take up a controversial conference report on extension of economic controls in the Defense Production Act.

That was not in the public interest, but he did vote, and I think we ought to give him credit for being present.

Second, he voted to eliminate 90-percent price supports for millable wheat on March 9, 1956. Of course, this is the same Vice President who supported President Eisenhower, who promised every farmer in America not only 90-percent supports, and not only for wheat, but, may I say to my good friend from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK], who is presiding, for all storable agricultural commodities.

So the Vice President was present once too often for the good of the farmers, particularly the wheat farmers, Mr. Presiding Officer. He voted to break the tie in this body for a proposal which would have provided 90-percent price supports for millable wheat, despite the pledges of his party.

I wish he had been absent. I want to say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], put that watch away. [Laughter.]

Here is another one. He voted to amend the 1956 highway act to provide that State highway departments, rather than the Secretary of Labor, determine locally prevailing wages to be paid workers employed on construction of the Interstate Highway System.

The Vice President of the United States voted against the workingman. He voted for lower pay. He voted for lower standards. I think he was present once too often then.

Mr. President, you know, they had a slogan during the war, "Is this trip really necessary?" I think we might ask the Vice President, "Was that vote really necessary?" He was here once too often again.

Then the Vice President voted to block reconsideration of increasing the interest rate on Veterans' Administration GI housing loans from 4.5 to 4.75 percent.

In other words, the Vice President of the United States voted to increase interest rates on GI loans.

My dear friend from Ohio, do not hold this man here. [Laughter.]

That vote cost every veteran's family in America a good deal of money.

I do not mind that we pay the salary of the Vice President, but giving him these fringe benefits is beyond what I think is fair play. [Laughter.]

Then the Vice President voted to block reconsideration of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], the amendment known as the bill of rights amendment to the 1959 labor law.

There is a difference of opinion as to who was right, but the Vice President of the United States wants to pose as a great friend of the laboring people. They do not look at this act as a friendly one.

The Vice President voted to block reconsideration of a proposal to authorize increased aid for school construction and teachers' salaries.

The other day a handful of scholars came out for the Vice President. They will be the last we have if we follow the Vice President's philosophy on education. He voted against more school construction. He voted against aid for teachers' salaries.

I say, with all respect and affection to my friend from Ohio, do not keep this man here. We may have another bill like that up for consideration. I think we ought to sign a pledge here to let the Vice President run loose. Let him start his campaign. [Laughter.]

Then the Vice President voted to block reconsideration of the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] to the 1960 Mutual Security Act, limiting the President's use of his contingency fund.

There was a desire on the part of Congress to put some guidelines on how the President could use the contingency fund, which was an act of economy and for responsible legislation; but the Vice President saw it differently.

I have in my hand a list, as contained in the Congressional Quarterly, of when the Vice President did not vote. I say this list of when he did not vote proves my point. This list of when he did not vote shows he should have been absent more. I think he ought to be able to come in and open the session, and we can have the invocation. After that, I suggest every Member on this side of the aisle assure Mr. NIXON that he is free to go, free to be gone, and thereby we will continue the affairs of government here. We have a splendid President pro tempore of the Senate, who, if he serves as Presiding Officer, in case there is a tie vote, will cast his vote in the interest of the public.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am happy to yield to my friend from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator from Louisiana very well remembers one of these amendments, because he offered the amendment, when we were fortunate enough to have the Vice President away. That was an amendment to increase public assistance for the needy aged and orphan children and others who might be classified as needy.

The Senator will recall that the State of California, once represented so ably by the distinguished Vice President when he was a Representative from that State, would have been the principal beneficiary, which would have resulted in an automatic 50 percent increase in welfare checks for all the aged people in California, and would have assured every State at least of an automatic $5 increase if they merely continued with the amount they were paying. That proposal was lost on a tie vote. The Senator will recall that.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. We were fortunate that the Vice President was not here, because indications are he would have voted against that proposal. If such a proposal is to be defeated, it is better to be defeated by a tie vote than to be defeated by one vote to spare.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Louisiana has indicated again there are times when it is important that a person not be physically present.

I simply thought we ought to set the record straight, because I notice our friends on the other side of the aisle have a certain amount of concern over the time-keeping attributes and desires of one of our distinguished colleagues on this side. It seems to me that everyone is entitled to his own opinion. There are those who think the Vice President ought to be present. I am not among those. There are those of us who think it is better when he is away. I join that happy group.

Mr. President, I am going to dedicate what little talent I have, and what little energy I have—I have some energy—to seeing to it that he is far, far away—at Whittier, Calif.—after January 1961.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNDUE ALLOWANCES FOR EXPENSE ACCOUNTS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, Senators will recall that earlier in the session before the recess the Senate had occasion to debate at some length an amendment offered by me to a Finance Committee bill which dealt with what I call the swindle sheet racket, or the undue allowances for expense accounts which were cheating the Treasury out of many, many millions of dollars each year.

I have before me an article which appeared in Dun's Review and Modern Industry. It is one of a series entitled "The Folklore of Management," and its title is "The Myth of the Magic Expense Account." The author is Mr. Clarence B. Randall, president of one of our great steel companies, a renowned and reasonably conservative industrialist.

The format of the article indicates on the front page the following:

Has expense-account entertaining gone beyond the limits of propriety and good sense? A leading elder statesman of American business thinks so—and warns U.S. industry of the consequences of unbridled spending on the customer. One possibility: a severe congressional crackdown.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Randall's article be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FOLKLORE OF MANAGEMENT—THE MYTH OF THE MAGIC EXPENSE ACCOUNT

(By Clarence B. Randall)

Has expense-account entertaining gone beyond the limits of propriety and good sense? A leading elder statesman of American business thinks so—and warns U.S. industry of the consequences of unbridled spending on the customer. One possibility: a severe congressional crackdown.

When a Japanese businessman is ready to close a big deal, he would not think of doing it in his office. Instead, the seller takes the buyer out to dinner. While the sukiyaki simmers slowly toward fragrant perfection over the charcoal brazier in the corner of the quaint little room, they curl their legs comfortably beneath them under the low table. Quietly, they begin to talk. First they inquire solicitously for the welfare of their respective families. Then, cautiously they approach the subject which is uppermost in their minds. Unobtrusively a geisha fills and refills their fragile cups with warm sake, and from time to time croons a soft oriental melody to the accompaniment of her samisen. Hours later they sign.

I doubt if Rudyard Kipling had observed this ceremony when he said that east is east, and west is west, and that never the twain should meet. I see little difference in principle between what goes on in Tokyo and what goes on in various nightspots and resort hotels in the United States when the big expense-account money gets flowing. True, the samisen has not yet been widely employed in plush American restaurants, but there are those in our business community who seem to agree fully with their Japanese colleagues that the uninhibited use of high-priced food and liquor will move merchandise.

Certain it is that entertaining by business in this country is now itself big business. Some companies are more widely known for their parties than they are for their products. The occasions for business entertainment range all the way from two for lunch in the executive dining room to several thousand in the ballroom of the big hotel, with name bands and orchids flown in from Hawaii for the ladies.

Gone are the days when a salesman occasionally wined and dined his favorite customer, or perhaps gave a small theater party. Nowadays, when the deal gets big enough, the company yacht weighs anchor and moves into position, the company plane takes off for a duck blind in Arkansas, or the best hotel in Miami throws open its doors to expectant dealers for a week of continuous circus.

The distaff side is cut in, too, on both sides of the deal. How the ladies love it. With jet travel what it is, those who were getting a little tired of White Sulphur may now hope to look in on Capri or the Riviera.

The unseen partner in all this largess, of course, the man who rides the afterdeck of the company yacht, copilots the duck hunters' plane, sits by while the caviar is spooned out and the crepes suzette are sizzling, the man who splits the check at the night spot and hands the big bill to the headwaiter, is none other than Uncle Sam. Lights would go dim along the Strip in Las Vegas and chorus girls would be unemployed from New York to Los Angeles if it were not for that great modern invention, the tax deduction.

But who are the silent underwriters of this frenetic spending? You and I, the general taxpayers. It is we who make up to the U.S. Treasury the revenue lost through expense-account deductions.

This orgiastic abuse of the expense account is by no means universal, or even in a broad sense characteristic of our business community today. It is, however, a spectacular and alarming trend, participated in by enough companies and individuals to put all of us upon caution for the good reputation of businessmen as a class.

So far, expense-account entertainment is held somewhat in check by two factors.

First of all, the best companies—those who value the good opinion of thoughtful people—reject it. They behave with dignity and self-restraint in relationships with their customers.

Secondly—and this is altogether discreditable—in some of those companies that practice excesses, the president himself has no part in it. He lives correctly in his suburb, stays out of the hot spots. He just passes the word to the general auditor not to bear down. Expense accounts from the operating department get tough treatment—but not those from the sales end of the business. And the dirty work is delegated to the younger men. They catch on fast. They know that the boss prefers not to be told all that goes on.

Just over the horizon a third limitation is coming somewhat hazily into view. It may actually mark the cut-off of all this excess, if the spenders are smart enough to notice it, which I doubt.

That third limitation is rising public indignation. An ordinary fellow—say, an executive from a public utility where every penny is scrubbed before it is spent—takes his wife out to dinner for the one big evening of the year. He finds at the next table a neighbor who has just ordered his third bottle of champagne, although he is known to be two payments behind on his car. And the ordinary, decent citizen doesn't like what he sees. He cannot deduct his wife's dinner from his personal income tax as an expense, and he resents watching someone else live it up for free. So, when they hear about it second hand from waiters and hat-check girls, do teachers and policemen and others who have just had a pay raise denied. So do I. And so does anyone else who understands and values the free enterprise system.

This may be the next spectacular issue for the politicians if the present ominous grumbling grows into a ground swell. An attack on business is surefire in many congressional districts. Nothing goes over better than to expose special privilege which is not available to the ordinary citizen. All that Congress has to do is to move in and pass a bill limiting the right to deduct entertaining as a business expense, and it will be finished. They narrowly missed doing just that in the current session.

When that time comes, the innocent will suffer with the guilty, as they always do, and legitimate promotional and development effort will be restricted or made more costly.

It is disturbing that business does not put its own house in order while there is still time, that it does not speak out boldly against expense-account abuses. The whole purpose of a trade association, or of any nationwide industrial organization, is to provide a collective voice on matters of mutual concern. The trouble is that we use that voice steadily against others, but seldom turn it inward toward ourselves. We are trigger-happy with criticism of Government, but reluctant when it comes to self-criticism. We are quick to point out the excess of labor—and rightly so—but if we were equally ready to point out our own, they might more speedily be corrected.

That individual business leaders do not publicly denounce such abuses more often, even when they do not practice them themselves, is not surprising, though still regrettable. "Judge not that ye be not judged" applies. Each one of us feels a certain inhibition against appointing himself a critic of others' conduct. Yet this qualm disappears when it is a collective judgment made in concert with colleagues through a national organization. If such bold leadership for the correction of excesses cannot thus be achieved, free enterprise has an extremely vulnerable Achilles heel. If we cannot correct these things ourselves, we can hardly protest if Government steps in to do it for us.

But beyond these moral overtones, and the damage currently being done to the good name of business in the eyes of the general public, comes a practical question. Do these practices, in fact, pay off? There would seem to be serious reason to doubt whether lavish display and heavy-handed entertaining are really worth the cost, whether in the long run they actually sell the merchandise.

Those who indulge in such methods are notoriously poor judges of people. They seem to think that God made all men in their image. The salesman who resorts to the nightclub approach is usually a man who likes nightclubs. It never occurs to him that the man on the other side of the transaction might just possibly prefer to stay home, have a quiet evening with his family, and go to bed early.

Or take racetracks. Oddly enough, there are some people who would rather potter around with roses in a garden than go out and bet on the horses. Quite often they are the very ones who get asked to go to the derby in a private car.

In the earlier days of the automotive industry, the favorite technique was for a salesman to go to Detroit, organize an all-night poker game, and lose heavily to the chief purchasing agent. This approach lost sight of the fact that there are strange characters who would rather read a book in front of a fire than play deuces wild and absorb bourbon until dawn.

What a man does with his time after hours is purely personal, and more often than not it is sharply divorced from his business. Selling that forgets this is not shrewd.

In other words, on the law of chances, there are probably as many men who will be offended, even insulted, by overexpenditure to win their favors as there are those who will be impressed.

Sometimes the use of entertainment and gifts reaches the point where it crosses the line of proper customer relationships altogether and becomes commercial bribery. A set of golf clubs at Christmas to the third assistant purchasing agent or a carton of cigarettes with a $100 bill tucked inside is completely venal. Business purchased by such means has too precarious a base to be enduring. Yet, strangely enough, some companies that would fire instantly any employee who accepted such gifts from others, nevertheless, permit their own salesmen to make them. Surely maintaining such a dual standard is less than honest.

The really fine salesman never mistakes his mission. For example, he never yields to the temptation of selling himself instead of his merchandise. He has but one thing to offer, and that is the product of his company. He submerges his own personality in the composite structure of the company team so that there will be no break in continuity should circumstances cause him to be replaced.

His highest function is to determine with precision the customers' needs, even when they are not clearly understood by the buyer—as they often are not—and to make sure that his company can serve those requirements adequately. His knowledge of wines and his skill at cards are better employed when made available to his friends than when they are substituted for knowledge of his own business and that of the customer.

In the long run, the product must sell itself. It takes on no added value from exposure to neon lights, nor is it likely that its special virtues can be explained more clearly at 2 in the morning than at 2 in the afternoon. If it is insufficient in quality or uncertain in delivery, no amount of entertaining can long conceal those basic deficiencies. You can cover up a crack in the wall temporarily with whitewash, but the defect will keep coming back indefinitely until the wall is repaired.

The only relationship between seller and buyer that will endure through the years is one which rests solidly upon mutual satisfaction and understanding. No such lasting commercial partnership can be purchased with champagne. Nor can it be induced by a shallow effusion of insincere friendship from a showoff who has been given a fat expense account. Purchasers who bear substantial responsibility are intelligent and serious-minded executives. They want to deal with selling officers who are also intelligent and thoughtful, and who behave in a responsible manner. They have little respect for playboys.

Objective students of the current business scene must view this phenomenon of the reckless use of expense-account money with considerable dismay. They would be hard to convince that extravagant parties make a significant contribution to the Nation. Party or no party, the commodity to be sold remains the same, having no greater utility for the buyer afterward than before, and no greater profit potential for the seller. To say these things, however, is something of a waste of breath—for those on the lunatic fringe of industry who commit the excesses are not given to taking serious thought for the welfare of the economy or for the preservation of the private enterprise system in the midst of the great world struggle in which we are engaged.

They seldom pause to speculate on what image of the American free economy their conduct creates in the minds of men from the new countries who come to study our way of life. From Pakistan to Nigeria, from Ecuador to Indonesia, the battle is on between socialism and free enterprise. Which will be the basis for developing untapped industrial strength? We are the models upon whom men who wish to preserve private initiative in their economies base their hopes.

We cannot be too careful in what we teach them. They imitate the bad as readily as they do the good, and they may easily attribute our success to the wrong causes.

Selling is a high test of character, perhaps more so than production itself. Much of it takes place away from the watchful eye of prudent supervision. The individual is on his own, and his conduct will rise no higher than his own capacity to do right because it is right, when no one in authority is at hand to check him. Those who select and train him must have this in mind. They must not be deceived by suave manners and a ready gift of speech.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I hope that as Senators glance over this article they will come to the conclusion that an anti-swindle-sheet amendment is one of the most important bits of unfinished business for us to consider next January if we intend to stop tax chiseling and also to assure a balanced budget.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FLORIDA PHOSPHATE

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, phosphate is one of the essential elements for continued life on this planet, both vegetable life and animal life, including, of course, human life.

The State of Florida, which I have the honor to represent, in part, is a large producer of phosphate and is making, I think, a great contribution to our country and to the world in such production.

An excellent article entitled "Japan Best Customer for Florida Phosphate," was published in the Lakeland Ledger of August 11, 1960. The article relates to phosphate which is exported from Florida to other nations in the free world, and upon which those nations rely, at least in part.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Lakeland (Fla.) Ledger, Aug. 11, 1960]

JAPAN BEST CUSTOMER FOR FLORIDA PHOSPHATE

Japan, with limited acreage on which to raise the food it needs to feed its dense population, once again in 1959 was the Florida phosphate industry's best foreign customer.

In fact, Florida continued to be the only U.S. source of phosphate rock purchased by Japan for use as fertilizer. Florida producers shipped a recordbreaking 1,259,258 tons of phosphate rock to Japan last year, for which the Japanese paid almost $8,500,000.

This Japanese volume was 40 percent of all the Florida phosphate exported in rock form last year, keeping Japan far in front as the biggest foreign purchaser of this product, according to the Florida Phosphate Council.

West Germany was the second biggest purchaser of Florida phosphate rock, with a total of more than 350,000 tons last year. Canada was next with 315,000 tons. Other important customers included the United Kingdom, 225,000 tons; the Netherlands, 223,000 tons; Spain, 129,000 tons; Italy, 230,000 tons.

Sometimes phosphate rock is ground to proper fineness for direct application to the soil, but usually it is treated with acid to make superphosphate or triple superphosphate. These more concentrated products are combined with nitrogen, potash, and other elements to make a complete plant food.

"The 1959 purchases by Japan were 132,500 tons greater and brought almost $950,000 more than in 1958," the council said, "based on the value alongside ship at Tampa, Boca Grande, or other port."

Figures released by the U.S. Department of Commerce show exports of Florida phosphate in rock form last year to all foreign countries totaled 3,147,978 tons, valued at $22,851,414. This does not include exports of superphosphate or triple superphosphate, the council emphasized, on which Government figures for Florida alone are not released.

Japan did not buy any superphosphate or triple superphosphate from the United States, the council said, confining its purchases to phosphate in rock form and doing its own processing into the more concentrated forms of plant food.

Florida again enjoyed the lion's share of the total U.S. phosphate rock export business, the council pointed out.

"Exports of phosphate rock from U.S. mines outside Florida totaled only 480,511 tons in 1959," the council said, "valued at $5,730,376. This is only about a sixth of the tonnage and a fourth of the value of Florida's shipments overseas."

Florida's phosphate rock exports in 1958 totaled just under 2,700,000 tons, the council said, valued at almost $20 million, a record in both respects until broken by last year's operations.

Exports accounted for nearly 25 percent of Florida's phosphate rock in 1959, the council said.

"With such a substantial part of its production being sold overseas," the council pointed out, "holding these foreign markets is of prime importance for continued operation of the Florida industry at its present level."

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage of employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will state it.

Mr. KUCHEL. Do I correctly understand that at 2 o'clock the Senate will be operating under controlled time for the consideration of the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Florida, and of such amendments as have also been submitted by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PROXMIRE in the chair). At 2 o'clock the Senate will be operating under controlled time on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], and such amendments as may be offered to that amendment.

Mr. KUCHEL. By any Member of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, it is a very few minutes before 2 o'clock. Is there objection to the distinguished Senator from Florida proceeding with his opening comments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no objection whatsoever. The Senator from Florida may proceed at will. The controlled time will not start to run until 2 o'clock.

Mr. KUCHEL. Do I correctly understand that the 2 hours are equally divided, 1 hour to be under the responsibility and control of the Senator from Florida, and the other hour by the majority leader?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senator from Florida to the clock. It is now 6 minutes before 2. If the Senator from Florida has no objection, I hope he will consider commencing his comments.

Mr. HOLLAND. I shall be glad to begin.

Mr. President, I ask that the 6 minutes between now and 2 o'clock be added to the time which is limited, and be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents, so as to provide 1 hour and 3 minutes on each side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask that my substitute amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 24, between lines 5 and 6, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 11. Except as may otherwise be expressly provided by law, the Secretary of Labor shall have no power to regulate, either through the withholding of benefits or services or otherwise, the wages or hours of employment of employees employed in agriculture (as defined in section 3(f) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938).

On page 24, line 7, strike out "SEC. 11" and insert "SEC. 12".

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the substitute amendment is identical in its coverage with the original amendment, except that it is confined to the field of agricultural employment, so that there may be no misunderstanding on the part of any Senator taking part in the debate, or otherwise, that the effect of the amendment is confined to agricultural labor. It is confined to any agricultural labor which may be supplied to any farmer in the United States. I refer to "farmer" in the sense of including horticulturists and those engaged in all the other branches of agriculture who request the rendition of service by the U.S. Employment Service, which exists under the Wagner-Peyser Act; and, under such act, serves to supplement the employment service of the various States, and as an agency which serves them all, and, through them, the people who may require such service.

The occasion for the amendment is that a little more than a year ago the Secretary of Labor advised the agriculturists of the Nation, and the Department of Agriculture, as well, that he proposed to place some limitations upon the service which he rendered, and was required to render, under the terms of the Wagner-Peyser Act. The limitations which he proposed would be applicable only to the furnishing of agricultural labor, and would be applied in such a way as would have required the various States which were trying to avail themselves of the services of the Federal Employment Service to give certain assurance in advance about the pay scale for the agricultural labor which would be furnished, the housing conditions, and other conditions of employment mentioned in the proposed order of the Secretary of Labor.

The announcement occasioned great surprise to many of us, because we had always felt that the Wagner-Peyser Act gave no authority whatever for the making of any regulations or rules by the Secretary of Labor in this field, but, instead, made of the Federal Employment Service an agency, purely and simply, through which the State employment services and the people asking for help from the State employment services might secure aid in finding workers beyond the limits of their States. I think it is appropriate, therefore, to consider in some detail the provisions of the Wagner-Peyser Act and the facts concerning them.

In 1933, the Congress approved the Wagner-Peyser Act, which provided a grant-in-aid program for the creation of State employment services and created a Federal agency to coordinate their programs. Language pertinent to the question to be developed in this portion of this report was contained in sections 3 and 12 as follows:

SEC. 3. It shall be the province and duty of the Bureau to promote and develop a national system of employment offices * * * to assist in establishing and maintaining systems of public employment offices in the several States. The Bureau shall also assist in coordinating the public employment offices throughout the country and in increasing their usefulness by developing and prescribing minimum standards of efficiency, assisting them in meeting problems peculiar to their localities, promoting uniformity in their administrative and statistical procedures, furnishing and publishing information as to opportunities for employment and other information of value in the operation of the system, and maintaining a system for clearing labor between the several States.

SEC. 12. The Secretary of Labor is authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of sections * * * of this title.

Mr. President, in reading section 3, in which the functions of this Bureau are stated, I believe it is rather clear that no power at all was given by that section to provide rules that would determine the amount of wages, the housing conditions, or any other conditions which must be met before the facilities of the Federal employment agency could be used. That had caused many of us, including myself, to think, and we still think, that the Secretary of Labor is entirely without power to do what he is proposing to do under the now pending regulation which imposes conditions in this field upon the rendition of service to States and to persons within those States seeking the aid of the employment service in obtaining agricultural work.

This language has been interpreted by the Department of Labor to authorize the Department to require farmers who use the services of State or Federal employment agencies for the recruitment of migratory agricultural workers to comply with standards relating to wages, housing, the prepayment of transportation, and other factors as may be determined to be prevailing in the area. The Attorney General has indicated that the language of the statute may be so construed.

Mr. President, I use the words "may be" because on close perusal of the opinion of the Attorney General, I fail to find anything that looks like a complete upholding of the powers of the Secretary of Labor under this reference, as are claimed by him to exist.

In summing up his argument in support of the validity of the action of the Secretary of Labor, the Attorney General stated as follows:

In the face of the longstanding administrative construction of the act as conferring power upon the Secretary to promulgate referral standards governing the use of the public employment service and the evidence of congressional acquiescence therein, I would not be justified in advising you that the construction is in fact erroneous in the absence of a clear and convincing showing of error. In my opinion no such showing has been made.

Mr. President, I have practiced law for a good many years, and I have been called upon for a good many opinions. I think I know what would be a strong opinion upholding the position of a client or of an agency which has requested advice. I can find no weaker statement which could be made by an Attorney General or by whomever in his office drew up this opinion, than the one included within the quoted words. He stated, I repeat:

I would not be justified in advising you that the construction is in fact erroneous in the absence of a clear and convincing showing of error. In my opinion no such showing has been made.

The only words I can apply, Mr. President, which appear to me to be adequate, are that those are weasel words, because they do not at all affirmatively uphold the construction of the statute requested by the Secretary of Labor and relied upon by the Secretary.

Competent authorities have questioned this opinion. In that connection, I refer to pages 111 to 126 of hearings of House Agriculture Committee on House bill 9869 and other bills, March 22–31, 1960.

For instance—and I shall refer now to the opinion of one of the questioning authorities who does not believe that the power claimed by the Secretary of Labor to exist does actually exist. The following is the opinion of the Chief of the American Law Division of the Library of Congress, one who is wholly impartial in this matter. He is a referee who is paid by the Government to render impartial opinions on the meaning of legislation, and of course he renders them from a background of very extensive experience and practice in this field. Here is what he says:

On this point, we have scanned the reports and debates on the Wagner-Peyser Act of June 6, 1933 (48 Stat. 113; S. 510, 73d Cong.), and do not find any indication that the Members sponsoring or debating the measure had in mind that the Employment Service was to exercise any substantive control over the working conditions and terms of employment of workers recruited by the Service.

* * * * *

At the same time, it is obvious that regulations purporting to require compliance with substantive standards as to housing, working conditions, etc., have been in effect since 1951. We do not see how mere lapse of time can confer authority not stated by law.

A former Solicitor of the Department of Labor, William S. Tyson, says—as appears on page 123 of aforesaid hearings—that—

Neither the statutory language nor the legislative history of the Wagner-Peyser Act, evidence any intent by the Congress to delegate or confer upon the Secretary of Labor authority to issue the amendatory regulations to part 602, title 20, Code of Federal Regulations, which he proposes in the document of March 13, 1959. It is evident here that the Secretary is trying to do indirectly what he is not authorized to do directly.

Mr. President, the document referred to—that of March 13, 1959—was the proposed regulations, which have been published in the Federal Register, and supposedly have been in force for some time, but actually have not been enforced up to this date, and now are proposed to be enforced after this Congress has adjourned—as a matter of fact, in December, at a time when the regulations will have their first application to the vegetable and fruit farmers of the southern part of the Nation only, including the farmers and fruitgrowers in the State of Florida. I do not mean to say that the application would never be made to others; but I mean that the first application for a period of weeks or months would necessarily be to the farmers, fruitgrowers, and vegetable producers in the southern part of the Nation.

The counsel of the House Agriculture Committee, Mr. Heimburger, has made a statement on this matter; it appears on page 113 of the aforesaid hearings. Here, Mr. President, I pause to pay tribute to him. Let me say that I have been sitting for several years in conferences on measures dealing with the field of agriculture; and Mr. Heimburger is always there, representing the conferees on the part of the House. I may say—and I am sure I am now speaking for all Senate Members who from time to time have sat in conferences on agricultural measures—that Mr. Heimburger has consistently shown the finest possible grasp of the meaning of agricultural legislation. So I now read what he said:

In summary, it is our position that the Wagner-Peyser Act is a service statute, not a regulatory statute, and that there is nothing in the act nor its legislative history which supports the assumed authority of the Secretary of Labor to issue the regulations proposed by him on March 13, 1959, and that, on the contrary, the statute and its legislative history make it clear that there is no authority under that act for the Secretary to issue regulations affecting users of the service except as provided in subsection 11(b) thereof, that when Congress intends for working conditions of agricultural labor to be regulated it makes clear and specific provision therefor, and that any effort to promulgate such regulations in this instance is in derogation of the powers of Congress to legislate.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I wish to gather a little information about the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

As I understand, the reason for offering an amendment of this kind lies in the supposed fact that the Secretary of Labor has denied the services of the employment service to farmers who do not agree that the Secretary may regulate the conditions of labor on the employer's place—for instance, housing conditions, working conditions, and so forth.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is correct in that assumption. He has not only denied it to individuals, as shown by the complaints of the American Vegetable Growers Association and of the Florida Fruit and Vegetable Growers Association, but he has denied it to the States, because his agreement and operations are with State service agencies of the same type.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not ask for special privileges for farmers, but I would like to know if the Secretary of Labor has undertaken to exercise the same power to regulate migratory industrial or construction labor.

Mr. HOLLAND. The distinguished Senator addressed that question to me just before he went to lunch, and I referred it to members of the staff of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. I am not a member of that committee. I received from them an answer that in no instance that they know of, other than in this field of agricultural labor, has the Secretary of Labor made any such ruling or attempted any such service.

Mr. AIKEN. I shall continue to seek information, although I think the Senator from Florida is probably correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. I will ask the Senator to pause while I read a statement from the testimony of Representative McINTIRE, of Maine, who appeared as a witness in the hearings to which I have just referred in my statement. I quote Representative McINTIRE:

> Another thing which has disturbed us also is that, insofar as we have knowledge, the area of agricultural employment and referral of workers to agricultural employers is the only area to which the interpretation I have set forth has been applied.

Mr. AIKEN. In other words, if, for example, a utility company undertakes to construct a dam on a tributary of a river, which requires 200 or 300 men, who come there with their families to work over a period of months or a year or two, does the Secretary of Labor then undertake to regulate the living conditions and working conditions of those construction employees?

Mr. HOLLAND. Or the wages.

Mr. AIKEN. Or the wages; and, I might also add, industries requiring emergency help involving a few hundred extra employees. Does the Secretary of Labor undertake to regulate hours, wages, working conditions, and living conditions for them; or is the "squeeze" being put on agriculture alone? That is the question I want an answer to. If the "squeeze" is put on agriculture, and industrial and construction labor is not subject to the same conditions, then, of course, the amendment of the Senator from Florida is fully justified.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator. The Senator from Florida will simply say that he knows of his own knowledge of no field in which it has been applied except in agriculture, and, according to the information given him by the staff of the same committee, the same answer obtains. They said what the Senator from Florida knew to be true, that in the case of Government contracts and the application of another law in which the Secretary of Labor is given specific authority to announce the prevailing wage rate, he does that, but that is the result of the granting of specific authority and the placing of specific authority by an act of Congress in the Secretary in that field.

Mr. AIKEN. I realize that in the case of public contracts the Secretary of Labor is given authority under the Davis-Bacon and Walsh-Healey Acts, but does he undertake to exercise those rights in the case of a private employer or private contractor?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Florida has no information that he does, and he is advised by those he has consulted that the Secretary does not. The Senator from Florida does not have broad information in this field, and he has to rely upon what he is told by members of the committee staff.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I will be happy to yield when the Senator from Vermont is through.

Mr. AIKEN. I am asking for information because my action on the amendment will depend on what answer I get to my question.

Mr. HOLLAND. My answer is that the Senator from Florida knows of no other field where such purpose is activated by the Secretary of Agriculture, and he is informed by Senators on the committee and members of the staff of the committee there is no other field, and he is also informed by the statement made by Representative McINTIRE in hearings in the other body, that such is the case; and other witnesses who appeared in those same hearings made a statement to the same effect.

Mr. AIKEN. I am not asking for or supporting special privileges for farmers, but neither would I condone discrimination against farmers in the way of rules, regulations, or other conditions which are not applied to employers in other types of industries.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Vermont. He referred to the "squeeze" on the farmers. I wanted to ask the senior Senator from Vermont whether he knew the "squeeze" was merely the requirement that the employer pay the prevailing wage in the area if he is going to avail himself of the services of the governmental agency.

Mr. AIKEN. And does that same "squeeze," if I may use the term, apply to the labor of a private contractor who may be building a dam or constructing a road or forest highway or doing similar work?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I would say the Wagner-Peyser Act specifically creates a responsibility within the U.S. Employment Service and the State agencies to maintain a farm placement service. I see no provision in the act that says they should maintain a migrant industrial workers service.

Mr. AIKEN. When was the Wagner-Peyser Act enacted?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. In 1933. It has been amended many times since. The two senior Senators whom I am addressing were Members of this body when that happened.

Mr. AIKEN. Is that the act under which the Secretary of Labor has authority to deal with farm labor at the present time?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. The responsibilities are there created to establish the service and the authority to make rules necessary to carry forward those responsibilities.

Mr. AIKEN. Then, how does it happen that for 26 years apparently no effort was made to exercise the authority the present Secretary of Labor undertakes to exercise with regard to farm labor?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. To the contrary, the first expressions of this type of regulation were made in the late 1940's. Regulations similar to the regulations now under discussion, which finally became effective in December 1959, were part of the regulatory machinery as far back as 1951. They were changed slightly in 1954. They were changed very slightly in December of last year.

The farmers who wanted to use the Employment Service have been living with this for over a decade.

Mr. AIKEN. That same restriction applies to all other employers, as well as to farmers?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I see no specific responsibility on the Employment Service to furnish the service to migrant industrial workers. I see no similar direct responsibility in the migrant industrial field as I see as to the creation of the farm placement service.

Mr. AIKEN. Is the Secretary of Labor undertaking to enforce the same regulations against industrial and construction employers?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I can only say I have profound respect for the Secretary and I know he believes no employer should unconscionably undercut another and I am certain if he had the responsibility of placing industrial workers he would apply the same standards of reasonableness and fairness to those employers who use the agency, so as not to undercut other employers.

Mr. AIKEN. If he does not apply the same standards to industrial and construction employers, would that mean he does not possess the power to do so?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. It would mean he has not been assigned the responsibility to place the industrial workers. I simply cannot imagine, if he had the power, that he would not use it in the same way he uses it for the farmers.

Mr. AIKEN. Should he not have the same power to regulate industrial and construction workers that he has in regard to agricultural workers?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. The needs, as the Senator well knows, are much different. However, if he places industrial workers certainly he should have the same authority. I am sure he would use it to insure that the prevailing wage in the area for people similarly situated was applied.

Mr. AIKEN. After all, I rose seeking information, not expecting to give it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky, but before I do so I wish to say it is very clear from the statement made by the Senator from New Jersey that he simply thinks the Secretary of Labor would exercise the same authority in other fields, but he has not claimed any exercise of that same authority has been made in other fields, if I correctly understand.

Mr. AIKEN. That is what bothers me.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I have not claimed that the Secretary has attempted to place migrant industrial workers, as hypothesized by the senior Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HOLLAND. On that point the Senator from Florida knows that all during the last war, when we needed employees very greatly, for all types of labor in the State of Florida, especially to build things which had some relation to the war effort, the employment service was working day and night trying to send laborers to us.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Did they not insist upon the paying of the prevailing wage rate in the area?

Mr. HOLLAND. Only when it was a Government contract. I believe if the Senator will look into the matter carefully he will find no law which justifies such an action except in the case of a Government contract, and that is given under a different act, the Walsh-Healey Act, and another act in the same field.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. Later I intend to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Florida, in order to place clearly before the Senate a very practical problem which I think exists regarding the working conditions of migratory workers. If the amendment of the Senator from Florida should be agreed to, I believe it would seriously affect these workers. My amendment is designed also, to prevent the Secretary of Labor from fixing wages and hours for domestic farm labor.

I should like to address myself for a moment to the question asked by the Senator from Vermont. That is, does the Secretary of Labor have any power to issue the regulations? If so, has he made regulations respecting any group other than the farmworkers?

I agree with the Senator from Florida that the authority which the Secretary of Labor claims under the Wagner-Peyser Act to issue regulations is doubtful. The act simply sets up an employment service, including a farm placement service, and is intended to furnish a supply of workers of all kinds within the States and among the States.

The Secretary of Labor has statutory authority to enforce prevailing wages on contracts involving Federal expenditures. However, it is a fact that under section 12 of the Wagner-Peyser Act, which gives him the power to establish rules and regulations, the authority he has exercised relates only to farmworkers, and it is only with respect to farmworkers that he has attempted to draw these kinds of regulations. He has drawn regulations in three instances; in 1951, in 1954, and last year in 1959. It is not certain that he has the power to do so, but it has not been challenged legislatively or judicially.

Mr. AIKEN. If the Secretary has the power to apply certain restrictions and regulations to farmers, he certainly should have the power to apply similar restrictions and regulations to people engaged in other lines in our economy.

Mr. COOPER. Legally, if he has the power to fix regulations affecting farm labor, of course he would have the same power to fix regulations concerning the entire labor supply.

Mr. AIKEN. But the Secretary cannot claim the power to regulate one class without claiming the same power and the right to apply regulation to industry, to construction, or to any other labor with equal diligence.

Mr. COOPER. I do not believe he has the legal power to do so. But he has exercised the power with respect to interstate supply of farm labor.

The amendment of the Senator from Florida raises some very difficult problems about transient workers and migratory workers. I am fearful the amendment of the Senator from Florida would go too far. I will vote for the amendment in the end if my amendment should fail, because I believe the Senator is correct legally. But I hope when I offer my amendment, the Senator will consider it, and the Senate will consider it, for it is an effort to protect these migratory workers until the Senate Committees on Labor and Agriculture and Forestry can study the matter and the Congress can clothe the Secretary with precise authority to protect migratory workers.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the distinguished Senator. I will say that any claim by the Secretary of Labor of the right to fix wages, let us say, by fixing prevailing wages, runs exactly contrary to the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, passed in 1938, as amended in 1949, and as proposed to be amended now, which specifically and in direct words has refrained from giving any power over agricultural labor and has exempted agricultural labor from the provisions of such legislation.

I have been furnished from the State of Florida various illustrations of the way we are advised the new regulation will work. It is a new regulation. Nobody can make it an old one, because while there is some general terminology in the old regulation it has never been in force and has never been applied. It has simply been on the books. No one knew anything about it. As a matter of fact, the advisory committees serving both agriculture and the wages and hours group were both surprised when it was claimed there had been exercise of power by the Secretary of Labor under the 1951 regulation and a later one.

The two rules under which the Secretary of Labor proposes to fix what he will claim to be the prevailing wage are as I shall state.

The first results when they make a study and find that 40 percent of all the workers of that same classification in that same area are receiving the same wage. Then the Secretary would find affirmatively that that is the prevailing wage. Illustrations of that were furnished by the Labor Department to the Florida Fruit & Vegetable Association and by them forwarded to me.

The second standard is used if it cannot be determined that 40 percent of the entire laborers in that class in that area are receiving the same wage. I will read it, so that it may be very clear it is a different method.

If at least 40 percent of the workers surveyed do not receive a similar wage for similar work, the prevailing wage would be determined by beginning with the lowest wage rate and proceeding up the wage ladder until at least 51 percent of the workers surveyed are accounted for. The prevailing wage would, in this case, take the form of a wage range. See example C below.

The example is worked out on the page furnished to me and which I shall later submit for inclusion in the RECORD.

Mr. President, as applied here, it is very apparent that the prevailing wage can be one thing or another, and in neither case will it reflect any opportunity at all for the recognition of difference in ability, difference in experience, difference in age, or anything of the kind on the part of the persons secured and employed.

I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to ask one more question, which I believe is a reasonably important one. Does the Senator from Florida know whether the sponsor of the bill, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] has taken a position on the pending amendment, and whether he feels that the adoption of the amendment would be harmful to the bill as a whole?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Florida has no information on that question. The fact is that the class of workmen affected by the proposed new section, if it is added to the bill, is a class excluded and exempted from the operation of the bill now pending, which has the sponsorship of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I should like to point out to my friend the senior Senator from Vermont that immediately after the submission of the amendment in its original form by the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], who is handling the bill on the floor, was the first to suggest a reasonable conclusion that if it is proposed to amend the Wagner-Peyser Act, such amendment should be attempted when the Wagner-Peyser Act is under consideration, either in committee or in the Senate.

Now we are dealing with the Fair Labor Standards Act. We are talking about regulations of the Secretary of Labor promulgated under the authority of another act, and it was his position then that the amendment was clearly irrelevant and not germane to the discussion of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. AIKEN. Then we may assume that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] is opposed to the pending amendment of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. As he stated immediately after the submission of the amendment, which was last Friday evening, I believe.

Mr. HOLLAND. I heard the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts. As stated by the Senator from New Jersey the Senator from Massachusetts felt that such an amendment as the pending amendment should be presented at a time when the Wagner-Peyser Act was being studied for amendment.

However, this is the situation: In spite of the fact that the people affected, including members of the national and State associations of growers, have been working very hard on this problem to get some relief, they have received none. This regulation, which is dated sometime last spring—April, I believe—and published in the Federal Register a long time ago, has not been applied. Now we have been notified that the Department intends to apply it in December.

Mr. AIKEN. Twenty-seven years have elapsed without its being applied.

Mr. HOLLAND. That is correct. The earlier regulation existed 27 years without being applied, and this regulation, announced in April of last year, is sought to be applied beginning in December, when Congress is not in session, and at a time when it is impossible to deal with the question in the Senate. If we are to deal with it we must do so at this time.

This subject was brought to the attention of the Senate Committee on Appropriations when we were considering appropriations for the Labor Department for fiscal 1960. It was brought to the attention of the Senate committee, not by the Senator from Florida, but by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] and others, and after discussion in the Senate Committee on Appropriations we felt that it was of such urgency and importance to agriculture that we placed this statement in our report, and it is in the report now as a mandate, so far as the committee can give mandates, to the Secretary of Labor. It reads as follows:

> It has come to the attention of the committee that the Department of Labor has had under consideration the issuance of rules under the Wagner-Peyser Act, which would require farmers with respect to agricultural employment to submit to regulation by the Department over farm housing, transportation, wages and hours, and related matters. The Wagner-Peyser Act authorized the establishment of a national system of public employment offices as a means of assisting workers to find available job opportunities and employers to find available workers. It conferred no regulatory authority over either the workers or employers. The U.S. Employment Service, as its name implies, is solely a service agency. Except for the authority contained in title V of the Agricultural Act of 1949, as amended, which provides for temporary employment of Mexican farmworkers in the United States where such employment will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of domestic agricultural workers, there has not been delegated to the Department of Labor any authority to impose regulations concerning hours, wages, compulsory bargaining or the like with respect to agricultural employment as defined in the act. On the contrary, the Congress has consistently exempted agriculture from such controls because of the great difference between conditions affecting agriculture and those affecting industry. Therefore, in providing funds for the carrying out of the Bureau of Employment Security programs, it is directed that such funds not be used directly or indirectly to impose with respect to agricultural employment regulations relating to wages, hours, bargaining, or other conditions of employment, except as may be expressly authorized by law.

Despite these views of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, though they waited until that particular year had arrived, on July 1, the Department of Labor has proceeded to issue and implement regulations relating to wages, housing and the payment of transportation of domestic farmworkers.

Mr. President, I do not know of any better example that I have seen of the tendency which too often exists on the part of a regulatory agency or bureau to grab more power than it is given by law, in the name of some humanitarian objective—and I am sure that objective is present. Not only do they know that the Senate committee gave this mandate which they have obeyed throughout fiscal year 1960, but they also know that the committee has found specifically, and without a dissenting voice, that there is no legislation on this subject, and has called that fact directly to the attention of the Secretary of Labor. Nevertheless, he now proposes to implement in December, when we are away from the Senate, the regulation issued last April, and in fiscal year 1961, which is not covered directly by the mandate of the Appropriations Committee.

I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, for the information of Senators interested in this discussion, the members of my staff have been in contact with the Department of Labor, and the Department cites two examples which it thinks might answer the question of the Senator from Vermont. I disagree with them. They cite section 602.9 of the act, which relates to the interstate recruitment of agricultural workers. Then they cite section 604.1(k), which is merely a statement of policy.

I call the attention of Senators to the fact that neither of these parts of the act, the statement of policy or the section pertaining to interstate recruitment of agricultural workers, gives the Secretary of Labor any authority to promulgate regulations in any field other than in agriculture.

I point out in support of my friend from Florida the need to amend this particular act to take care of this problem. As the Senator has well pointed out, the Secretary of Labor has no authority under existing law to establish wage control in the agriculture industry or in any other industry not covered by existing acts. We have historically exempted agriculture from the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act. I cite section 13(a)(6):

> Any employee employed in agriculture or in connection with the operation or maintenance of the ditches, canals, reservoirs, or waterways not owned or operated for profit or operated on a sharecrop basis, and which are used exclusively for supply and supplying of water for agricultural purposes.

That very clearly is the intent of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended.

It is very clearly set out in the Kennedy proposal, which we are discussing in the Senate. Therefore, it is perfectly proper that we amend the Kennedy proposal so as to prevent the Secretary of Labor from doing something that he has no authority by law to do.

Several Senators have asked what effect the Holland amendment might have on Public Law 78, which is another act specifically giving the Secretary of Labor control over certain working conditions, wages, and so forth, of agricultural workers who are Mexican nationals. We call them braceros. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida if he feels that his amendment in any way touches upon Public Law 78, which is the act of Congress giving the Secretary of Labor the rights and duties set out in that act with respect to such labor.

Mr. HOLLAND. No; because my amendment does not apply in such a situation, where, by express wording of the laws, powers are given to the Secretary of Agriculture.

I may say that in passing these Mexican laws each time they have been before us, the Senate has been very careful to say that the provisions of that law shall not invade situations in other areas. For instance, the Senator from Vermont has repeatedly stated on the floor that the laborers in the potato fields of Vermont come from Canada. Other Senators have repeated that they use various offshore laborers in their areas, some of these laborers coming from the Bahamas or Jamaica or Barbados, or other areas which are British.

Every time the Mexican Labor Act has come up in Congress it has been very carefully provided by law that none of these other areas shall be affected by the Mexican problem, which is different, both in nature and degree, from the others. That is so because there is a long frontier between our country and Mexico, which is difficult to police and because there is a long established custom of Southwestern States requiring their people to avail themselves of the services of a great many workers from Mexico in order to harvest their crops.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, Senator has answered that question. I am sure there are Senators, particularly those who come from border States, who might have had a wrong impression about the intent of the Senator's amendment. To bear out the contention of the distinguished Senator from Florida that protection has been written into Public Law 78 each time it was amended—as was also the case when it was originally enacted—I call attention, briefly, to paragraph 2 of section 503 of that act, which reads:

> The employment of such workers will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of domestic agricultural workers similarly employed.

I believe that buttons up what the Senator from Florida has said about his amendment, that it in no way affects Public Law 78 dealing with Mexican nationals, or braceros, as we call them, who come into this country. I thank the Senator for yielding to me. I hope his amendment will prevail.

Mr. COOPER rose.

Mr. HOLLAND. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Kentucky if he will be brief. I am speaking on limited time.

Mr. COOPER. I wish to present my amendment. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. HOLLAND. I have not concluded, but will conclude very quickly. I first ask unanimous consent to have included in the RECORD illustrations of the way the prevailing wage is figured in three different ways under the Department of Labor regulations, according to information given Florida growers by the Department of Labor.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Under the standardized procedures set forth by the Department of Labor, the findings of such wage surveys will be evaluated in accordance with definite rules and formula, as follows:

GENERAL RULES

1. If at least 40 percent of the workers surveyed are found to be paid a similar wage for similar work, this wage—or the wage received by the most workers, if more than one 40-percent group exists—will be designated as the official prevailing wage. Example: If 40 percent receive 60 cents per hour and 45 percent receive 70 cents per hour, the prevailing wage would be set at 70 cents per hour. However, if 45 percent receive 60 cents and only 40 percent receive 70 cents, the official prevailing wage would be 60 cents per hour. Also see examples A and B below.

2. If at least 40 percent of the workers surveyed do not receive a similar wage for similar work, the prevailing wage would be determined by beginning with the lowest wage rate and proceeding up the wage ladder until at least 51 percent of the workers surveyed are accounted for. The prevailing wage would, in this case, take the form of a wage range. See example C below.

3. If, by chance, 50 percent of the workers surveyed receive a similar wage and the other 50 percent of the workers receive a higher but a uniform wage for similar work, the higher wage rate would be set as the official prevailing wage. See example D below.

Example A

Wage rate	Number of workers surveyed	Percent of workers
75 cents per hour	11	10.3
70 cents per hour	36	33.6
65 cents per hour	3	2.8
60 cents per hour [1]	57	[1] 53.3
Total	107	100.0

[1] Official prevailing wage. See rule 1 above.

Example B

Wage rate	Number of workers surveyed	Percent of workers
13 cents per unit	32	14.8
12 cents per unit [1]	93	[1] 43.1
10 cents per unit	91	42.1
Total	216	100.0

[1] Official prevailing wage. See rule 1 above.

Example C

Wage rate	Number of workers surveyed	Percent of workers
$23 per unit [1]	24	[1] 24.7
$22 per unit [1]	15	[1] 15.5
$21 per unit [1]	16	[1] 16.5
$20 per unit	38	39.2
$19 per unit	4	4.1
Total	97	100.0

[1] Official prevailing wage range. See rule 2 above.

Example D

Wage rate	Number of workers surveyed	Percent of workers
2½ cents per unit [1]	320	[1] 50.0
2 cents per unit	320	50.0
Total	640	100.0

NOTE.—All of above examples were taken from actual findings of the Department of Labor in specific cases.

Mr. HOLLAND. The wage finding under example A would cause no protest. However, in example B, it is clear that the inclusion of but three workers in the 12-cent-per-unit group, out of a total of 216 workers, influenced the wage finding.

In example C, if only one of the four workers shown in the $19 per unit group had been working in the $20 per unit group, the prevailing wage rate would have been $20 under rule 1; however, rule 2 was applied because less than 40 percent of the workers were found in the $20 per unit group.

In example D, the Department of Labor's decision to use the higher wage figure is consistent with its policies to press wages upward whenever possible under whatever authority or means available.

It is obvious that the outcome of any wage surveys conducted in accordance with the foregoing procedures could be influenced by inadequate sampling by the person carrying out the survey.

Mr. President, there is an issue here that is far broader than the narrow question of the interpretation of a statute. It is an incontrovertible fact that when the Congress of the United States approved the Wagner-Peyser Act in 1933, there was not any remote intention of any supposition that a statute was being enacted to authorize regulation of wages or working conditions of farmworkers. The legislative history of the act discloses no single word indicating any intent that the act be so construed.

Executive interpretation of general language of an act to authorize doing what Congress did not intend be done is a practice inconsistent with constitutional intent and purpose and involving usurpation of a responsibility of the Congress.

I feel that the issue involved is not the motives behind or the reasonableness of the regulations issued by the Secretary of Labor. The basic issue is whether, within the framework of our constitutional form of government, it is for the Congress or for the executive branch to legislate in this important area of the law.

If such regulatory authority is to be exercised by the Federal Government, this should be done only after proper legislative process and affirmative action by the Congress.

Whatever anyone may believe the Congress should do in this connection, the inescapable fact is that the Congress has not done so; and until Congress chooses to do so by specific congressional enactment, it is a violation of sound governmental practice for an executive agency to proceed without such specific mandate.

My amendment would establish what, in my opinion, has always been the congressional intent, that the Wagner-Peyser Act is not to be construed to authorize the regulation of wages, hours, or perquisites provided farmworkers.

THE REGULATIONS

The regulations issued by the Secretary of Labor—and which he proposes to make effective in December—provide that any farmer who wishes to use the services of State or Federal employment offices must agree to, first, pay prevailing wages; second, meet specified housing standards; and third, pay transportation if this is the practice of other farmers.

The details of these regulations are not important. What is important is that if the Secretary of Labor has authority to issue regulations in this field, there is no discernible limitation on his authority, nor any restriction on what revisions can be issued at any time.

THE NEW WAGNER-PEYSER REGULATIONS REPRESENT EXECUTIVE USURPATION OF CONGRESSIONAL AUTHORITY

It is, I believe, axiomatic that executive agencies should administer laws in accord with the actual intent of Congress.

Otherwise, the agency is engaged in writing laws by executive order.

The agency is, in effect, exercising a legislative power. It is assuming a prerogative that is properly vested in Congress.

This procedure negates proper legislative process and circumvents constitutional intent.

The Department's action in this matter has been referred to in some quarters as enlightened. It is submitted, to the contrary, that executive action not founded on affirmative statutory enactment is the very opposite of enlightened.

FARMERS, AS ANY GROUP OF CITIZENS, HAVE A RIGHT TO PROPER LEGISLATIVE PROCESS AND TO AFFIRMATIVE ACTION BY THE CONGRESS, BEFORE ANY PROGRAM VITALLY AFFECTING THEIR INTERESTS IS INSTITUTED

One of the important bulwarks of freedom under our political system is that the lawmaking function is vested in Congress.

Here, where all parties may have their say before the proper forum, and the issues will be subject to free and open debate by the policymaking branch of the Federal Government, an issue will receive the kind of attention that citizens are entitled to as a matter of right.

This is the process dictated by prudence, wisdom, and experience. This process is in accord with the constitutional intent.

This is the only legitimate means for the initiation of a new venture in regulation.

This traditional and respected process is violated when a strained interpretation of an old statute, never intended by Congress to be so construed, is used by an executive agency to justify what it wants to do.

This is what the Department of Labor has done in promulgating regulations governing the farmer-worker relationship, based on an asserted authorization of a 27-year-old statute, never envisaged as so providing when enacted.

This action by the Department of Labor is a violation of a cardinal rule of sound government.

This represents the adoption of the cynical concept that the ends justify the means.

THE NEW WAGNER-PEYSER REGULATIONS INVOLVE EXCESSIVE DELEGATION OF BROAD DISCRETIONARY AUTHORITY TO INDIVIDUAL OFFICIALS

It is impossible to determine from a reading of the new farm labor regulations, what their actual significance may be in a particular set of circumstances or what a farmer is required to do to comply with their provisions.

No farmer could determine from the regulations what wages he is required to pay to which classes of workers, or what transportation he is required to provide to what workers from what origins—not until an official of the Department of Labor told him—and when he was told, that would be the law.

The regulations are replete with terms which as they stand are ambiguous—"prevailing," "area of employment," "area of supply," "not less favorable than those prevailing." These terms would continue to be ambiguous until applied in a particular set of circumstances by a subordinate official of the Department of Labor.

This is the kind of regulation that invites selective treatment of those regulated—liberal interpretation for those who "cooperate"—harsh interpretation for the "uncooperative."

This is a far cry from government by law—this is government by men.

The history of human freedom is the history of the substitution of government by law for government by men.

This is the underlying purpose of the Constitution; a basic concept of our political system.

PREVIOUSLY ISSUED REGULATIONS

It is argued that the current regulations are only minor revisions of previously issued regulations.

Any such prior regulations were not questioned because they were not publicized, distributed, administered, or enforced.

They may have been "promulgated," but the practical effect of their promulgation was nil.

No State or Federal agency apparently disseminated them to farmers or made the slightest effort to inform farmers concerning their existence.

Although advisory committees on farm labor to the Department of Labor have been in existence for many years, at no time were any such regulations or modifications thereof presented to, mailed to, discussed with, or otherwise made available to the members of such committees.

It came as a shock to such advisory committees to be informed in February 1959 of the existence of such prior regulations. Yet no one in agriculture would be more likely to be informed in this respect.

It should further be noted that the prior regulations were issued under the title "Cooperation of the U.S. Employment Service and States in Maintaining a National System of Public Employment Offices." This misleading title does not indicate that any requirements on farmers are established thereby.

From any practical point of view, the regulations issued in November 1959 should be considered as a new venture in regulatory action, not as an extension or crystallization of anything previously issued. In the court of common sense these are new regulations.

It is argued that the Secretary of Labor under the new regulations is not engaged in setting wages, but rather in finding prevailing standards and requiring compliance with such going wages as a conditional eligibility to receive services.

However, any determination of prevailing wages necessarily involves a substantial measure of wage fixing.

Thus, the Secretary of Labor has adopted the so-called 40–51 formula for the purpose of determining prevailing wages under the new regulations.

I have already discussed that dual formula and have placed in the RECORD three different interpretations of how it would act. Those interpretations came from the Secretary of Labor.

Without going into any great detail as to how this formula operates, it can be summarized by saying that the average wage paid becomes the minimum required to be paid. Thus all below the average must bring their wage up to the average. This creates a new and higher average in succeeding years. Thus the formula has an escalator effect.

If Congress should decide that this is what should be done—then it is within the prerogative of Congress to so decide. But this should not be decided by the Department of Labor when Congress has not specifically given the Department any authority to do this, but on the contrary has on numerous occasions affirmatively decided against Federal regulation of farm wages and working conditions.

THE UNDERLYING ISSUE

The basic issue is not whether the regulations are good or bad.

The basic issue is: Should laws be written by the Congress or should they be written by executive agencies.

To find, as the Department of Labor has found, that a 27-year-old statute contains some language that may be strained to authorize what they want to do, is not in keeping with our constitutional concepts, or in accord with the division of powers envisaged therein.

Each and every Member of this body should vigorously defend the prerogatives of Congress, whatever his ideas may be concerning the type of legislation to be enacted in this or any other field.

Executive agencies should administer laws as the Congress actually intended when the laws were enacted. When they depart from this function and engage in writing laws by the issuance of regulations, it becomes the duty, right, and responsibility of the Congress to clearly and unmistakably assert its prerogatives.

That is what we are endeavoring to do through this amendment.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment designated "A."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 24, between lines 5 and 6, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 11. Except as may otherwise be expressly provided by law, the Secretary of Labor shall have no power to regulate wages, hours, or other conditions of employment of employees employed in agriculture (as defined in sec. 3(f) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938) within the State in which such employees are recruited.

On page 24, line 7, strike out "SEC. 11" and insert "SEC. 12."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on the Cooper amendment to the Holland amendment there be 15 minutes for the proponents and 15 minutes for the opponents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Does the Senator from Kentucky wish to reserve some of his time?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 15 minutes?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. President, I intend to support many sections of the minimum wage bill which has been reported by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. In offering this amendment, I am not attacking the minimum wage bill reported by the committee.

In providing background for my amendment I remind the Senate that the Fair Labor Standards Act specifically exempts agricultural workers from its provisions. Nevertheless, I think it can be said that the Secretary of Labor, under the Wagner-Peyser Act, has claimed the power to refuse to provide agricultural workers through the Employment Service unless certain conditions such as wages, housing, and transportation are assured. This is done through the use of employment offices. The employment offices, of course, are used for all types of labor.

I will give a few examples. If in my State of Kentucky there should be a farm labor shortage in a certain area, the shortage would be referred to an employment office in the State of Kentucky. An effort would be made to secure workers in the State of Kentucky. If they could not be secured in Kentucky, the request would be referred to other States—for example, Indiana or Illinois. If laborers were found in Indiana or Illinois who could be sent to Kentucky, then the Secretary of Labor's exercise of power would enter into the situation in this way: Acting under the regulations promulgated by the Secretary, the employment office would not send agricultural workers from Illinois or Indiana into Kentucky unless the Employment Service in Kentucky determines that the workers would be paid the prevailing wage, either as it exists for Kentucky workers or as it exists for workers from Illinois or Indiana, and unless housing conditions and transportation conditions are acceptable.

So I think it must be said that, although it is argued by the Secretary of Labor that he is not fixing wages or hours, that he is using the Employment Services only to provide workers from another State, actually he will not refer workers unless they are paid a certain wage and unless they have certain working conditions which he has prescribed.

I have no objection and do not oppose these workers receiving good wages and having acceptable living conditions. The principle and purpose are good. But the problem is the extent of his power to so act. The Fair Labor Standards Act provides that these workers are exempted; and unless we accept the theory that the Secretary of Labor has power, under the Employment Service, to issue rules and regulations, superseding the Fair Labors Standards Act, there is doubt about his legal right to do so.

And the facts show that regulations are continually being extended. The Secretary of Labor has made speeches in which he has said he wants to establish minimum wages and hours of work for agricultural workers.

The farmers in my State are worried that unless this rulemaking power is limited, not only will he gradually extend the power over wages, through rulemaking, to agricultural workers who travel from one State to another, but that he will also try to fix the wages of such workers within a State. In fact, by means of the last regulations he issued, he did fix wages, by indirection, and working conditions for agricultural laborers recruited and used within a State. So we must face this question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I should like to have some clarification. Is it the view of the Senator that the Secretary has expressed the opinion that he has authority to withhold the services of the employment offices in recruiting interstate labor, and that he has used, as the standard, in connection with the prevailing wage, the State of recruitment, not the State of employment?

Mr. COOPER. Yes; it is my understanding that although the old regulations set the prevailing wage scale in the labor-shortage area, it is now extended also to the level in the area from which they came.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I would direct the attention of the Senator to page 16374 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Saturday, where I included the language of the regulations. I see nothing there that says anything more than that where there is interstate recruitment, the workers' wage must be at the prevailing level in the State where he is brought, from another State.

Mr. COOPER. I shall answer that. However, I have only 15 minutes. After I complete my statement, I shall be glad to yield.

This is the new regulation:

No order for recruitment of domestic agricultural workers shall be placed into interstate clearance unless there are assurances from the State agency that:

(c) The State agency has ascertained that wages offered are not less than the wages prevailing in the area of employment among similarly employed domestic agricultural workers recruited within the State and not less than those prevailing in the area of employment among similarly employed domestic agricultural workers recruited outside the State.

So the Senator is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. So it is the area of employment. In other words, it is the Kentucky standard, when the workers are brought to Kentucky; and it is the Illinois standard, when the workers are taken from Kentucky to Illinois.

Mr. COOPER. That is correct. While my amendment would prohibit the Secretary of Labor from issuing rules with reference to farm labor in intrastate, a human problem is involved regarding migratory labor; and my amendment goes to that issue.

As I have said, I know that farmers in Kentucky and other States are concerned that unless this is stopped, the Secretary of Labor will finally use this power to fix wages for agricultural workers who work in the State in which they live and are recruited within that State. This is the issue which really worries farmers. And my amendment would meet this issue by denying the Secretary such power. But there is another issue—the human problem of those who live in Kentucky and travel to Illinois or Indiana to get jobs or come from those States to Kentucky. This is the problem of migratory transient workers, about whom we read so much, who travel about the country to find work. There is the danger that unless the Secretary is granted some authority, with respect to the transient workers or the migrant workers, they may be exploited. Unfortunately, many of them have been exploited in the past, as we know so well.

The problem of migratory workers is a subject now being studied by the Committee on Labor under the leadership of the Senator from New Jersey.

If the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida is limited by my amendment to prohibit the Secretary from fixing wages or working conditions for workers recruited within a State and working in the same State—intrastate—it would prohibit the Secretary of Labor from trying to fix farm wages generally if any Secretary has such a purpose. This being done, the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare could go forward with its studies as to how to handle, properly and legally, the transient workers; and if the Secretary of Labor does not now have certain and proper authority to provide proper wage and housing standards for migratory workers, the committee could write legislation to give him reasonable power to protect their wages and living conditions as they travel from State to State. This is a humane problem but it must be handled properly by the Congress.

So today I ask for the adoption of my amendment which would protect farmers from wage-fixing by the Secretary of Labor when they employ workers from their own State, who know prevailing local rates, and yet at the same time would provide protection to tenant farmers and laborers who must travel from State to State, who may not know prevailing rates in other States, and who in the past have been exploited in many cases.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Do I correctly understand that the Senator's amendment would apply only to intrastate agricultural workers? Then, by omission, would it still recognize the authority of the Secretary of Labor to establish wage rates in interstate farming operations?

Mr. COOPER. That would be its practical effect. It would prohibit the Secretary of Labor from attempting to fix, by the promulgation of rules, wages, and hours and working conditions of agricultural workers employed within their own State. The Secretary of Labor has issued regulations dealing with transient agricultural workers or migratory agricultural workers.

My amendment would leave those regulations in force and would protect those transient workers, until reviewed properly by the Congress.

Then, if we are not satisfied with those regulations, the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare can write legislation to properly state the power of the Secretary of Labor in those fields.

The amendment of the Senator from Florida would strike down all the regulations; and then there would be no regulation of any kind; and perhaps thousands of these poor people and their families, who go from State to State, would be placed at the mercy of what I hope are only a few in this country—but a few bad employers might exploit them.

If my amendment is adopted by the Senate we can protect the farmers within our States from regulation by the Secretary of Labor, and for the time being we can protect the migratory workers until the Committee on Labor or the Committee on Agriculture can address itself to the problem.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield for one more question?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not find fault with the Senator's idea. I merely am trying to explore its ramifications.

Has the Senator thought of a situation in which the employment offices in Kentucky were not able to meet the demands from intrastate sources, and would have to look for interstate sources?

Mr. COOPER. Yes, we have that situation in western Kentucky in the former commercial corn area, and in the case of some of our vegetable and fruit crops.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Secretary would, in effect, then be able to establish wage rates in Kentucky when a situation existed that the local offices could not supply the demand, if the amendment were adopted?

Mr. COOPER. The Secretary could say he will not refer any labor there unless Kentucky agrees to meet these conditions. But the farmer is not prohibited from asking workers to come in any way he can.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Outside the office.

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KUCHEL. With consent for an additional half hour on this amendment, do I understand correctly that we will proceed to vote on this amendment, and then at half past 4 vote on the Holland amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may I be heard on the parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Since some Senators were here when the original agreement was made, and it was not anticipated the opponents would not use all the time on the amendment of the Senator from Florida, I suggest that we not have the vote on the Cooper amendment until 4 o'clock, and then follow it up with a vote on the Holland amendment, so some Senators will not be caught off guard.

Mr. HOLLAND. I understood the Senate gave unanimous consent for 30 minutes in addition to the 2 hours, so the vote would not come up until 4:30.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. I just wanted to have the two votes come together when the time is exhausted.

Mr. HOLLAND. I am agreeable to that, but not to the contracting of the time from 2½ to 2 hours.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is not within the Senator's control. It is up to us. If we want to yield back time, we can.

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes, but there has been 15 minutes used on the new unanimous-consent agreement, so it certainly could not come at 4 o'clock. I want to be agreeable. It seems to me 4:30 would be the time to vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That would be so if all the time were used. If the opponents used only 30 minutes of their 1 hour, the vote would come at 4 o'clock.

Mr. HOLLAND. I ask the Senate's indulgence, but, in the first place, I have not quite used my whole hour. The Senator from Kentucky began at 5 minutes of 3. I have a very limited time left.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thought the Senator had used all of his time.

Mr. HOLLAND. No; I think that is not correct.

May I inquire of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has 4 minutes remaining.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, may I ask the majority leader, in the event another amendment were offered, would it be the Senator's feeling that another half hour should be allowed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Let us see what it is.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the majority leader yield time to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I was going to suggest that he yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Kentucky. Inquiry had started, and he used up his time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, does the Senator from Kentucky care to have an additional 5 minutes so he can answer inquiries?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 5 minutes, out of the 15 minutes, to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the Senator has stated he knows of no legal authority for the exercise by the Secretary of Labor of any power in this field. Is that correct?

Mr. COOPER. That is my judgment. It has not been a settled fact. The Attorney General has said he does have power, but, in my opinion, it has been a very weak opinion. I do not think he has power.

Mr. HOLLAND. Under the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, if it is offered as a substitute, has the Senator from Kentucky given thought to the possibility there might be a set of conditions under which Kentucky farm labor would be working for lower wages than Illinois, Indiana, or Tennessee farm labor who would be recruited across the State line?

Mr. COOPER. No; I do not think that is correct, because the regulations of the Secretary of Labor are that if labor comes across State lines, it shall be paid the prevailing wage of the area. So I do not see any problem there at all.

Mr. HOLLAND. The committee which would handle this matter is not the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, but the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, of which the able Senator from New Jersey is a member. In his chairmanship of the subcommittee, he has been conducting, as I understand, certain very fine investigations in this field. It would not be the Agriculture and Forestry Committee that would handle the matter.

Mr. COOPER. The chairman of the committee understands the problem.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I am a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, to whom the matter has been referred, and we have been considering problems throughout the country, including the State so ably represented by the Senator from Florida, where conditions are considerably better than they are in other parts of the country. The problems are not as acute there as they are in many of the other States. We in the Labor and Public Welfare Committee would consider the matter.

Mr. COOPER. The problems are the same, whether they are to be considered by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry or the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I am not clear on the question of time. Does the Senator from Florida have control of the opposition time on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has yielded 5 minutes to the Senator from Kentucky out of the 15 minutes, in order that the Senator from Kentucky might answer questions.

Mr. HOLLAND. My parliamentary question is, Do I not have control of the time in opposition to the amendment offered by my distinguished friend, the Senator from Kentucky, since it is offered as a substitute to my amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Parliamentarian informs the Chair that, under the circumstances, the majority leader has control of the time. However, if he wishes to do so, he can yield time to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky wish to yield to the Senator from New York? He still has time remaining.

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I would be opposed to all these amendments, including the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, so I did not wish to intrude on the time of the Senator from Kentucky, whose friendship I value so highly, and whom I would rather be for than against. However, I merely wish to say I serve on the subcommittee headed by the Senator from New Jersey, and I do not believe the argument should be pitched on the humanitarian desirability of what is involved, though I know it is true. I do not think it would be germane to this particular issue. I think the opinion of the Attorney General is very strong, if I may refer to it. The Senate Committee on Education and Labor pointed out that, under the Wagner-Peyser Act, the Secretary of Labor is authorized to promulgate rules, regulations, and standards of efficiency necessary to carry out the provisions of that act, to wit, the Wagner-Peyser Act. That is a very strong statement as to the implementation of that act, notwithstanding the quotation comes out of the report of the Committee on Education and Labor on amendment of the Wagner-Peyser Act in the 79th Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I yield such time as the Senator needs.

Mr. JAVITS. I shall require only a minute.

When one refers to the Attorney General's opinion, one finds it says, "The regulations you have in mind cannot be said to be in themselves unreasonable as imposing undue or arbitrary burdens upon employers who desire to obtain farm laborers through the interstate system of recruitment."

It seems to me that is as strong a statement as any court would make in a case in which the regulation power of a particular public official was called to question. The court would not strike it down. That is as strong language as one could get in any legal opinion which would sustain the rulemaking power of a public official, the Secretary of Labor, as being properly exercised. I think, therefore, that the opinion of the Attorney General, with which I find myself as a lawyer in complete accord, is an answer to this question. We should not in this ex parte way, upon a minimum wage bill, strip the Secretary of Labor of that authority.

I thank my colleague for yielding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield himself any additional time?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. President, I wish to refer to the substitute offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] and to express my opposition to the substitute. However, I certainly wish to express my gratitude for the understanding and the sympathy the Senator has shown and expressed for the migrant farmworkers.

As I understand the Senator, it is his feeling that for the time being the present regulations on interstate recruitment should obtain until the committees which substantively consider these aspects of the legislation shall have considered them fully and shall have brought their conclusions to the Senate. Is that a correct understanding?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. With respect to the substitute, it seems to me, it should be opposed mainly because it is not needed. It is not needed because the regulations which the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] is seeking to strike down deal not with the situation within the State of recruitment but deal instead only with respect to interstate recruitment.

I should like to refer to the regulations we are considering, and the opening paragraph:

> No order for recruitment of domestic agricultural workers shall be placed into interstate clearance unless there are assurances from the State agency that—

The "that" refers to the conditions within the State where the worker will be brought for employment. It does not seek to say to the State of Kentucky, "Before the bureau can be used for the employment of Kentuckians certain conditions must obtain." It says to the local offices in the State of Kentucky, "If you recruit workers from any of the other States, then those workers brought into Kentucky must be paid the prevailing wage rate within Kentucky."

I wish to be sure that we know what we are thinking about in terms of the worker, of the prevailing wage, and of the atmosphere in which the workers are recruited and employed. It is true that the agricultural worker is not included under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. KUCHEL. Why not?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. We all know why. At the time of the enactment of the amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act it was felt that the minimum hourly wage should not be applied to an industry as complex as agriculture, since much of the work was piecework. Most of it still is.

These regulations do not create and fix a minimum hourly wage. All they say is that if the beanpicker in the San Joaquin Valley, who lives in California and works in California, is making wages at the rate of 50 cents an hour, his wages should not be destroyed or undermined by the employment agency, by the agency recruiting workers from Texas and allowing them to be paid at the rate of 40 cents an hour or at a return of 40 cents an hour for picking the same beans which the Californian was getting 50 cents an hour for picking, but for which he probably would not get 50 cents an hour if the regulations did not obtain.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will my friend yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I am happy to yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. As I listened to the Senator from Kentucky explain his amendment, it appeared to me that what my friend from New Jersey says dovetails what the Senator from Kentucky recommends. In other words, it appears to me that the responsibility of the Secretary of Labor would operate on that interstate employment, and to that extent would come into the San Joaquin Valley with outside American employees who would be paid the same as what the San Joaquin Valley man was being paid.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. That is the point. It would protect the domestic worker as well as give the interstate worker the prevailing wage. We all know that in many areas the wage is far from adequate, and far less than any minimum wage as provided under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. KUCHEL. Then I do not understand upon what basis my friend from New Jersey attacks the recommendation of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I attack it because it is unneeded. It is not needed because the Secretary of Labor has no regulations, either directly or indirectly, saying anything to the California growers or to the California domestic workers. That is not being done.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from South Dakota has been reading both amendments and has been trying to determine exactly what is the difference between them. I am going to state it as I understand it, and I should like to have the Senator correct me if I am incorrect in my understanding.

The Holland amendment would prevent the Secretary of Labor from making any regulations unless there is a specific law to that effect with respect to employees in agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LUSK in the chair). The time of the Senator from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 more minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey has only 4 minutes remaining on the Cooper substitute.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I yield myself the 4 minutes remaining on the Cooper substitute.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Cooper amendment would carry over the Holland amendment but make the exception that if the employee is recruited across a State line then the Secretary can do something about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. That is my understanding of the effect and of the thrust of the amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Certainly the principle of the Cooper amendment takes into consideration a very different set of circumstances and indicates a much more equitable disposition toward the problem than does the original amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Exactly.

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator went to great pains to point out that he is not opposing the amendment on substantive grounds, but he simply does not think it is really needed because no one is trying to exercise this power.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. My friend is exactly correct.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. The farmers feel it is needed. If under the Wagner-Peyser Act there should be an attempt to use section 12 to justify the issuance of rules and regulations, the power would not be limited only to interstate movements of labor, but the power would be applicable also to intrastate movements of labor, if there is in fact statutory, legal power. The Secretary could take the position, "I have the power to issue rules and regulations regarding intrastate recruitment of labor."

My amendment would prevent that. It does have a purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. The Senator is locking the door before the horse is stolen, but there is no horse.

Mr. COOPER. I disagree with the Senator. Every regulation the Secretary issues goes a little further and moves in the direction of fuller control over farm labor. The present Secretary of Labor is an outstanding Secretary of Labor, a great servant of our country—but he should not deal with agriculture desires.

The Secretary of Labor, in a recent speech, said:

> I am convinced that agricultural workers must be given the protection of minimum wage and maximum hours legislation.

Later he said it could be partly accomplished by "development of additional standards governing employment conditions and recruitment efforts."

I do not want to be unfair to the Secretary, or quote his speeches out of context. He probably has no intention of extending these rules to intrastate farm labor, but some Secretary in the future may try to do so.

My amendment would lock the door on fixing wages for intrastate farm labor, but it would give protection to the migratory worker.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, those of us who have worked so closely with the problem during the last year are grateful indeed for that suggestion. Both the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and I have had the honor of serving on the committee and have seen conditions at firsthand.

Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. May we have a statement of the situation with respect to time remaining on the Holland amendment?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, may I ask a question with respect to the Cooper amendment? The Senator from Florida may have been misinformed. His understanding was that since the Cooper amendment was offered as a substitute for the so-called Holland amendment, the Senator from Florida should be granted time to reply to the argument of his friend, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER]. He attempted to get some such time, but in the absence of the majority leader, who was engaged elsewhere, he was unable to obtain time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Senator will yield, I shall obtain the necessary time for him in a moment. I shall yield to the Senator from Florida such time as he desires to reply.

Mr. HOLLAND. I suggest that I have 15 minutes, which was the time devoted to the presentation of the Cooper amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that 15 minutes be granted to the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MORSE. I was not on the floor when the time limitation was agreed to. I have no objection to the time limitation. I am now only seeking to protect my own rights. Does the Senator from Florida, under the arrangement made by the majority leader, now have the right to use all the remaining time against the Cooper amendment, or is there some time left beyond the 15 minutes allotted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We have some time remaining on the Holland amendment, but the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] offered an amendment to the Holland amendment and used the time of the proponents. Normally the opponent, the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] would use the other 15 minutes. Some of that time was used by members of the committee. I believe the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] is entitled to 15 minutes now, and if the Senator from Oregon wishes some time, I will make a request that he be granted time when the Senator from Florida concludes, or I shall yield him some of the time of the committee.

Mr. MORSE. I wish 3 minutes to speak in opposition to the Cooper amendment.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I think I can see the motives that animate the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER]. I appreciate them. He does not want the Federal Government, represented by the Secretary of Labor, to reach within the confines of the State of Kentucky and to say to farmers what they should pay their labor, or to labor what it should receive from farmers.

I do not know whether there is any record of that happening at all. That is a completely different situation from that which is sought to be handled by the original amendment. I would have no objection to it if it were not offered as a substitute for the original amendment. But in offering his amendment as a substitute for the original amendment, the Senator from Kentucky has stated two points that I would regard as not completely consistent with that position. One point is that he sees no legal basis at all for the attitude of the Secretary of Labor; the other that he expects to support the Holland amendment.

The effect of the adoption of the Cooper amendment would be to wipe out the so-called Holland amendment because it is a substitute, and would completely replace it and not leave in the pending amendment anything affecting the problem which we are seeking to affect, and that is the effort of the Secretary of Labor, without legal authority therefor, to impose conditions of housing, of transportation, and of wage-fixing over the procurement of any labor from outside a State for agriculturalists within a State.

We remind the Senate that the Appropriations Committee in the fiscal year that elapsed on the first of July felt so keenly on this subject as to include in its report a provision that none of the appropriation for 1960 could be used for the implementation of this effort on the part of the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. I have just read the text of the Senator's amendment as it is now at the desk. It covers wages and hours of employment. That is all. Do I correctly understand that the Secretary of Labor has promulgated rules and regulations on subjects other than wages and hours, but that the Senator by his amendment seeks to eliminate regulations in those two categories alone? Is that what the amendment seeks to accomplish?

Mr. HOLLAND. It was my intention in offering the amendment that it cover "other conditions of employment" as well. I shall seek to clarify this point later. Now, what was the other question of the Senator from California?

Mr. KUCHEL. The Senator from Florida in his amendment seeks to restrict the operation of his amendment to wages and hours of employment. Is it true that the Secretary of Labor has promulgated rules and regulations in other fields besides wages and hours of employment?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Secretary of Labor has endeavored to promulgate rulings affecting housing, and also transportation conditions.

Mr. KUCHEL. Those rulings would remain in effect then; is that correct? Is that the effect of the amendment?

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes, as it is now worded. However, the Senator from Florida is preparing a clarifying addition to the amendment.

The Senator from Florida understands that specific authority is given in all but the Wagner-Peyser Act.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from South Dakota has read the amendment at the desk, and he notes that the Cooper amendment contains the additional words "or other conditions of employment."

Is it not correct that the Cooper amendment goes further than the Holland amendment in that the Cooper amendment deals with conditions of employment other than wages and hours?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Cooper amendment does affect wages and hours "or other conditions of employment."

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. "Or other conditions of employment" would refer to housing, transportation, and other related subjects of that sort?

Mr. HOLLAND. As now worded, the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida covers only wages and hours of employment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I address the same question, if I may, to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. Those words were included in my amendment because the regulations of the Secretary of Labor refer not alone to wages and hours, but also to transportation and housing.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. What the Senator from Kentucky desires to do is to restrict the Secretary of Labor from prescribing other conditions of employment within the State where the worker is recruited.

Mr. COOPER. Intrastate; yes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It seems to me that there is a purpose to be served by the Cooper amendment which is not covered by the Holland amendment. I would also agree that there would be no great conflict if both amendments were adopted, provided one were not a substitute for the other.

Mr. HOLLAND. In recopying my amendment, the scrivener left out the words "or other conditions of employment," which were contained in the original text. I ask that my amendment be modified at this time so that the original language of it may be restored.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Reserving the right to object, what the Senator from Florida is now seeking to do is that, in addition to having his amendment apply to wages and hours, it shall apply also to other conditions of employment. Is that correct?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is correct. I have a right to modify my amendment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I recognize that fact.

Mr. HOLLAND. The scrivener, in recopying the amendment, left out "other conditions of employment." I have asked that my amendment be modified as I have requested, to include the words "or other conditions of employment." They were included in the original language.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. Then the colloquy I had with the Senator from Florida a few moments ago is now eliminated. Is that correct?

Mr. HOLLAND. It is. The questions of the Senator from California related to the amendment without the words "other conditions of employment" which were erroneously omitted, but which have now been restored.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. If the Senator from Florida will yield further, as I understand, the only issue presented now, on the offering of the Cooper amendment as a substitute for the Holland amendment, is whether a period is placed after the word "agriculture," or whether an additional clause, offered by the Senator from Kentucky is to be added, which states that the Secretary of Labor might exercise regulations with respect to labor which is recruited across State lines. The Holland amendment is an absolute bar against the Secretary of Labor issuing regulations, unless they are specifically provided by law with respect to wages, hours, or other conditions of employment in agriculture.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from Kentucky proposes to add a clause which would state that the Secretary of Labor could issue such regulations with respect to labor that was recruited across State lines. Is that correct?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is correct; except that the Senator from Kentucky is offering his amendment as a substitute, and therefore covers intrastate operations. That is why I object to it. I would hope that the Senator from Kentucky would succeed in the adoption of his amendment as a separate amendment, but not as a substitute to the amendment which I have offered, and which does inhibit the Secretary of Labor from operating in the field of intrastate procurement of agricultural labor, and to fix wages, hours, and other conditions of employment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. If the amendment of the Senator from Florida were adopted, there would be no occasion for having the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky adopted. The Senator from Florida offers an amendment which simply states that the Secretary of Agriculture shall not exercise anything by regulation in these fields, unless it is provided by law, where it applies to agriculture. If that absolute bar is enacted, then I see no reason for the exception which the Senator from Kentucky proposes.

Mr. HOLLAND. The only difference is that the amendment I have offered would prevent such regulations as to interstate operations while the substitute of the Senator from Kentucky would only prevent them as to intrastate operations.

I understand I have only a minute or so left. Without hostility to the Cooper amendment, if it is offered separately, I certainly protest its adoption as a substitute for my amendment. I hope, if it continues to be presented as a substitute, it will be defeated, and I hope that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, has all time for debate on the Cooper amendment been consumed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana who wishes to place some material in the RECORD.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, a letter dated April 8, 1959, addressed to the Honorable James Paul Mitchell, Secretary of Labor, on the questions at issue; his answer to me on May 8, 1959; and an opinion rendered by Wilfred C. Gilbert, Chief of the American Law Division of the Library of Congress, Legislative Reference Service, dated March 12, 1959.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 8, 1959.

Hon. JAMES PAUL MITCHELL,
Secretary of Labor,
Department of Labor,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I understand that you have requested recommendations in connection with the "Specifications for proposed amendments to part 602 of the Code of Federal Regulations, title 20", issued by the Bureau of Employment Security, and dated March 13, 1959.

The proposed amendments, which would provide for rather comprehensive regulation of housing, transportation, wages and other matters in connection with farm labor, would be imposed as a condition upon the interstate recruitment of farm labor through the U.S. Employment Service. The Wagner-Peyser Act, which created the Employment Service, contains no provision with respect to housing, transportation, or wage regulation; nor is there anything in it or in its legislative history suggesting that any such regulation was contemplated. If the proposed regulations were to be issued, therefore, the Department would be acting without any approval or guidance from Congress concerning the important and difficult policy questions involved.

The problems of agricultural labor, and in particular migratory farm labor, have received consideration by Congress for many years. The National Labor Relations Act and the Fair Labor Standards Act provide specific exemptions with respect to agricultural labor. In February and March 1952, 11 days of hearings were devoted to the problems of migratory labor by the Subcommittee on Labor and Labor-Management Relations of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare of the Senate. At that time, the Acting Secretary of Labor testified at page 52 concerning recommendations of the President's Commission on Migratory Labor as follows:

"There are a number of recommendations (V(4)(b), V(7), VIII (1)(a), (2), and (3)), which seek to secure compliance with standards relative to housing, transportation, and sanitary facilities, by administrative action of the Employment Service. While we sympathize with the objectives sought by the Commission in making these recommendations, we are of the opinion that attempting to attain them through administrative action will place an unbearable burden on the U.S. Employment Service and would simply result in no one turning to the public employment service for assistance. Labor would be obtained by other means without any improvement in standards, in our opinion, as a result. At the present time only 30 percent of labor needs in agriculture are filled through the public employment services, and our purpose is to increase that percentage rather than risk reducing it.

Following these hearings, the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare reported out S. 3300 accompanied by Senate Report No. 1686, which discussed various other investigations by Congress and others pertaining to this problem. S. 3300, which would have created a Federal Committee on Migratory Labor, was not passed by the Senate.

In view of the complete absence of any congressional direction and the testimony of your Department in 1952 that such regulations would place an unbearable burden on the U.S. Employment Service, I believe the proposed regulations would not constitute an appropriate exercise of your authority under the Wagner-Peyser Act.

However, conceding for the purposes of this discussion only that the Department of Labor has authority to issue regulations under the Wagner-Peyser Act, the regulations proposed by you, referred to above, are beyond the scope of this authority, are contrary to Federal public policy, and are potently arbitrary and capricious.

As I understand the proposed regulations, they would compel employers, as a condition precedent to the use of U.S. Employment Service in interstate recruitment to do, among other things, the following:

1. Provide minimum housing in conformity with "standards developed by the President's Committee on Migratory Labor" in the case of families (602.0(e));

2. Provide transportation arrangements for agricultural workers "not less favorable than the transportation arrangements generally provided by other employers who have successfully recruited out-of-State workers * * *" (602.9(f));

3. Pay a wage rate "not less than the prevailing wage rate paid in the area to domestic agricultural similarly employed * * *" (602.9(g)); and

4. Comply "with nondiscriminatory practices established by law or public policy" and, further, "not establish unreasonable job restrictions or working conditions which would have the effect of excluding qualified local workers for reasons unrelated to job performance * * *" (602.9(h)).

Discussing these requirements in the order enumerated, they are in my judgment, imprudent, unwise, and otherwise untenable, for the following reasons:

Housing standards: This regulation incorporates by reference certain recommendations offered by the President's Committee on Migratory Labor.

In addition to attempting to enforce the application of these recommendations by utilizing a congressional grant of authority which antedates said recommendations, the proposed regulations, particularly insofar as they incorporate these recommendations, do not appear to be based upon any demonstrated need, or practicality.

For example, the following standards would be required to be met in connection with the construction of housing for farm workers obtained through the U.S. Employment Service:

"Wooden floors shall be of planed tongue and groove lumber and in buildings without a cellar or basement shall be elevated not less than 18 inches above ground level to permit free circulation of air. The air space below the floor shall be properly screened and shall not be used for storage purposes."

I was reared in south Louisiana, and while the great majority of homes in that area are raised off the ground, I know of few, if any, which boast of a screened air space below the floor. In addition, just recently I had occasion to notice some Army-built enlisted men's housing on the military reservation at Fort George G. Meade, Md. These dwellings, although raised more than 18 inches from ground level, do not have the "air space below the floor" screened. It seems unconscionable, to me, that your department should require employers of temporary, migratory labor to meet standards which another agency of our Government does not regard as necessary in connection with the housing of military personnel and their dependents.

I wish to emphasize that my objections are not confined to this particular portion of the proposed housing regulation. On the contrary, I have used it merely as an example of the faults which pervade the tenor of the entire proposal.

I also wish to emphasize that I neither endorse nor condone in any case, housing of migratory workers in dwellings not adapted to good sanitation and to the geographic area where they might be located. However, it strikes me that any attempt to cure an evil of this nature by the blanket promulgation of such "shotgun" regulations as those at hand—regulations vague in terminology and unreasonable in scope—is an inappropriate exercise of whatever regulatory discretion the Secretary may have been granted by the Congress in connection with the operation of the U.S. Employment Service.

Transportation arrangements: Again, the terminology of this section is unreasonably broad and indefinite. This section of the regulation would apparently vest some unnamed official with authority to fix transportation minimums at almost any level he might see fit. Such arrangements would have to be at least as favorable as those provided by other employers who have recruited out-of-State workers. This raises the interesting possibility of a day-to-day, or month-to-month, or year-to-year increase in the scope and cost of such arrangements. As soon as a sufficient number of employers—and the requisite number is not stated—raised the scope of such arrangements above what might have previously been found to be a minimum level, those new arrangements would, in turn, become the minimum—and so on, ad infinitum.

Further, there is no limitation on such minimum arrangements by area; according to this regulation, transportation arrangements determined to be generally provided by employers of farm labor in California, could apparently be imposed as a minimum to be met by employers in Louisiana, for instance.

Wages: This section is a barefaced attempt to impose and enforce a minimum agricultural wage despite, consistent congressional rejection of this concept, and, further, specific congressional exemption of agricultural workers from the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act. Further, this section carries with it the authority to determine what might be the prevailing wage in an area. If the Department of Labor diligently endeavored to interpret this authority broadly, it could conceivably achieve the result obtained under the Walsh-Healey Act, when locality, as used therein for purposes of determining a prevailing wage, was found to embrace, on occasion, the entire United States. If the Department were able to stretch locality to embrace the entire United States, then American agriculture might well begin to quake in its boots at the prospect of what scope the word "area" might be given.

I urge the Department to remember that the Congress has not adhered to its policy of exempting farm workers from Fair Labor Standards Act coverage merely as a legislative exercise. I personally believe that the Department would be making a grave error in judgment to attempt to thwart congressional intent and reverse congressional will by the route chosen in this regulation. If the position taken by the Congress on this matter is to be reversed, then I urge the Department to permit the Congress, acting on its own motion, to do so, instead of attempting to achieve the same end by the abuse of any discretion the Congress may have accorded under the Wagner-Peyser Act.

Nondiscrimination requirements: Again, the standard imposed in this area is unconscionably broad. It is impossible for an employer to determine specifically what might be embraced within the phrase "nondiscriminatory practices established by law or public policy."

For my own part, I suspect that the Department may be attempting to impose a form of agricultural fair employment practices program upon employers of farm labor, something which the Congress has repeatedly refused to do in this or other fields. In addition, there may well be a multitude of other similar restrictions inherent in the requirement.

Furthermore, it is obvious that this regulation, as is the case with others discussed earlier, will require the promulgation of "subregulations" or perhaps Department rulings, further explaining and defining the proposed conditions which must be observed as a condition precedent to the use of the U.S. Employment Service. What these may be, or what standards they may pretend to follow, is not clear. If ever a vague subdelegation of delegated power were attempted, it is found herein.

In summary, let me point out that, first, I believe the legislative history of the Wagner-Peyser Act, plus subsequent events since the enactment thereof, all demonstrate that Congress never intended any grant of authority to promulgate regulations in connection with the maintenance of the U.S. Employment Service to extend to the lengths sought in the proposed regulation, and, further, even if that authority should be regarded as vesting the Department with power to impose conditions on the use by private employers of the Service, the conditions outlined (either directly or by inference), in the proposed regulations under discussion, are vague, unreasonable, arbitrary, and capricious.

I urge you to withdraw these proposals, and, in the event you personally, or others in your Department, believe similar regulations may be necessary, that you leave the matter up to the Congress, whose responsibility in this area is and should remain paramount.

Sincerely yours,

ALLEN J. ELLENDER,
U.S. Senator.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 8, 1959.

Hon. ALLEN J. ELLENDER,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR ELLENDER: This is in response to your letter of April 8, concerning the proposed issuance by the Department of Labor of certain regulations relative to the interstate recruitment of farmworkers through the public employment services.

The proposed amendments to which you refer in your letter are in tentative form and relate to the responsibility of the Department of Labor, under the Wagner-Peyser Act, for maintaining a system of clearing labor between the States.

The question of authority for issuing such regulations has of course been considered and we believe that there is adequate legal authority.

I have noted the reference in your letter to the testimony of the Acting Secretary of Labor in 1952 concerning recommendations of the President's Commission on Migratory Labor. There is a growing awareness and concern in many quarters that underemployment of farmworkers is widespread, even growing in some regions, while at the same time large-scale use of foreign contract workers is considered necessary in other regions. This apparent anomaly, numerous specific complaints, and my own independent inquiries, have made it clear that the farm labor situation has changed sufficiently to warrant a change in the Department's position.

The objective underlying our tentative proposal is to enable the public employment offices to perform a more effective job in the interstate recruitment of the many underemployed farmworkers. To provide full consideration of the views of interested agencies and persons, we are in the process of consulting with all the State employment security agencies, with our several advisory committees concerned with the farm labor service, and others.

I assure you that before any modification of existing regulations is adopted, full consideration will be given to the views of all interested parties and such modifications will be within the bounds of the authority conferred by law upon the Department of Labor.

The proposed housing standards to which you refer are those recommended by the President's Committee on Migratory Labor for family groups and those accepted by employers of Mexican nationals for single workers. We believe that these standards, reasonably applied, represent the minimum that should be sought for our citizen farmworkers. Again, however, we expect to take full advantage of the valuable advice being received on issues such as this before making our decision on the precise nature of any amendment to existing regulations.

In regard to transportation, many of our qualified unemployed agricultural workers lack the means to travel from their places of residence to areas where agricultural employment can be found. To utilize available qualified domestic workers, and particularly to assure that they have an opportunity for employment where there are serious shortages of domestic workers, we believe it is reasonable to request employers to provide transportation arrangements in keeping with the practices of other employers who have successfully recruited and retained domestic workers. Your implied suggestion that this proposed amendment needs spelling out in order to make clear how the obligation is limited as to distance and cumulative increase in costs is one to which we will give special attention.

Further, to carry out our responsibility to see that the employment of foreign workers does not adversely affect our citizen workers similarly employed, and in carrying out our agreement with Mexico, the Department has long been engaged in determining what wages actually prevail in farm areas. The first step in our prevailing wage program is to establish crop wage areas. These areas are generally composed of a county or counties, and occasionally, parts of counties. The State employment security agencies obtain information directly from workers and employers within a crop wage area to determine wages being paid. These surveys are conducted under uniform procedures developed by the Department. The wage determination is then based upon a formula which has been aproved by our grower advisory committee. No attempt is being made by the Department to set minimum wages for agriculture by the proposed regulations.

The nondiscrimination requirements in the proposed amendments are those presently being carried out by the State employment services. The individual State employment services, I am sure, are in a position to identify the nondiscriminatory practices established by law or public policy.

We have considered that the proposed regulations, far from being a new departure in the Federal-State employment service system, represent moderate extension of present regulations contained in the Code of Federal Regulations. Your detailed and thoughtful comments on these issues are nevertheless of considerable interest and concern to me. I assure you that before any modification of existing regulations is adopted, full consideration will be given to the views of all interested parties and such modifications will be within the bounds of the authority conferred by law upon the Department of Labor.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES P. MITCHELL,
Secretary of Labor.

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE,
March 12, 1959.

Hon. JOSEPH M. MONTOYA,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MONTOYA: You have asked for a brief statement as to the rulemaking power of the Department of Labor under the Wagner-Peyser Act; more specifically, their power to issue regulations covering employment of domestic farmworkers, as proposed in a release dated March 3, 1959. Part I of these regulations, according to release, provides that "any farmer who uses the services of the Employment Service for recruitment of domestic workers (which includes Puerto Rican workers) from outside the community must comply with the following regulations:

"1. His housing and other facilities must meet specifications acceptable to the Department of Labor.

"2. He must offer transportation arrangements not less favorable than offered by other employers of farm labor.

"3. He must pay prevailing wages in the area, as determined by the Labor Department."

The proposed regulation and its predecessors are technically based upon authority of section 12 of the Wagner-Peyser Act as amended (see CFR 1949 ed. 20: pt. 602). This section authorizes the Secretary of Labor "to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of [the Act of June 6, 1933, as amended]." The question then is, whether "the provisions of the act" include such matters as are specified in the proposed regulations.

Briefly, the act set up a U.S. Employment Service "to promote the establishment and maintenance of a national system of public employment offices." This objective is spelled out in section 3 of the act, title 29, United States Code, section 49b:

"SEC. 49b. Employment offices; development of national system; veterans' service; 'State' defined.

"(a) It shall be the province and duty of the bureau to promote and develop a national system of employment offices for men, women, and juniors who are legally qualified to engage in gainful occupations * * * to maintain a farm placement service. * * * The bureau shall also assist in coordinating the public employment offices throughout the country and in increasing their usefulness by developing and prescribing minimum standards of efficiency, assisting them in meeting problems peculiar to their localities, promoting uniformity in their administrative and statistical procedure, furnishing and publishing information as to opportunities for employment and other information of value in the operation of the system, and maintaining a system for clearing labor between the several States.

"(b) Whenever in sections 49—49c, 49d, 49g, 49h, 49j, and 49k of this title and section 338 of title 39 the word 'State' or 'States' is used, it shall be understood to include Hawaii, Alaska, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands." (June 6, 1933, ch. 49, sec. 3, 48 Stat. 114, Sept. 8, 1950, ch. 933, sec. 1, 64 Stat. 822.)

Citing these sections as authority the Department of Labor issued regulations regarding agricultural placement services, starting with 13 FR 8377. These early regulations (CFR 20: at 602.8 et. seq.) required the State agencies to provide "effective placement services for agricultural and related industry employers and workers," "through adequate local employment office facilities," etc. In 1951, new sections 602.9 and 602.10 were added, which as revised in 1954 (19 FR 7433) required that State agencies needing agricultural labor and desiring to secure interstate recruitment, were to meet the "following conditions" (sec. 602.9):

"(a) Examine production factors, to assure validity of need.

"(b) The State agency assures that (1) terms and conditions of employment are not less favorable than those offered by employers who have been successful in recruiting and retaining domestic workers for similar work in the area; (2) housing and facilities are available and will be, at the time of occupancy, hygienic and adequate to the climatic conditions of the area of employment; (3) wages offered are not less than the prevailing wage rates paid in the area to agricultural workers who are similarly employed; and (4) transportation from the pick-up point to the place of employment, and return, each day is provided by the employer to any available local workers, in accordance with the common practice of employers in the area.

"(c) Compile and make available information on prevailing wages.

"(d) The State agency will cooperate actively with designated State agencies responsible for conditions of housing and health and will make every effort to assure that housing and facilities offered workers meet minimum standards suggested by the U.S. Employment Service.

Judging from the release you sent over, the proposed regulations would carry these requirements a step further and make it incumbent upon the individual farmers using the Employment Service, to meet their conditions roughly corresponding to present section 609(b). And the question, as we understand it, is whether this extension of the regulations finds justification in the authority cited.

The following brief memo, prepared within strict time limit, is concerned with two points:

1. Whether the proposed regulation is within the intent of Congress in enacting the Wagner-Peyser Act.

2. Whether the regulation, apart from any such collateral evidence, has valid statutory basis.

(1) On this point, we have scanned the reports and debates on the Wagner-Peyser Act of June 6, 1933 (48 Stat. 113; S. 510, 73d Cong.) and do not find any indication that the Members sponsoring or debating the measure had in mind that the Employment Service was to exercise any substantive control over the working conditions and terms of employment of workers recruited by the Service. In fact the final paragraph of the Senate report on the original bill (S. Rept. 63, 73d Cong.; S. 510) states the following as the purpose of the bill:

"To assist and stimulate the development of a system by the States, the Federal Government will give sums of money to match the moneys already appropriated by the States or set aside by the States, for the development of a free employment service. The committee feels that we should keep the pattern of the States in doing their own work in placement, and put the Federal Government in the position of helping and encouraging them to do so; the Federal Government being responsible for the statistical work and saving the States this expense, and the statistical information being available to all the States. The Federal Government is also to do the research work, which is often too expensive for the States to do individually; the function of the States being to perform the task of getting the jobs and the workers brought together."

The House report (H. Rept. 158, 73d Cong.; H.R. 4559) has the following to say:

"This bill in a word sets up a national system for cooperation with the various States and endeavors to promote the establishment and maintenance of a national system of public employment offices; and for that purpose creates in the Department of Labor a bureau to be known as the U.S. Employment Service under the control of a director."

(2) So far as our findings under (1) above are in point, they seem to indicate that the Wagner-Peyser Act intended just what its title stated, viz. cooperation with the States in the promotion of a system of public employment offices, including a "farm placement service." Section 3 spells out the duties of the newly established Federal agency (i.e. a bureau to be known as the U.S. Employment Service, in the Department of Labor). It carefully details the methods by which the bureau is to "increase the usefulness" of public employment offices (see title 29, United States Code, sec. 49b quoted above). And the methods so stated seem clearly designed to promote the efficiency of the several employment offices, but to fall short of regulating the subject matter. Benefits of appropriations under the act are conditioned (sec. 4) upon the States officially accepting "the provisions of the act" and designating a State agency with power to cooperate with the U.S. Employment Service. Each State must match the Federal apportionment (sec. 5), and submit to the Federal bureau "detailed plans for carrying out the provisions of this act" within the State. And allotments may be revoked if it is found that a State's employment offices have not been conducted "in accordance with the rules and regulations and the standards of efficiency prescribed by the Federal authority. We find no language in the act enlarging the duties of the Department of Labor with regard to employment offices as set out in section 3.

At the same time, it is obvious that regulations purporting to require compliance with substantive standards as to housing, working conditions, etc., have been in effect since 1951. We do not see how mere lapse of time can confer authority not stated by law.

Sincerely yours,

WILFRED C. GILBERT,
Chief, American Law Division.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I understand the senior Senator from Oregon desires some time. I yield 3 minutes to him on the Holland amendment.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I rise to object to the proposed Cooper and Holland amendments. In my opinion, they should be considered together.

Any argument in opposition to one amendment goes also to the other amendment. Neither amendment has any place in a fair labor standards bill. Neither has anything to do with the problem of minimum wages; they have to do with the authority of the Secretary of Labor to issue standard regulations when it comes to recruiting migrant workers.

That is what the Holland amendment amounts to. It refers to an authority which has been sustained by the Attorney General of the United States, and which, in 1946, was sustained by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare itself, in a report it made.

Anyone who objects to a course of action of the Secretary of Labor has two procedures open. He may introduce an independent bill and have hearings held on it before the appropriate congressional committees, or take the Secretary of Labor into court.

It is very interesting that those who have opposed the authority of the Secretary of Labor have not sought any court action, because they know very well they would lose in court.

Therefore, what we have in effect—and I do not care how we clothe these amendments—we have rider amendments proposed to a fair labor standards bill. They are amendments on which we have heard no witnesses, on which we have not had any hearings before our committee.

Therefore, I say most respectfully to my good friends, the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Florida, that I do not believe they are pleading their case in the forum where they ought to plead their case first. They ought to be before a committee, first, with an independent bill, raising the question as to whether, under the Wagner-Peyser Act, the Secretary of Labor is exceeding his authority. In my judgment, they would lose in court as a matter of public policy. They should lose in the Legislative Halls.

I come now to the matter of public policy, which represents my next major objection. The practice in the field of labor is that prospective employers call on the Federal Government for the use of a Federal agency, namely, the U.S. Employment Service. If they are going to use a Federal service, and if they are going to expect Federal taxpayers to finance that service, then the Federal agency has a duty, as a matter of public policy, to lay down reasonable standards, as the Secretary of Labor has done.

We are dealing here with a group of workers who present a sorry plight in America. It is a plight, in many parts of our country, that really is shameful. It is a plight that is the subject of much writing and much investigation has resulted from it into the low standards of living conditions that these workers are subjected to time and time again in many parts of our country.

This minimum wage bill is not a bill which we ought to be legislating on the great social problem which confronts us in the field of migratory labor. When all is said and done, these amendments deal with migratory labor. That subject should be handled in separate legislation. It ought to be handled with hearings before the committees.

Furthermore, there are many implications in this matter about which I would warn Senators before they vote this afternoon. The Senator from Kentucky is very much concerned about workers being moved intrastate. When the Federal Government is asked to be of service in moving workers intrastate, the Federal Government has a duty, in my judgment, to impose its own standards, even though some States do not want to come up to that level.

I should like the attention of the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL]. There can be within a State, too, some very serious migratory labor disputes, as is the case in California, with stretched picket lines. Shall we make the U.S. Employment Service a party to a strikebreaking program, simply because we are dealing with migratory labor in the agricultural field? Shall we pass legislation this afternoon, without any hearings on this problem, in which we shall restrain the Secretary of Labor from imposing reasonable standards before he makes workers available to employers in the orchards of my State of Oregon, for example, or in the row-crop fields in California, and in other migratory labor fields throughout the country?

I simply say, most respectfully, that, in my opinion, the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] and the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] are not in the proper forum this afternoon for the passage of this proposed legislation. I think they owe it to the Senate to make their case, first, in detail before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, with proposed amendments to the Wagner-Peyser Act, rather than to come to the floor of the Senate to offer amendments to a fair labor standards bill. They are riders which contain many serious implications and threaten dire consequences if we act on them with no more attention than we have been able to give to the facts in this debate.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MORSE. I yield if I have time.

Mr. COOPER. I believe the Senator said the chief issue was migratory farm labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Oregon has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield an additional minute to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I said the migratory labor problem is involved in the question. There can be a migratory labor problem within a State, when the labor moves east, west, north, or south.

Mr. COOPER. The amendment which I have offered would protect migratory farm labor moving interstate.

Mr. MORSE. It would not if we took away from the Secretary of Labor the power he has to impose standards, if his services are to be used.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to verify the point which has been so vigorously made by the Senator from Oregon. The Committee on Labor and Public Welfare has a Subcommittee on Migrant Labor. A minimum wage bill has been introduced by the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA]. We have had before that subcommittee, since our creation about a year ago, a minimum wage bill introduced by the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA]. We have had hearings in 8 or 10 States, and we have had hearings, and properly so, in the Capitol. We have given everyone an opportunity to be heard. I may say that we have not concluded with our hearings on minimum wages for migratory workers; the bill is still before us. There is still ample opportunity, in the regular deliberative way, for the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] to make this sort of approach.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The argument of the Senator from Oregon stands uncontested, or at least it certainly stands the test of contest, because the argument is based upon a considerable period of legislative history in terms of investigation into the migratory labor problems in this country. As the Senator from Oregon has well pointed out, the Fair Labor Standards Act which we are supposed to be acting on is to promote fair labor standards. I do not believe the two amendments, if we add them together, would do that. They merely provide that the Secretary of Labor is to be denied the power to give any protection to wages, hours, and other conditions of employment, both in interstate commerce and in intrastate commerce.

Mr. MCCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. MCCARTHY. It is as bad as the Senator says, and worse. Not only would the Secretary not have any power over migratory farmworkers; he would be forced to recruit people who could be exploited by the growers.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Minnesota puts his finger on the second great weakness of the amendment. Not only does it strip the Secretary of Labor of any power he might have at present, or deny him the right, further, to protect rather helpless individuals, it actually forces the Secretary of Labor to use an agency, supported by public funds, the U.S. Employment Service, to recruit workers at depressed wages.

Congress did not come back into session to see how we could lower wages. We came back into session to complete some of the uncompleted work of the second session of the 86th Congress. We certainly did not come back to see whether we could make life a little more miserable for people who already have plenty of misery. There is no group of people in America who have a more difficult time than the migratory farmworkers. Minnesota has some of those people working in the vegetable garden areas of our State. They are entitled to good housing and education for their young. They are entitled to health care. They are entitled to at least the prevailing wages in the area.

I am not ready to stand in the Senate and let this body vote to depress the wages of people in the State of Minnesota through an agency of the U.S. Government. That is exactly what would be done, because the U.S. Employment Service would be called upon to recruit workers, and possibly workers in excess of demand, thus placing an increased supply of workers in the labor market and thereby depressing wages in an area where we are trying to raise wages.

The food problems of America are sufficiently difficult without being complicated by the very serious problems of the migratory workers. Already this Nation faces problems in agricultural production and distribution. These two amendments, I must respectfully say, will only aggravate those problems.

We have before us these two amendments. I think the Senator from Florida is eminently correct in saying that the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky ought to be voted upon as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Florida, because then it will be possible to strip the Secretary of Labor of protection. Not only that, but it will be possible to direct him to lower standards throughout the Nation.

I shall vote against both amendments. I think both of them would have evil effects socially. I remind Senators that not a single church organization in the United States which is concerned about the physical or spiritual or social well-being of our people would support these amendments. Those organizations have been among the stanchest advocates of controls over migratory labor, in order to improve their standards. I further submit that there is no group of workers in America who are more depressed economically than the migratory workers.

I say those people should not be given a further body blow by Congress. If we adopt these amendments, we ought to change the title of the Fair Labor Standards Act. We should call it the Unfair Labor Standards Act, because that is exactly what it would be. This material does not belong in the bill. The purpose of the bill is to improve working conditions, to improve labor conditions, and to improve wages. There is not a Senator who can demonstrate that either the Cooper amendment or the Holland amendment will increase wages; in fact, the purpose of these amendments is to the contrary.

Those of us who have spent some time on this subject—and I have; I handled investigations in this area for more than 3 years as a Member of the Senate—can give assurance that these amendments will serve only to jeopardize the lot of the migratory workers.

In the name of simple social justice, I ask that, at least, these amendments be held back and not voted upon on this bill. This is not the place for them. Furthermore, I do not believe they should be voted for on any bill.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Does the Senator believe that the Secretary of Labor has the power, under the Constitution, to promulgate regulations affecting purely intrastate labor?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Only workers who are brought in from outside the State.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That is not the question. Does the Senator from Minnesota believe the Secretary of Labor has the power, under the Constitution, to issue regulations affecting purely intrastate labor?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I do not believe the Secretary of Labor would have power under existing law or the Constitution to affect intrastate labor—that is, individual worker by individual worker. Second, I do not believe it is a good, sound rule or policy for the U.S. Senate to direct the U.S. Employment Service either to recruit workers without regard to the prevailing wage in the area and thereby further depress wages; or to deny the Secretary of Labor the opportunity which he already has to improve some of the conditions which do not affect wages and hours. In Minnesota, we are rather proud of the fact that our State requires the provision of educational facilities for migratory workers and their children. They require sanitary facilities. They have rules which relate to the transportation of these workers. But despite all that, the living standards of this group of workers are low.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I commend the able Senator for the argument in opposition that he has made.

I wish to point out, in regard to intrastate employment, that the Secretary of Labor does not propose to fix any wages. The Secretary of Labor—and his position on this matter has been sustained by the Attorney General of the United States—says only that if this Federal agency is to be used, certain standards must be complied with first, and that he will not recruit workers for them unless they live up to certain standards in regard to housing, medical care, sanitary facilities, and education, and unless the prevailing wage is paid. In fact, he does not even say what the prevailing wage in the locality is or how it shall be determined.

That is all the Secretary of Labor says; and in my judgment he is clearly acting within his power under the Constitution of the United States. I know of no constitutional provision which denies to a Federal agency the administrative right to lay down administrative rules and regulations in carrying out the authority given it by the Congress.

The Secretary of Labor is carrying out the provisions of the Wagner-Peyser Act; and all that Congress has done is delegate that administrative duty to the Secretary of Labor. He is acting in an administrative capacity, and he has a right to do so.

I am not speaking of any specific decision he makes; but that administrative power to make the decision has been sustained time and time again by the courts.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Oregon for his very lucid explanation of these legal points. He is one of the most brilliant lawyers in this body.

I believe it is a fact that the Secretary of Labor is performing only the duties he is required to perform under the Wagner-Peyser Act in connection with the U.S. Employment Service.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. But that brings in another question.

My question went to the broader question, and did not necessarily involve the operation of the Wagner-Peyser Act. I would agree that if the Secretary of Labor is called upon to recruit labor, and if he comes into that situation under the provisions of the Wagner-Peyser Act, then an interstate matter is involved.

But entirely aside from that, my question was not whether the Secretary acts to recruit labor across State lines under the provisions of the Wagner-Peyser Act. My question was whether, under the Constitution, he has the authority to issue regulations in regard to purely intrastate labor.

Mr. HUMPHREY. But I do not think that is relevant to this particular bill, and it scarcely is relevant to the amendments.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I think it is relevant to the Holland amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY. But the Holland amendment, in substance, would strip the Secretary of Labor of the authority he already exercises under the Wagner-Peyser Act, which says that the Secretary of Labor shall use the Employment Service for employment purposes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I agree about that. But in connection with the Wagner-Peyser Act, the amendment endeavors to preserve the authority of the Secretary of Labor insofar as interstate recruitment is concerned or involved.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes; but the amendment would really attempt to set up a strawman and then knock him down.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. As I understand, when an employer recruits labor either in his own area or in another State, either one, the Secretary of Labor has no authority to fix the terms or conditions of employment or housing or anything else.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Vermont is absolutely correct.

Mr. AIKEN. But if the employer undertook to use the United States Employment Service, then he would come under the provisions of the Wagner-Peyser Act. Is that correct?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. AIKEN. But so long as the employer did his own recruiting, the Secretary of Labor would have no reason or no right to come into the picture at all, as I understand.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The only restrictions then would be those imposed by State or local law.

Mr. AIKEN. Yes.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. As a matter of fact, under the Wagner-Peyser Act if the employer does his own recruiting, there could be no possible interference, even if he did recruit interstate. There could be interference only if he used the U.S. Employment Service.

So far as constitutionality is concerned, I think it accepted that if State employees are engaged in interstate commerce, theoretically they might be subject to Federal law. But, as the Senator has indicated, there is no statutory authority in that connection.

However, the regulations which are supposed to be the subject of this proposed legislation are very clearly to the effect that no order for recruitment of domestic agricultural workers shall be given interstate clearance.

So no question at all of interstate clearance is involved in this debate.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I should like to address myself to the procedures under the Wagner-Peyser Act, and to the questions asked and the answers given by the Senators from Minnesota and the Senator from Oregon. After all, one must take one side or the other in connection with this matter.

The power of the Secretary of Labor to issue regulations could be exercised in both intrastate employment and interstate employment. If the Secretary of Labor says, "I can assert my power to issue regulations for interstate employment," he can likewise assert his power to issue regulations for intrastate employment. Senators may not like the purpose of my amendment; but it provides that the Secretary of Labor shall have no power to issue regulations for intrastate farm labor; but that if he has any power over migratory labor, it shall be preserved.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I believe the Senator's explanation is an accurate one.

The Holland amendment would strip from the Secretary of Labor his power over such labor when used for interstate purposes. The Cooper amendment would say to the Secretary of Labor, as regards migratory labor, that insofar as the use of the U.S. Employment Service is concerned, as a recruiting agency, the Secretary of Labor shall have no power within a State, so long as the workers are intrastate workers.

I say that both these amendments serve the following purposes: First of all, the Holland amendment would strip the Secretary of Labor of power over interstate or migratory workers; and, second, the little loophole that would still be left, whereby there could be some protection for humankind, would be denied by stripping the Secretary of Labor of any power over intrastate recruitment, insofar as the use of the U.S. Employment Service was concerned.

I ask my colleagues, Why should this be done? Can anyone show me that migratory workers are overpaid or that their lot is one of luxury or comfort? The records of the Senate committee are filled with stories of the human misery suffered by migratory workers. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS] has been holding hearings on this matter. There is no single group of people in America who are more shabbily treated or who are the victims of more social injustice than are the migratory workers. So, Mr. President, I cannot understand why the Senate of the United States should wish to make their lot just a little more difficult.

Furthermore, it seems to me that we should come with clean hands to matters relating to the production of food and fiber. But, in this instance, I say we are in a sense contaminating it by not raising the standards of agricultural workers. We should raise them, not lower them.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to comment on the argument made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], because I have not changed horses; I am still on the same horse.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Let me add that the Senator from Oregon knows a great deal about horses, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORSE. Yes, and sometimes I get thrown by them, too.

But I wish to say to the Senator from Kentucky that it makes no difference to me whether intrastate or interstate agricultural labor is involved; and all that the Senator has done by raising this legal problem, in my judgment, is to prove my case that this matter should be before the Labor Committee, and that the best legal witnesses should be before that committee for the discussion of the Senator's legal point of view, if he questions the power of the Secretary of Labor to lay down standards for the use of the U.S. Employment Service in connection with such intrastate labor.

If the Secretary of Labor is asked to be of assistance in recruitment, he is going to have to give that assistance under legal power he now has. There has to be a law on the books that will authorize him to do it. When he starts to function administratively under that legal power, then he has the right to lay down administrative standards, and he has a right to say, for instance, in California, "I am not going to get involved in that one. I am not going to move workers from southern California up into the strike area of California unless certain standards are complied with first. My Department is not going to be used to break a strike."

That is one little phase of the problem I want to raise. I do not agree with the Senator from Kentucky that what he is arguing is that employers in a State can ask the Federal Government to be of assistance in recruiting workers in that State, use Federal tax dollars to pay for that service, and not have the administrative right to lay down standards. Under the Senator's amendment, in my judgment, it would strip the Secretary of Labor of any administrative power to lay down reasonable standards for the recruitment of laborers. I do not intend to strip him of that power in interstate or intrastate work.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, we have gone through a period of time in which income for farm producers has gone down. This is a matter of historical, political, and economic fact. There have been deepening troubles in the rural areas of America in the past few years. Most of the trouble has not been on farms where there are migratory workers, but on the family farm units, where mother and father, uncle and aunt, brother and sister farm the land, and where there is a record of depressed farm income.

I ask my colleagues, Can anyone show me how either of these amendments will raise wages for the migratory worker? Can anyone show me it will improve living conditions? No. In fact, there is no reason why the prevailing wage in the community should not be paid for that class of labor. I see no reason why we should open up a loophole in the law that will permit the U.S. Employment Service, in the name of fair labor standards, to lower wage income and make the lot of the migratory worker worse. I think this is bad legislative policy.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have just heard the observations made by the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Oregon. If the Senate has the power to delegate to the Secretary of Labor the authority to fix wages and working conditions, both in interstate and intrastate commerce, I merely want to say we are indulging in a most dangerous practice. I do not care whether President Nixon, President Kennedy, or President Eisenhower will appoint the Secretary of Labor—I want no Labor Secretary to have the power to exercise this great control over our economy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota about the need to help migrant workers, but we are in danger of entering into a tyrannical system by giving the Secretary of Labor, regardless of how benevolent he may claim it to be, this inordinate, extraordinary power.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I think the Senator from Ohio has made a very powerful argument. May I say that, just as the Secretary of Labor should not be given the power to set wages, he should not be given the authority to reduce wages, and that is exactly what these amendments do. The Secretary of Labor does not have power to set wages under the prevailing law. He merely provides certain employment standards, and he sees to it that the prevailing wage which is set by the community is the wage offered to workers recruited by the U.S. Employment Service.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes.

Mr. PASTORE. If the Secretary of Labor is not going to be given the power to set the standards under which the people are going to work, then we ought not to ask the Secretary of Labor to recruit these people to be exploited. That is the question involved. We are not laying out any lines of demarcation that will define constitutional rights as between intrastate and interstate functions; we are only saying that if they call upon the U.S. Employment Service to recruit these men and women to do the work, then the Secretary has the constitutional right and the constitutional obligation to see that these people are not exploited. It is just as simple as that. If employers do not want to meet the standards, then they should not call on the recruitment office. It is just as simple as that.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator has stated it precisely and simply, and yet profoundly.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I ask the distinguished Senator from Minnesota if it is not a fact that the bill now being considered, S. 3758, the Fair Labor Standards Act amendments, does not contain this exemption:

Provided, That this bill shall not apply to any employee engaged in agriculture or in connection with the operation or maintenance of ditches, canals, reservoirs, or waterways that are owned, or operated for profit, or operated on a share-crop basis, which are used for storing water for agricultural purposes.

Is it not a fact that agricultural labor is excluded from this bill and there is no floor under wages under this bill?

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is right, and the only wage scale we are talking about is the prevailing wage set by the economic conditions in the community. What I and other Senators on this side of the argument are attempting to do is to see to it that we do not weaken an already rather weak arm of the Government, the Department of Labor, and to depress wages.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Is it not a fact that if we adopt the Cooper amendment, we are going beyond the scope of the bill and going into agriculture, which is not touched by the bill?

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is my view; and it was pointed out by the Senator from Oregon that this material does not belong in the bill. We have a Labor Committee which can handle this problem. For more than a year the chairman of a subcommittee of that committee has been delving into this question. There is legislation proposed in the Senate dealing with it. While the subject may be germane, in a sense it is not relevant to the purposes of the bill.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Is it not a fact that, if the Holland and the Cooper amendments are defeated, the laws, so far as agriculture is concerned, are left exactly as they are today; they are not changed one iota?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator is correct; and there is a great burden of proof to the effect that the laws ought to be improved, not weakened.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. In the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, not too long ago, a certain tragic condition was brought out. Some of the mothers among the migrant workers and their families had to put their babies in automobiles, and they closed the automobile windows on a hot day and some of the children smothered.

Does any Senator mean to tell me that if a woman goes to the United States recruitment office and solicits the aid of a Federal agency, it is not the duty of that agency to see to it that she is decently treated? Of course it is. Of course it is constitutional. If one applies to a Federal agency to do something for him, then he must expect reasonable regulations that protect life and limb and give these people opportunities to live humanely.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I concur with the Senator from Rhode Island that the Government owes some responsibility, but if that responsibility is going to be exercised with respect to this important phase it ought to be exercised by the Congress, and there should not be given unlimited authority, depending upon the caprice and the whim of a fallible human being who is the Secretary of Labor, to declare the equivalent of law which the Constitution says the Congress shall exercise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. This goes back to a philosophy of government.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PASTORE. All the Congress does is to set the minimum standards. That is all we do. We simply set minimum standards. Standards must be set some place. We cannot set out the entire rules and regulations on the part of Congress. That is an administrative responsibility. All we do is set minimum standards.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Secretary of Labor can set any standards he desires to set. As one American citizen, I am not ready to abdicate my authority by passing it from the Congress to some fallible human being. I do not care who is the Secretary of Labor, he should not have this inordinate power in his hands.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for 20 seconds?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I will say, my dear friend from Ohio is a brilliant lawyer. but he has missed the point, as brilliant lawyers sometimes do. When he says the Secretary of Labor can set any standard he wishes to set, the Senator from Ohio knows better. The case books are full of decisions of reversals of administrative officers, whenever they have issued unreasonable orders, rules, or regulations. The check for these gentlemen, if they do not like what the Secretary of Labor is doing, is, first, to go into the courts. They have not brought a case in the courts. Why? It is because they know a decision handed down by the Attorney General of the United States will stand the test of a court.

The second forum for these gentlemen is not on the floor of the Senate. First they should appear before a committee on an independent bill, not with respect to a rider on a minimum wage bill. In my judgment, they are pleading their case in the wrong forum at the wrong time.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 1 minute?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has again expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I need only 1 minute.

I am most amazed to hear a liberal so great as the Senator from Oregon advocating what, upon clear reasoning, is demonstrable as being tyranny of the worst type. It is surprising how frequently ultraliberals fall into the mistake, when moved by the desire to be philanthropic, of abandoning the concepts of liberty.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I assure my good friend from Ohio that none of us would intend to abandon any concept of liberty for tyranny in any form, no matter who the Secretary may be in this or any other administration.

Mr. MORSE. Will the Senator yield to me so that I may state one sentence?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I think the argument of the Senator from Oregon is pretty clear. If there had been so much tyranny, it seems to me that someone who had been the victim of it would long ago have hired an attorney and gone to court.

The tyranny in this situation is the tyranny of poverty over the migratory workers. Not a Member of this body can deny it. The migratory worker is the most exploited worker in America. It is a most shameful thing.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I will say that the take-home pay of the migratory workers in North Dakota is higher than the take-home pay of the average farmer in my State. Those workers are not mistreated. They have the best lives they have ever known.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I will say that if they have the best lives they have ever known they must have had horrible lives before, because I have seen the migratory workers. Let us not be misled about this situation. These migratory workers need help. The name explains the problem. They are migrants. The families are on the road. Their living conditions are substandard. Their income is uncertain. The parents have little or no education, usually, and their children have little opportunity for adequate education. They rarely have the medical attention they need.

The Catholics, the Protestants, and the Jews—every religious institution in this country so states.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has again expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, we shall shortly vote on the Cooper amendment. At the request of the majority leader, who is temporarily required to be out of the Senate Chamber, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Cooper amendment is defeated we shall ask for the yeas and nays on the Holland amendment.

Mr. President, I wish to state very briefly, as a member of the committee, since the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee seems to have temporarily lost his voice, that every Democratic member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare is opposed to both of these amendments. Neither of the amendments was offered before the committee. No testimony was taken with respect to either one of them.

The subject matter of the amendments is not germane to the pending bill. They represent an endeavor to do the wrong thing at the wrong time and in the wrong place. This is an attempt to amend the Wagner-Peyser Act under the guise of an amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

I have listened with interest to the eloquent arguments made by my colleagues in opposition to these amendments. I think they are very sound.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, may we have order in the Chamber?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend while the Senate comes to order. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator may proceed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Cooper amendment is a pallid version of the Holland amendment, because it covers only intrastate employment activities, authority as to which has never been exercised, but the effect of both amendments in whole or in part would be to force the Secretary of Labor and the U.S. Employment Service to recruit farmworkers, to undercut the area's existing wages and hours and working conditions. The amendment is not an attempt to stop the Secretary of Labor from exercising any minimum wage power; it is an attempt to force him to use the public tax-supported employment agency to undercut area farm labor wages, which are already abysmally low. I hope both amendments will be rejected.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I believe I have 4 minutes remaining; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has 4 minutes remaining.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, a lot of bleeding hearts here have been bleeding unnecessarily.

In the first place, the Senator from Oregon would be quite correct in his premise that we should go to court if the facts justified the premise. It is a problem. The Senator was not in the Chamber when it was announced that the rule complained of has not yet gone into effect. It is announced that it will take effect in December. That is the occasion which makes this the only proper forum for us at this time.

In the second place, the bleeding hearts which are complaining about the standards do not realize that the acts now in force do not enact any standards whatsoever. They do not give any authority at all to the Secretary of Labor to do what he intends to do next December. The Committee on Appropriations recognized that last year. We found that the Secretary was about to do this then, and we wrote into the report a mandate that the Secretary not use any 1960 appropriations for this purpose. The year elapsed effective July 1. For some reason we forgot to put the statement in the report this year, and the Secretary is proposing to do this.

The third thing is this: Every lawyer who has checked on this matter except the Attorney General has come out with an opinion saying there is not a shadow of authority given by the debates, by the act, by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with respect to the passage of the bill, which would allow the Secretary of Labor to take this action, other than one opinion, and that is the opinion of the Attorney General. Whoever wrote his opinion certainly had his tongue in his cheek and a weasel somewhere close by when he wrote it. This is all he could say:

> In the face of the longstanding administrative construction of the act as conferring power upon the Secretary to promulgate referral standards governing the use of the public employment service and the evidence of congressional acquiescence therein.

Congress certainly has not acquiesced, because this has not been in existence.

> I would not be justified in advising you that the construction is in fact erroneous in the absence of a clear and convincing showing of error. In my opinion no such showing has been made.

Mr. President, this is the time to make such a showing that the Congress did not delegate such power, did not intend to delegate such power, and does not intend now to delegate such power, under which the Secretary of Labor has already advised us of the triple method of trying to fix what are the prevailing wages, without making any allowance at all for the experience, for the maturity, and for the ability of the particular workers, but, instead, fixing the wage schedule and other conditions.

The amendment now pending specifically provides that the Secretary of Labor is not supposed to be affected in any way by the amendment. Could there be a more appropriate time, condition, or occasion in which to place this declaration in legislation than now? We would very clearly say to the Secretary of Labor who, as an administrative official, is assuming to act in a way Congress has never permitted him to act and has never delegated him the authority to act, "We did not intend for you to do this. We are saying now at this last opportunity that we do not want you to do it. By doing it we think you will impose greatly upon our system of laws and upon those affected."

It is amusing to hear the people who have been weeping so many tears about the condition of agriculturists throughout the country to weep now about doing them justice in the American way by providing that no official in the executive branch can take such action in the absence of legislative authority and in the absence of a grant of specific authority delegating him the necessary power, and that we will not stand for it. I think this is the appropriate time and place for such action. I hope that the Senate will take the action requested in the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, how much time have I remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey has 21 minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. I desire to point out that the first vote will be on the substitute which I have offered to the Holland amendment. There is a difference between the two amendments. Notwithstanding what has been said about my amendment, it would give protection to the migratory farmworker who moves from State to State.

Let that be known. It would give protection to the migratory worker.

The second point I wish to make is simple. Do Senators wish the Secretary of Labor, either directly or indirectly, to fix wages and hours for farmers in their States? My amendment would prevent him from doing so.

If Senators are against such action, either directly or indirectly, and wish to protect the migratory worker, they will vote for my amendment. But if they wish him to fix wages, directly or indirectly, for their farmers and neighbors, they should vote against my amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute.

I believe a very forceful argument has been made for the defeat of both amendments, and it has been made very eloquently by Senators who have spoken in opposition.

There is one argument, however, that might not have been emphasized and I think the Senators should consider it. I have had the opportunity as chairman of the subcommittee to travel around the country. There are very few of our States in which fruits and vegetables are not grown. Those fruits and vegetables are picked by hand. They are picked by natives of our States, and at the peak seasons by workers who are brought into the States. I think it should be understood that if the agency of the Secretary of Labor must recruit workers in peak periods from other States, and those workers receive less wages than the natives get for picking the same fruits and vegetables, as bad money drives out good, those low wages paid to the interstate recruited workers are going to drive down the wages which are paid within our States.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield 30 seconds to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I yield 30 seconds to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. If the Cooper amendment were adopted, would pickers within a State be affected?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. It will affect them in neither way.

Mr. AIKEN. It will protect against low-cost labor being recruited from some other State and brought in?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. We know that for other reasons the Cooper amendment has not been supported on this side of the aisle.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Chair explain what is the parliamentary situation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator restate his question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. What is the parliamentary situation relating to the Cooper amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the Cooper amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

Mr. HUMPHREY. And the Cooper amendment is in the nature of a substitute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Cooper amendment is in the nature of a substitute. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the Cooper amendment. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that if present and voting, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] would vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 80, as follows:

NOT VOTING—2

Hennings Martin

So Mr. COOPER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the Holland amendment, as modified.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the Holland amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate has expired. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, may we have the Holland amendment read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The legislative clerk read the amendment, as follows:

On page 24, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

"SEC. 11. Except as may otherwise be expressly provided by law, the Secretary of Labor shall have no power to regulate, either through the withholding of benefits or services or otherwise, the wages, hours or other conditions of employment of employees employed in agriculture (as defined in section 3(f) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938)."

On page 24, line 7, strike out "SEC. 11" and insert "SEC. 12".

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement I have prepared relative to the Holland amendment, including a letter from the Library of Congress.

There being no objection, the statement and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR FULBRIGHT

I support the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Florida.

This is a simple amendment, but it is of extreme importance to the preservation of our traditional system of separation of powers between the executive and the legislative branches of the Government. The amendment would provide by law that the Secretary of Labor's powers to regulate wages, hours and other conditions of employment be limited to those specified in the Fair Labor Standards Act and in other express provisions of law. It would settle a controversy which has arisen concerning the Secretary of Labor's assumption of certain powers to regulate domestic farm labor which are not expressly provided for by law.

The Wagner-Peyser Act, approved by Congress in 1933, created a grant-in-aid program for the establishment of State employment agencies. The Secretary of Labor has interpreted certain language in this act as giving him authority to require farmers using the services of Federal or State employment agencies for recruitment of migratory labor to comply with such standards relating to wages, hours and working conditions as he finds to be prevailing in the area.

This interpretation of the law met with such criticism that the Secretary asked the Attorney General for an opinion on the subject. The Attorney General, in supporting the Secretary's interpretation, said:

"In the face of the longstanding administrative construction of the act as conferring power upon the Secretary to promulgate referral standards governing the use of the public employment service and the evidence of congressional acquiescence therein, I would not be justified in advising you that the construction is in fact erroneous in the absence of a clear and convincing showing of error. In my opinion no such showing has been made."

This is a strange exhibition of legal reasoning. In effect, the Attorney General said that since the Congress had not expressly objected to previous regulations issued by the Secretary, the Department must have the authority to operate in this field. This opinion has been disputed by many legal authorities.

Early this year the House Agriculture Committee conducted hearings on this problem. Three distinguished citizens from my State attended these hearings. They were J. C. Portis of Lepanto, J. P. Baker, Jr., of West Helena, and Byron Landers of Harrisburg. They represented many farmers in my State who are concerned about the Secretary's exercise of this authority without the express consent of the Congress. In the printed hearings there appears an opinion by the Chief of the American Law Division of the Library of Congress. I quote a brief excerpt from this opinion for the information of the Senate:

"On this point, we have scanned the reports and debates on the Wagner-Peyser Act of June 6, 1933 (48 Stat. 113; S. 510, 73d Cong.), and do not find any indication that the Members sponsoring or debating the measure had in mind that the Employment Service was to exercise any substantive control over the working conditions and terms of employment of workers recruited by the Service."

This opinion is very pertinent, since it originates with an unbiased and impartial organization established to provide objective information to Members of Congress. I am much more impressed with the reasoning in this opinion than with the unsound interpretation of the law by the Attorney General.

The Secretary of Labor has gone far beyond the intent of Congress in his interpretation of the Wagner-Peyser Act. The Secretary has, by setting regulations specifying eligibility standards for using the employment services, usurped a responsibility of the Congress. The Congress under the Constitution is the branch of the Government with sole power to legislate, and it is dangerous for us to stand by and allow officials in the executive branch to exercise powers which were not expressly granted by the Congress. I can think of no better way to diminish the authority and prestige of the Congress than by allowing its legislative powers to be eroded away in this manner.

I do not question the motives of the Secretary of Labor in issuing these eligibility standards. I do question his legal right to do so. Congress by its inaction cannot grant authority to the Secretary of Labor to proceed as he pleases in this important field. If eligibility standards for using employment services are to be established by the Secretary, the Congress must first give him the express authority to do so.

I urge that the amendment be adopted.

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE,
March 12, 1959.

Hon. JOSEPH M. MONTOYA,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MONTOYA: You have asked for a brief statement as to the rulemaking power of the Department of Labor under the Wagner-Peyser Act; more specifically, their power to issue regulations covering employment of domestic farmworkers, as proposed in a release dated March 3, 1959. Part I of these regulations, according to the release, provides that "any farmer who uses the services of the Employment Service for recruitment of domestic workers (which includes Puerto Rican workers) from outside the community must comply with the following regulations:

"1. His housing and other facilities must meet specifications acceptable to the Department of Labor.

"2. He must offer transportation arrangements not less favorable than offered by other employers of farm labor.

"3. He must pay prevailing wages in the area, as determined by the Labor Department."

The proposed regulation and its predecessors are technically based upon authority of section 12 of the Wagner-Peyser Act as amended. (See CFR 1949 ed. 20: pt. 602.) This section authorizes the Secretary of Labor "to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the act of June 6, 1933, as amended." The question then is, whether "the provisions of the act" include such matters as are specified in the proposed regulations.

Briefly, the act set up a U.S. Employment Service "to promote the establishment and maintenance of a national system of public employment offices." This objective is spelled out in section 3 of the act (U.S.C. 29: 49b):

"SEC. 49b. Employment offices; development of national system; veterans' service; "State" defined.

"(a) It shall be the province and duty of the bureau to promote and develop a national system of employment offices for men, women, and juniors who are legally qualified to engage in gainful occupations * * * to maintain a farm placement service. * * * The bureau shall also assist in coordinating the public employment offices throughout the country and in increasing their usefulness by developing and prescribing minimum standards of efficiency, assisting them in meeting problems peculiar to their localities, promoting uniformity in their administrative and statistical procedure, furnishing and publishing information as to opportunities for employment and other information of value in the operation of the system, and maintaining a system for clearing labor between the several States.

"(b) Whenever in sections 49–49c, 49d, 49g, 49h, 49j, and 49k of this title and section 338 of title 39 the word "State" or "States" is used, it shall be understood to include Hawaii, Alaska, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands (June 6, 1933, ch. 49, sec. 3, 48 Stat. 114, Sept. 8, 1950, ch. 933, sec. 1, 64 Stat. 822)."

Citing these sections as authority the Department of Labor issued regulations regarding agricultural placement services, starting with 13 F.R. 8377. These early regulations (CFR 20: at 602.8 et seq.) required the State agencies to provide "effective placement services for agricultural and related industry employers and workers," "through adequate local employment office facilities," etc. In 1951, new sections 602.9 and 602.10 were added, which as revised in 1954 (19 CFR 7433) required that State agencies needing agricultural labor and desiring to secure interstate recruitment, were to meet the "following conditions" (sec. 602.9):

(a) Examine production factors, to assure validity of need.

(b) The State agency assures that (1) terms and conditions of employment are not less favorable than those offered by employers who have been successful in recruiting and retaining domestic workers for similar work in the area; (2) housing and facilities are available and will be, at the time of occupancy, hygienic and adequate to the climatic conditions of the area of employment; (3) wages offered are not less than the prevailing wage rates paid in the area to agricultural workers who are similarly employed; and (4) transportation from the pickup point to the place of employment, and return, each day is provided by the employer to any available local workers, in accordance with the common practice of employers in the area.

(c) Compile and make available information on prevailing wages.

(d) The State agency will cooperate actively with designated State agencies responsible for conditions of housing and health and will make every effort to assure that housing and facilities offered workers meet minimum standards suggested by the U.S. Employment Service.

Judging from the release you sent over, the proposed regulations would carry these requirements a step further and make it incumbent upon the individual farmers using the Employment Service to meet their conditions, roughly corresponding to present section 609(b). And the question, as we understand it, is whether this extension of the regulations finds justification in the authority cited.

The following brief memo, prepared within strict time limit, is concerned with two points: (1) Whether the proposed regulation is within the intent of Congress in enacting the Wagner-Peyser Act; (2) whether the regulation, apart from any such collateral evidence, has valid statutory basis.

1. On this point, we have scanned the reports and debates on the Wagner-Peyser Act of June 6, 1933 (48 Stat. 113; S. 510, 73d Cong.), and do not find any indication that the Members sponsoring or debating the measure had in mind that the Employment Service was to exercise any substantive control over the working conditions and terms of employment of workers recruited by the Service. In fact the final paragraph of the Senate report on the original bill (S. Rept. 63, 73d Cong.; S. 510) states the following as the purpose of the bill:

"To assist and stimulate the development of a system by the States, the Federal Government will give sums of money to match the moneys already appropriated by the States or set aside by the States for the development of a free employment service. The committee feels that we should keep the pattern of the States in doing their own work in placement, and put the Federal Government in the position of helping and encouraging them to do so; the Federal Government being responsible for the statistical work and saving the States this expense, and the statistical information being available to all the States. The Federal Government is also to do the research work, which is often too expensive for the States to do individually; the function of the States being to perform the task of getting the jobs and the workers brought together."

The House report (H. Rept. 158, 73d Cong.; H.R. 4559) has the following to say:

"This bill in a word sets up a national system for cooperation with the various States and endeavors to promote the establishment and maintenance of a national system of public employment offices; and for that purpose creates in the Department of Labor a bureau to be known as the U.S. Employment Service under the control of a director."

2. So far as our findings under (1) above are in point, they seem to indicate that the Wagner-Peyser Act intended just what its title stated; viz, cooperation with the States in the promotion of a system of public employment offices, including a farm placement service. Section 3 spells out the duties of the newly established Federal agency (i.e., a bureau to be known as the U.S. Employment Service, in the Department of Labor). It carefully details the methods by which the bureau is to increase the usefulness of public employment offices. (See 29 U.S.C. 49b quoted above.) And the methods so stated seem clearly designed to promote the efficiency of the several employment offices but to fall short of regulating the subject matter. Benefits of appropriations under the act are conditioned (sec. 4) upon the States officially accepting "the provisions of the act" and designating a State agency with power to cooperate with the U.S. Employment Service. Each State must match the Federal apportionment (sec. 5) and submit to the Federal bureau detailed plans for carrying out the provisions of this act within the State. And allotments may be revoked if it is found that a State's employment offices have not been conducted in accordance with the rules and regulations and the standards of efficiency prescribed by the Federal authority. We find no language in the act enlarging the duties of the Department of Labor with regard to employment offices as set out in section 3.

At the same time, it is obvious that regulations purporting to require compliance with substantive standards as to housing, working conditions, etc., have been in effect since 1951. We do not see how mere lapse of time can confer authority not stated by law.

Sincerely yours,

WILFRED C. GILBERT,
Chief, American Law Division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the Holland amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that if present and voting, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] would vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 56, as follows:

NOT VOTING—2

Hennings Martin

So. Mr. HOLLAND'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] has another amendment which he is prepared to offer. However, he does not wish to offer it now, if there is a possibility that a motion to lay on the table will be made this evening.

We have attempted to work out an agreement which will be satisfactory to both sides.

I now propose, in keeping with the usual form which we use for unanimous-consent agreements, that when the Holland amendment is offered, the time be equally divided between the proponent of the amendment and the majority leader, and that the Senate proceed to vote at 2 o'clock tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me ask whether any intervening amendment will be covered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. This includes the Holland amendment and all amendments thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say we were not able to hear what agreement was proposed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have proposed that during the consideration of the Holland amendment or any amendments thereto, the time be equally divided, under the control of the proponent of the amendment and the majority leader, respectively, and that the yea-and-nay vote on the question of agreeing to the amendment be taken at 2 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. BENNETT. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas subsequently said: Mr. President, a minute or so ago we obtained unanimous consent to have the Senate vote on the Holland amendment and all amendments thereto by yea-and-nay vote to begin at 2 o'clock tomorrow. I want to clarify the matter, in order that every Senator may understand: There will be no rollcalls between now and 2 o'clock tomorrow, unless there should be rollcalls on a motion to adjourn, or something like that, which we do not anticipate.

The unanimous-consent agreement as subsequently reduced to writing is as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, That effective on the convening of the Senate tomorrow (Wednesday, August 17), debate on the pending amendment proposed by Mr. HOLLAND to S. 3758, the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960, and all amendments thereto, shall proceed until 2 o'clock p.m., but no vote thereon shall be had prior to said hour on any amendment; that the intervening time shall be equally divided between those favoring said amendment or amendments and those opposed thereto, and controlled by the mover of the amendment or any amendment thereto and the majority leader: Provided, That in the event the majority leader is in favor of any such amendment, the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the minority leader or some Senator designated by him: Provided further, That no amendment that is not germane to the provisions of the said bill shall be received.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, pursuant to the unanimous-consent agreement which has just now been entered into, upon the request of the majority leader, I send forward an amendment which I submit on behalf of myself, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], and ask that the amendment be made the pending business and be printed in the RECORD, and that copies of the amendment be printed and made available.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BENNETT. Does the Senator from Florida wish to have the amendment read to the Senate at this time?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, instead of having the amendment read at this time, I ask that it be printed at this point in the RECORD, without being read.

There being no objection, the amendment submitted by Mr. HOLLAND, for himself, Mr. ELLENDER, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. BRIDGES, and Mr. HICKENLOOPER, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 3, beginning with the colon in line 10, strike out through the word "establishments" in line 24.

On page 4, beginning with line 4, strike out through line 17 on page 5, and insert the following:

"(t) 'Enterprise engaged in an activity affecting commerce' means an enterprise engaged in such an activity, which is in the business of operating a street, suburban, or interurban electric railway, or local trolley or motorbus carrier.".

On page 7, lines 6 and 7, strike out "(1), (2), or (3) or in an establishment described in section 3(t) (4) or (5)".

On page 13, lines 13 and 14, strike out "(1), (2), or (3), or in an establishment described in section 3(t) (4)".

On page 17, beginning with line 8, strike out through line 22 on page 18 and insert the following:

"(1) any employee employed in a bona fide executive, administrative, professional, or local retailing capacity, or in the capacity of outside salesman (as such terms are defined and delimited by regulations of the Secretary of Labor, subject to the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act); or

"(2) any employee employed by any retail or service establishment, more than 50 per centum of which establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of goods or services is made within the State in which the establishment is located. A 'retail or service establishment' shall mean an establishment 75 per centum of whose annual dollar volume of sales of goods or services (or of both) is not for resale and is recognized as retail sales or services in the particular industry; or

"(3) any employee employed by any establishment engaged in laundering, cleaning or repairing clothing or fabrics, more than 50 per centum of which establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of such services is made within the State in which the establishment is located: Provided, That 75 per centum of such establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of such services is made to customers who are not engaged in a mining, manufacturing, transportation, or communications business; or".

And to amend the title so as to read: "A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for certain employees engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the Act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes."

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, I am concerned about the economic and constitutional implications of the Kennedy minimum wage bill. There are many things about this bill which bother me, but I shall only take the time to comment on three significant points. One relates to the wage-setting function in our type of society and the means by which this should be accomplished. The second is my conviction that the bill in its present form is going to hurt, instead of help, the people it is intended to help—the low-income groups. My third concern is with the attempt through this proposed legislation to further weaken the power of the States and to concentrate power in the Federal Government, through the interstate commerce test as contained in the bill, to determine what firms should be covered.

Before discussing these points, I should like to make one thing clear: I have no quarrel with the moral argument for the minimum wage law. The original act had as its objective the elimination of labor conditions "detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standard of living necessary for health, efficiency, and general well-being of workers." This is a worthy goal, and I support the concept. But the Kennedy bill, although tied to that policy statement, will not accomplish its goal, and in the attempt to do so will threaten to destroy the freedom and the productive resiliency of our society.

Let me also emphasize that in opposing the increase in the minimum wage, I have no ax to grind. In the businesses with which I am connected in my home State, the lowest wages are considerably above the $1.25 proposed minimum. My objections are based solely upon my concern about the effect this bill will have on the economy.

Regarding my first point, I believe wages should be set by collective bargaining or other privately negotiated means, and that the power of the Federal Government should not be used to raise them. In other words, the minimum wage should be a floor, not an elevator.

When the minimum wage is raised, it can have one or both of two effects: First, it may force an increase in all wages at levels below the new minimum, wages arrived at by collective bargaining or other means; thus increasing costs without any corresponding increase in productivity. Second, it may have the effect of raising wages at every level, under the reasoning that historic differences must be preserved.

Consider, for example, the case of a skilled mechanic, earning $4 an hour, who observes that the Federal Government has forced a janitor's wages up 25 percent from $1 to $1.25 per hour. If he does not demand a 25-percent wage increase, which in his case would be $1, he at least will demand a 25-cent increase. In organized employment, the power of labor unions can virtually compel such a dollars and cents matching, if not some of the percentage differential. And when employment is high, as is currently the case in our economy, the restoration of differentials may occur even in the absence of union pressure.

Thus, we have a situation whereby wage rates in the economy are tied to someone else's minimum wage, rather than to the productivity of the individual worker.

This is exactly what happened in 1949, when the minimum wage was increased to 75 cents. A Department of Labor study released last year showed that wage differentials were almost completely restored. Undoubtedly this was a factor in the inflation which occurred during the years immediately following.

And in the 1956 minimum wage increase the Labor Department report showed that although there were many exceptions, the general tendency was for occupational wage differentials to be narrowed as an immediate effect of the minimum wage differentials and to be wholly or partially restored subsequently.

It is generally agreed that a minimum wage law is supposed to be a floor through which wages should not be allowed to drop, a device to relieve or prevent a distress situation. The Kennedy bill is a dangerous departure from this concept. To attempt to solve our economic welfare needs through a minimum wage law is just as foolish as trying to pull yourself up by your bootstraps. Congress, unfortunately, cannot abolish poverty by such a law. It may strike at symptoms but does not go to its roots.

This brings up my second point. Many small businesses not previously covered are going to find it difficult to meet the minimum wage, and those previously covered will find it economically impossible or inadvisable to pay the substantial increase suggested in the Kennedy bill. The result will be that either they will be forced to cut marginal producers out of their labor force, or they may be compelled to go out of business. Either way, the result is unemployment. And the unemployment will affect the very same people this bill is supposed to help—those with the lowest earning capacity.

The proponents of the bill argue that the increases can be taken care of through increases in productivity. The committee report argues that since our productivity has risen 15 percent since 1955, the initial 15-percent increase in the minimum wage to $1.15 is justified. This assumes that all covered workers increased their productivity by this amount. Actually, it only refers to production workers in manufacturing. Total nonagricultural employment shows only an 8.2-percent increase over the same period.

Even if the rate of minimum wage increases were no greater than the rate of productivity increases, this is still no justification for the Kennedy bill. I cannot subscribe to the theory that all of our increases in productivity should go to the workers themselves. Actually, a businessman must keep five different groups happy: First, the buyers of his product; second, his employees; third, his stockholders; fourth, the demand of his suppliers for adequate payment on request of materials and supplies; and fifth, the demands of government which considers a business something to be taxed and regulated. He must somehow strike a balance that will satisfy all five groups. If he fails to satisfy even one of the five, he is eventually out of business.

Those who desire to give all of our productivity increases to labor are doing so at the expense of these other groups. I am particularly concerned about the consumer, who has every right to a real share of the gains in productivity; and the only way the consumer can get them is through lower prices. In fact, in my opinion, this should have priority. Also neglected in this concept are those who furnish the capital, which is the very foundation of our technological progress and thus the increase in productivity itself. If we fail to provide the investment incentives necessary to furnish the investment funds, we may find all groups, including the workingman, hurt by a lower rate of productivity.

Even assuming that all of the productivity increase should go to the worker, it should be remembered that productivity figures are averages and do not reflect the variations in individual companies let alone the variations among workers. It is most likely that the marginal workers, who are receiving low wages, have a productivity which is well below the average. I was interested in Senator GOLDWATER'S presentation yesterday when he showed studies from two universities and quoted from eminent economists to the effect that productivity in the retail trades is considerably below that for the manufacturing and other trades in our society. Thus, to bring retailers under the minimum wage law on an economic defense based on productivity is unsound and could do great harm to business. There is no doubt that a wage increase can be justified for those workers who are producing increased output each year, but any arbitrary increase in the minimum wage law which will force up, by legislation, the wages of some workers who do not contribute a great deal to increased productivity will do great harm. It can cause such serious complications that the result will be to force a businessman to either cut down his labor force or to go out of business.

The consequences would be most harsh on whole families dependent on the added dollars that working wives and younger members bring in. Students would be deprived of needed experience. Older persons who work only to keep occupied or to supplement their income would be deprived of opportunities.

In this connection, consider also a statement in the Secretary of Labor's report of February 15, 1960, on the Fair Labor Standards Act. Commenting on the effects of the 1956 minimum wage increase to $1, the report states on page 1, part II:

> During the period of adjustment to the higher minimum, there were significant declines in employment in most of the low wage industry segments studied.

An example of how such a situation can arise is illustrated by what happened in a Kentucky clothing factory in 1933 when the NRA fixed a minimum wage of only 40 cents per hour before the Fair Labor Standards Act was passed in 1938. I obtained this example from a recent issue of Spotlight, in an article by Wilford I. King, nationally known economist and statistician, and past president of the American Statistical Association. Mr. King says:

> Many of the workers in this clothing factory were elderly women who were not capable of speedy action. They had been paid by the piece, and, in many cases, their earnings were less than 40 cents per hour. Competition in the clothing industry was so keen that the factory owner could not raise piece rates and still stay in business. He therefore was compelled to discharge many of these women. Some of them had worked for him for years. They begged him with tears in their eyes to keep them, as they were in dire need of the income. They told him that they had no complaints about the pay or the working conditions which they had enjoyed. He was obliged to respond that he could not stay in business if he paid them the 40 cents per hour required by law, and that, if he paid them less, he would be sent to jail. The women, not being able to find other employment, went on the relief rolls, suffered great mortification by so doing, and were transformed from self-supporting, self-respecting citizens into paupers depending for their livings upon largess furnished by the taxpayers.

Of course the general wage level is much higher today even for such workers. But in keeping with today's wage levels we must be careful with our minimum wage laws. Complete reliance on the altruistic policy of forcing up low level economic standards to the neglect of the economic standards outlined in the act may completely destroy both concepts.

My last point relates to our Federal-State relationships as established by the Constitution. Article X of the Constitution states that:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

This bill is another move in a diversified program whose objective seems to be destroy the power of the States and concentrate power in the Federal Government. This sounds like an old story, but it is a very real one, and this proposal contributes to it very specifically.

For many generations, we have recognized the difference between interstate and intrastate commerce, and limited the activity of the Federal Government to the regulation of those businesses which were obviously interstate in nature. This bill, by the simple device of using dollar ceilings to determine coverage, completely destroys the old concept. Some industries will get exemption under this bill, but if the bill itself is adopted and the new principle of size rather than type of service is validated, then it will only be a question of time until the curtain will come down on the idea that there is any intrastate business. Everybody, regardless of size, will be under the domination of Federal regulations. It is that simple and that serious.

The present criterion for determining interstate employment is a direct one. It is based strictly on the activity of an individual employee, and if that individual employee is not producing goods or directly handling or transporting goods in interstate commerce he does not come under the law.

The administration bill attempts to set up an automatic standard, but in such a way as to preserve the interstate concept. In that bill, an inflow concept is used whereby new coverage is limited to businesses receiving more than $1 million per year of goods and supplies from other States and employing 100 or more persons.

The Kennedy bill, in using a dollar sales test, makes no reference at all to the inflow and outflow of goods. Once the interstate test is put on a dollar sales basis, though the current minimum proposed in the bill is quite high, it will be a simple matter gradually to reduce that minimum from $1 million—and $250,000 in the case of gasoline service stations, some laundries near State borders, and certain other establishments—to near zero, thus covering all of business. I think this is a dangerous step.

Mr. President, I have been in the Senate long enough to know that once we establish a pattern the pressure is constantly on this body to continue to reduce the limits. We in the Committee on Finance reported a bill containing changes in the social security law. A few years ago we wrote into the bill a provision that, in order to become beneficiaries under the social security system, men could not retire before they were 65 years of age, except for total and permanent disability, and we provided that women might have the choice of retiring at 62, if they took a reduced retirement benefit. Last week we took the logical step and said, "Well, if it is all right for women, why should we not permit the men to have the same privilege? We should let them retire at 62."

The same Senator who proposed that then proposed that the age retirement limit for women be lowered to 60.

Once we get on that treadmill, the pressure is always on to broaden the opportunities. Once we adopt the dollar sales criterion as the basis for determining coverage under the minimum wage law we shall go through our normal process and keep reducing it.

It should be noted that the Kennedy bill, in its preamble, would change the scope of the law from any activity in interstate commerce to any activity "affecting interstate commerce." The courts can give the broadcast possible interpretation to the phrase "affecting interstate commerce." In fact, the Kennedy bill assures such a broad interpretation by defining this phrase as any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce. I would say that is about as broad as one can get.

Thus, if a barber uses scissors which were manufactured in a neighboring State, under this definition his business could conceivably be considered "interstate commerce."

Obviously, this proposed legislation is the opening wedge of an effort to apply the minimum wage concept to all business activity, regardless of whether it is interstate or intrastate, and regardless of size. Placing under Federal control thousands of small business establishments which are primarily local in character would be a serious and unfortunate change in our traditional Federal-State system of government, and this worries me.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BENNETT. I am happy to yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I find myself on this side of the aisle momentarily.

I have listened with interest to my colleague. I believe I heard him use the term "regardless of size."

Mr. BENNETT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Of course, the Senator from Utah realizes that no coverage would occur except with respect to a business institution doing a million dollars' worth of business a year or more.

Mr. BENNETT. I am afraid my colleague from West Virginia did not come in soon enough.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am sorry.

Mr. BENNETT. I had explained earlier that was the present limitation, and the limitation in the bill, but I expressed my conviction, based upon the experience I have had in the Senate, that if this criterion were to be adopted the next move would be to cut the limit further. When I say "regardless of size," I am assuming that this might be the ultimate effect of the decision to change our criterion from the nature of the business to the dollar size of the business.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I appreciate the explanation of my colleague. I did understand exactly what he had said. When I heard "regardless of size," I thought those words stood on their own, and there is a definite limitation in the bill.

Mr. BENNETT. The Senator from Utah understands that, but he is pointing to what he thinks will be the ultimate effect down the long road.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank my friend.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BENNETT. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. If the regulation of hours or wages is to be looked at from the standpoint of the individual who is to receive them, and if consideration is to be on the basis of what the individual is entitled to as a human being, why should we bring in the question of size?

Mr. BENNETT. I agree. I personally feel that the nature of the business is more vital to the basic concept of our relationship.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I raise this question because the other day I happened to be talking with an automobile dealer in a city in South Dakota. Knowing that the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT] is an automobile dealer, I raise this question.

In speaking of automobiles, we deal with a unit of business that rapidly runs into a great many dollars.

Mr. BENNETT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I have felt that it was necessary and essential to the automobile business that an adequate service department be maintained. The automobile dealers said that increasingly they faced competition from services performed by small filling stations, which would add an employee or two and take over a great deal of the minor servicing, at least, and under a strict dollar division as the dividing line between the application of the law and the nonapplication, they found themselves in a discriminatory competition. A great deal of the bread and butter servicing was being taken over by the filling stations or by small garages which did not have the dollar volume to bring them under the law, but because they sold automobiles and were dealing in a large dollar volume, they found themselves coming under the law. So they felt it resulted in discriminatory and unfair competition.

I should be glad to have the comment of the Senator on that subject, particularly in view of the fact that he knows the automobile industry as few men in the Senate know it.

Mr. BENNETT. Having been in the automobile business for 20 years, I can remember many occasions in which an excellent mechanic, having an established friendship with many fine people, decided that he could earn more repairing their cars in a garage in the back of his lot than he could with the dealer. He pulled out of the organized dealership, moved into his own garage, and went to work.

Some of them have succeeded; many of them have not. In the meantime such persons have created exactly the situation which the Senator from South Dakota describes.

They put themselves in the position to render an identical service at a much cheaper price and free of the limitations of a law such as the one placed on his former employer.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. And he could probably have one or two additional employees if he wanted to and still stay under the dollar exemption?

Mr. BENNETT. I could give the Senator from South Dakota a better example from my business experience in another business with which I have been connected for 40 years. We have a glass and paint business in Salt Lake City. When we started in that business 40 years ago we maintained a service to the retail customers of fixing windows. We sent a glazier out to repair windows. But our glaziers discovered that they could undersell us if they did not have any overhead, and so now in Salt Lake City none of the large glass dealers do any of that kind of glazing. The work has been taken over completely by our former employees and those of our competitors.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That is a striking example, but in the paint business perhaps a proprietor can eliminate the glazing business and still maintain a good service. It would be difficult for an automobile dealer who sells an automobile not to be in a position to provide the parts and repairs.

Mr. BENNETT. That is true, but it has had the effect with those of us who began in the business of forcing us out of the business. We could not compete. There are many reasons, of which this is only one. This is a very real problem for the automobile dealers. And there are other factors involved in the Kennedy bill which could affect them. One that comes to mind immediately is the overtime problem. But the general observation is true that if we put a size criterion on the bill, we encourage people to get out from under that criterion in one way or another.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Another aspect of the problem that was presented to me was that a man comes in with his automobile. The mechanic who works on that automobile ought to finish the job. It is a bit difficult. Certainly there is some lost motion, some lost time, and some lost efficiency when a mechanic who starts a brake job or an overhauling job on an automobile, for example, quits when his 40 hours are up and somebody else takes over his job to finish. At the same time, most of the mechanics who work on such jobs are paid a wage well above the minimum.

Mr. BENNETT. There is no question of minimum wages involved in that. That is one very real problem. It is so near my own experience I decided that it might be improper for me to discuss that subject as a part of my prepared statement.

Senator George Sutherland, of Utah, was appointed to the Supreme Court. In 1910, before he was appointed to the Court, and while he was still a Senator, he made this statement:

> While maintaining the power of the general government to adequately meet and deal with every external situation which affects the general welfare of the United States, it is no less essential to maintain the supreme power of the State governments to deal with every question which affects only the domestic welfare of the several States.

And Leonard D. White in his book "The States and the Nation" observed:

> If present trends continue for another quarter century, the States may be left hollow shells, operating primarily as the field districts of Federal Departments and dependent upon the Federal Treasury for their support.

If any of my colleagues have any doubt that the States are meeting the minimum wage problem within their own borders I refer them to page 16222 of last Thursday's RECORD where a table was inserted in the RECORD by the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] showing that 28 States, including my own State of Utah, have adopted minimum wage laws since World War II. A 29th State, Arkansas adopted the first minimum wage law in 1915. Five of these States enacted their first laws within the past 3 years, and most of the States have revised their laws in that same period. Who knows their own local employment situation better than the States themselves? I hope the Federal Government does not try to assume control over these strictly intrastate concerns.

In the genuine interest of marginal and low income workers and in the interest of our free enterprise system I urge the rejection of the Kennedy bill.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its deliberations today it stand in recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand, Mr. President, the time this evening will not be divided. We shall keep the Senate in session as long as any Senator desires to address the Senate, but then I ask that the motion be made to recess in accordance with the order just entered.

NEEDED: A MARSHALL PLAN FOR THE AMERICAS

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, all of us are deeply aware of the multitude of pressing problems which should and must be resolved before Congress concludes its work this session. But of all the matters before us today, one of the most important is meeting the need for a Marshall plan for the Americas.

It is regrettable that such a plan was not instituted several years ago—advanced in the same spirit of human decency and "help for self-help" in which the Marshall plan was used to rehabilitate war-torn Europe.

We should have launched, voluntarily, such a program as Americans concerned about the plight of their neighbors; now, due to the administration mishandling of the Cuban situation, we find ourselves virtually forced to begin a Marshall plan for the Americas.

Our trouble in Cuba today stems not only from the hostility and bad judgment of Castro, but from the Republican administration's incredible brand of drift diplomacy. Given rope, Castro will surely hang himself, but it is up to us to correct our mistakes in the field of foreign policy, and particularly our lack of knowledge of our American neighbors.

The more we know about the Americas, the better we will get along with our neighbors to the South. The higher their prosperity, the better our joint solidarity.

Prompt establishment of a Marshall plan for the Americas is a basic step in the right direction. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an excellent editorial on the subject from the Monday, August 15, issue of the Washington Post entitled, "Chance for the Hemisphere."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHANCE FOR THE HEMISPHERE

A rare opportunity to lend eloquence to the voice of America will soon be before Congress in the form of the administration's new aid proposals for the hemisphere. That opportunity lies in creation of the framework for a help-for-self-help program that can provide something beyond uncoordinated dabs and expressions of alarmed concern for the economic problems faced by the American Republics.

The proposals for a $600 million authorization, it is true, are vague to the point of despair. They bear the earmarks of a hasty effort to give the appearance of doing something without thinking the problem through or spending any money now. Nevertheless, the vagueness ought not to blind Congress to the immensity of the challenge in Latin America or to the psychological importance of enlisting the cooperation of the American Republics themselves in the planning stage.

Senator MANSFIELD has given a hard-hitting start to the debate. In his speech last week on Latin America the Montana Democrat quite rightly took account of past failures. His comments on Cuba, reprinted elsewhere on this page, set a standard of calmness and sobriety. But if Mr. MANSFIELD resisted the temptation of twisting Dr. Castro's beard in order to get attention, he succumbed to negativism on the urgency of a new cooperative aid effort.

The plain fact is that the United States cannot afford to postpone a fresh start on Latin American policy. Up and down the hemisphere this country is on the defensive. Our friends are disheartened about our seeming inability to get going—particularly by contrast with the fervid dynamism that Cuba is seeking to export.

The President has pledged a massive, cooperative aid program for the American Republics. Our negibhors are awaiting further details at the September economic conference in Bogotá. To go to the meeting emptyhanded would involve not only a loss of face, but also a grevious loss of initiative.

What can Congress do to give a vigorous push? One simple phrase has a good deal of magic in Latin America, and it is too bad that administration officials have shied from using it. The phrase is "Marshall plan."

It is important to recall that the key to the plan's success was the superb integrating function performed by the Organization for European Economic Cooperation. Each recipient country was represented in the OEEC, and in addition to providing a pattern for reconstruction, the OEEC helped to lay the groundwork for subsequent supranational authorities. The effect was far more significant than a mere input of dollars. The cooperative effort stimulated an enormous expansion of private economies.

Could not the Latin Americans be invited, as a first step, to form a counterpart to the OEEC? Plans for this are already under discussion, and emphatic congressional backing might assure the Bogotá meeting of success. The formation of a Latin American OEEC would go far to meet Senator MANSFIELD'S objections, which are sound in themselves, of the lack of integration in the grab bag of existing programs.

Although Latin America lags behind Europe in technology, a greater political, cultural, and linguistic unity prevails. The existence of a flourishing Organization of American States provides a foundation of experience for further multilateral action. Common market negotiations are already under way in Central and South America.

Rather than find reasons to delay action at this time, Congress ought to examine the reality of the U.S. position in the hemisphere. Both party platforms stress the need for a new approach, and the presidential nominees are in agreement in urging a more vigorous hemisphere policy. This conviction ought to find expression in a resolution pledging bipartisan support for a program in the tradition of the Marshall plan.

New challenges require new instruments. Latin Americans have repeatedly talked about the need for a Marshall plan for the Americas. The first move ought to be to outline a cooperative venture in which all neighboring republics can pool their resources for a head-on attack against squalor and stagnation. Congress has an opportunity—and a responsibility—to help arrest the drift and set in motion a policy of action.

RESOLUTIONS OF SOUTH DAKOTA DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, the South Dakota Department of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, at its recent department convention in Aberdeen, adopted a number of important resolutions.

I deem it a high privilege to be able to call to the attention of my colleagues these resolutions and request permission to have them included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS OF SOUTH DAKOTA DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS

RESOLUTION 1, TO ESTABLISH A PENSION PROGRAM SPECIFICALLY FOR WORLD WAR I VETERANS

Whereas the majority of World War I veterans are not and will not be in a position to enjoy maximum benefits under the Social Security Act, or public or private retirement systems, and during many of their productive years the country was in a general depression with attendant unemployment and low wage rates; and

Whereas the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States has, for many years, urged the Congress of the United States to enact legislation providing a separate and more liberal pension program for World War I veterans, which would be a fully justified and sensible solution of the increasing problems of World War I veterans resulting from disabilities and age; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States apparently has not considered favorably any proposal to substantially liberalize the pension program for the entire group of 22 million veterans, but may approve a more liberal program for the obvious greater needs of the World War I veteran group of less than 2,700,000 veterans; and

Whereas the increased cost of living justifies increased pension payments and increased income limitations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we continue to rightfully and aggressively seek from the Congress of the United States a more liberal pension program for World War I veterans, based on reasonable disability, income and age criteria.

RESOLUTION 2, NAVY DISCHARGE REVIEW BOARD

Whereas the findings of the Navy Discharge Review Board are subject to approval by the Secretary of the Navy; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Navy, through his subordinates, has set aside many favorable recommendations made by the Navy Discharge Review Board; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Army has delegated authority for final approval of the findings of the Army Discharge Review Board to the President of that Board; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Air Force, for all intents and purposes, delegated authority for final approval of the findings of the Air Force Discharge Review Board to the President of that Board: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That the Secretary of Defense be requested to investigate the policies and procedures of the Navy Discharge Review Board and direct the Secretary of the Navy to promulgate and implement regulations consistent with those of the Departments of the Army and Air Force pertaining to final approval of findings of Discharge Review Board.

RESOLUTION 4, OBSERVANCE OF VETERANS DAY

Whereas Armistice Day, November 11, was redesignated as Veterans Day in 1954, by the President of the United States, in honor of the veterans of all wars; and

Whereas Veterans Day in the past has been marred by public apathy in its observance; and

Whereas certain businesses have remained open for business purposes; and

Whereas Veterans Day is entitled to the same observance as all other national holidays: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Veterans of Foreign Wars demand that proper observance of Veterans Day be had, and that we encourage the National Chamber of Commerce and each local chamber of commerce to call upon their members to remain closed during the day the same as for all other national holidays; be it further

Resolved, That the Veterans of Foreign Wars take such steps that are necessary to observe Veterans Day; be it further

Resolved, That the above resolution be presented to the next national convention through the proper channels; be it further

Resolved, That each department secure ratification of Veterans Day as a national holiday in those States which as yet have failed to ratify the same.

RESOLUTION 5, OPPOSING THE CARRIER-CONDITIONAL APPOINTMENT SYSTEM IN THE FEDERAL CIVIL SERVICE

Whereas the U.S. Civil Service Commission, by the adoption of a new regulation, established a career and career-conditional appointment system; and

Whereas all appointees in the classified civil service system must now serve a period of 3 years before they become eligible for career permanent status; and

Whereas, previous to this new regulation, a veteran preference eligible and other appointees were only required to serve a 1-year probationary period; and

Whereas, the present career-conditional appointment system used by the Civil Service Commission is believed to be a violation of the intent, purpose and provisions of the Veterans Preference Act of 1944, as amended: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That the National Legislative Service urge the issuance of an Executive order which will amend the career-conditional appointment system to require that a veteran preference employee need only to serve a satisfactory probationary period of 1 year before being eligible for permanent career status; and be it further

Resolved, That in the event it is not possible to secure the aforesaid Executive order, the National Legislative Service seek legislation which would accomplish the purpose of this resolution by amending the Veterans Preference Act of 1944 to require that veteran preference eligibles serve only 1 year probationary period and then acquire permanent career status.

RESOLUTION 6, VETERAN HOME LOAN PROGRAM

Be it resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we recommend approval of the following:

1. Extension of World War II loan guarantee and direct loan program.

2. Opposition to increase in the present 5.25 percent interest rate for VA direct and guaranteed loans.

3. In progressive disability cases, the VA should be granted authority to anticipate loss of use of lower extremities to facilitate timely approval of grants for specially adapted housing.

4. Oppose any consolidation of home loan guarantee service rendered in regional or district offices.

RESOLUTION 7, GOVERNMENT INSURANCE PROGRAM

Be it resolved, by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we seek approval of the following recommendations by administrative changes or legislation, as applicable.

1. Authorization for veterans of World War II and Korea with service on and after October 8, 1940, to September 2, 1945, and from June 27, 1950, to January 31, 1955, uninsurable because of service-connected disabilities, to purchase nonparticipating life insurance under section 722(a), title 38, United States Code, for a period of not less than 1 year from the effective date of amendatory legislation.

2. Authorization for World War II and Korean veterans to apply for new national service life insurance policies for a period of not less than 1 year after the date of approval of such legislation.

3. Proration of dividends when insurance becomes a claim, if necessary to maintain the insurance in force.

4. Reinstatement privileges under national service life insurance policies permitting waiver of good health requirements if the only bar to good health is service-connected disabilities and application for reinstatement is submitted within 2 years from date of lapse, as now permitted under U.S. Government life insurance policies.

5. Statutory authorization for waiver of service-connected disabilities for the purpose of reinstating H or RH policies.

6. Extension of the time limitation for applying for RH insurance to 1 year from date of restoration to competency or the appointment of a guardian, whichever is earlier, in any case in which a veteran entitled to RH insurance became incompetent from nonservice-connected disability within 1 year from the date of the VA award granting service connection.

7. Waiver of service-connected disabilities to permit the granting of total disability income provision on national service life inservice connection.

8. Authorization for exchange of NSLI policies for insurance on a new modified life plan which shall be automatically reduced by one-half of the face value thereof at age 65.

9. Continuing strong opposition to any proposal to separate the present veterans insurance program from the Veterans' Administration by the establishment of a separate insurance corporation or otherwise.

RESOLUTION 8, WAIVERS AND FORFEITURES

Be it resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we seek approval of the following recommendations, by legislation or administrative changes, as applicable:

1. Section 3102, title 38, United States Code, be amended to read as follows:

"There shall be no recovery of overpayments of any benefits (except servicemen's indemnity) under any of the laws administered by the Veterans' Administration from any person who in the judgment of the Administrator is without fault on his part or where in the judgment of the Administrator such recovery would defeat the purpose of benefits otherwise authorized, or would be against equity and good conscience."

2. Veterans' Administration regulations concerning section 3102, title 38, United States Code, should be more liberal in defining the word "fault." The Veterans' Administration does not classify the degree of fault as "gross", "slight," and "very slight." If there is fault on the part of the claimant, the degree of fault should be determined, and if it is less than gross fault, the overpayment should be waived.

3. If an overpayment was created by error on the part of the Veterans' Administration, the overpayment, within reasonable monetary limitations to be established, should be automatically waived.

4. The Veterans' Administration should be granted authority to compromise indebtedness regardless of fault where there is demonstrated inability to pay or payment would create hardship.

5. Legislation should be enacted directing a review of all past forfeiture cases based on fraud under reasonable statutory criteria.

6. Authority to pay disability compensation forfeited for fraud to the veteran's wife, child or parents, if they did not participate in the fraud, should be reinstated.

RESOLUTION 9, PENSION PROGRAM

Be it resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we recommend approval of the following:

1. Pension rates and income limitations should be increased.

2. Provisions of the Veterans Pension Act of 1959 which require consideration of the veteran's net worth and his spouse's income should be repealed.

3. In defining income for pension purposes, social security, railroad retirement, and all other private and public retirement or pension payments should be excluded.

4. Employment, including management of one's own farm or business, at less than half the usual hours or less than half the usual remuneration, or permanent employment at less than minimum wage required by Federal law, should not be considered to be "substantially gainful employment" for pension purposes if the inability to secure or retain better employment is due to disability.

5. Laws administered by the VA should classify participation in campaigns and expeditions involving hostilities as wartime service for pension purposes.

6. Totally disabling active pulmonary tuberculosis should be considered to be permanent for pension purposes, commencing with date of hospital admission by reason thereon, and such permanent and total disability should be considered to exist until it is clearly established that the veteran has regained ability to follow a substantially gainful occupation.

7. The full amount of pension withheld from a veteran during incarceration in a penal institution should be subject to apportionment on behalf of his dependents (including parents).

RESOLUTION 10, COMPENSATION PROGRAM

Be it resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we seek approval of the following recommendations by administrative changes or legislation, as applicable:

1. Compensation rates, especially for severely disabled veterans, should be increased.

2. Compensation rates for disability incurred in combat should be 20 percent higher than regular wartime rates.

3. Campaigns and expeditions involving hostilities should be classified as wartime service for benefit purposes.

4. Service connection in effect for a period of 10 years or longer should not be severed unless originally granted on fraudulent evidence or on the service records of another individual.

5. Psychoses not attributable to willful misconduct should be presumed to be service connected when manifestations thereof were evidenced within 3 years following active duty involving combat experience.

6. Insidious diseases of obscure origin, such as progressive muscular atrophy, should be included in the presumptive period applicable to multiple sclerosis.

7. In the absence of certification by the service department of "not in line of duty" the Veterans' Administration should not adversely determine the question of line of duty, if applicable, particularly in death claims, as the deceased cannot defend himself and the facts which were in his possession, if known, would probably warrant favorable determination.

8. Eligibility to dependency and indemnity compensation should not be precluded in any case because Government life insurance was in force at time of death by waiver of premiums under section 724, title 38, United States Code (formerly sec. 622, NSLI Act).

9. Death compensation rates should be increased to amounts intermediate between the present rates and the higher DIC rates.

10. Death compensation rates should be authorized in any case in which the veteran was permanently disabled by reason of a service-connected disability rated 40 percent or more in severity at time of death.

11. Receipt of lump sum readjustment pay under the provisions of section 265, Armed Forces Reserve Act of 1952, should not bar entitlement to disability compensation based on the same period of service subject to recoupment on the same basis as disability severance pay.

RESOLUTION 11, VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL PROGRAM

Be it resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we seek approval of the following recommendations by administrative changes or legislation, as applicable:

1. Veterans of combat and wartime overseas should be accorded distinct priority, by statute if necessary, for admission to VA hospitals for required treatment of any disability.

2. Eligibility of veterans of campaign and expeditionary service for VA hospitalization and domiciliary care should be established by legislation.

3. Peacetime veterans should be authorized care in VA facilities or outpatient treatment for service-connected disabilities notwithstanding a current rating of less than 10 percent.

4. Outpatient treatment for necessary examinations prior to admission to a VA hospital and for treatment during the period of convalescence following release therefrom should be authorized in order to reduce the average length of hospital stay.

5. Outpatient treatment, including hometown care, should be authorized for all nonservice-connected war veterans in receipt of pension payments.

6. The VA should admit acutely ill veterans immediately and without equivocation in accordance with expressed policy.

7. The number of authorized VA hospital beds should be increased from 125,000 to not less than 130,000.

8. Additional VA hospitals sufficient to care for all eligible veterans should be authorized and expeditiously constructed, with special consideration accorded known areas of concentrated veteran population.

9. An adequate number of proper facilities for long-term care of aged, chronically ill, and financially distressed war veterans should be constructed adjacent to selected VA hospitals where adequate building areas and other facilities are available.

10. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs should be required to annually report direct to the Congress the estimated number of hospital, long-term care, and domiciliary beds needed to provide necessary care for eligible veterans during the succeeding 5-year period.

11. Restrictive recommendations pertaining to hospitalization of veterans in Va facilities proposed by the American Medical Association or any other group should be vigorously opposed.

RESOLUTION 12, VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION AND EDUCATION

Be it resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we seek approval of the following recommendations by legislation:

1. Establishment of the vocational rehabilitation program as a permanent program for service-connected disabled veterans of wartime and peacetime service.

2. Extension of the July 28, 1960, final date for completion of all training under the vocational rehabilitation program for World War II disabled veterans.

3. Mandatory additional service connection for additional disability suffered as a result of complying with recommendations or instructions of a training officer or instructor or from carrying out any phase or detail of an approved training program under the provisions of chapter 31, title 38, United States Code or the prior acts, Public Law 16, 78th Congress, as amended, and Public Law 894, 81st Congress, as amended.

4. Increase of subsistence and training allowance rates under all vocational rehabilitation and education and training programs administered by the VA.

5. Increase of the $310 per month income ceiling applicable to certain training programs under the provisions of chapter 33, title 38, United States Code.

6. Extension of war orphans educational assistance benefits to surviving children of veterans who died as a result (cause or contributory cause) of disease or injury incurred in or aggravated during a period of military service recognized as wartime service for compensation purposes.

7. Extension of war orphans educational assistance benefits to children of veterans who are totally and permanently disabled because of service-connected disabilities incurred during or aggravated by military service recognized as wartime service for compensation purposes.

8. Authorize training until attainment of age 25 under the war orphans educational assistance program (ch. 35, title 38, United States Code) in cases in which existing law precludes payment of benefits beyond a beneficiary's 23d birthday.

RESOLUTION 13, EQUALIZATION OF ARMED FORCES RETIREMENT PAY

Whereas the military pay bill, Public Law 85–422, effective June 1, 1958, established a new military pay scale and authorized only a 6-percent cost-of-living increase to those already retired; and

Whereas in the past, persons retired prior to the effective date of any military pay act have had their retired pay recomputed upon the new military pay rate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That the National Legislative Service of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States support legislation to correct this inequity.

RESOLUTION 14, OPPOSING THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TECHNICIAN PROGRAMS

Whereas the U.S. Air Force has instituted and is operating an Air Reserve technician plan; and

Whereas the U.S. Army is instituting an Army Reserve plan; and

Whereas, the Civil Service Commission has agreed to these plans notwithstanding the opposition by service organizations; and

Whereas these plans violate the Veterans Preference Act of 1944, as amended, and discriminate against disabled veterans and all veterans who do not meet the age requirements for the Reserve programs; and

Whereas, the military rules, regulations, and qualifications supersede the regular Federal civilian employment rules, regulations, and qualifications: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That the national rehabilitation service seek withdrawal of the "Air Force technician plan" and firmly oppose the enactment of any further similar agreements between the Department of Defense and the Civil Service Commission.

RESOLUTION 15, ENDORSING ROTC TRAINING IN AMERICAN COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

Whereas approximately 100,000 young men receive basic military training annually in ROTC units in U.S. colleges and universities; and

Whereas the armed services depend upon ROTC graduates for a substantial number of their commissioned personnel; and

Whereas the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States has consistently recommended some system of national security training to enable American youth to adequately participate in the defense of our nation; and

Whereas there are 94 land grant educational institutions which owe their existence, in large part, to the Federal Government; and

Whereas physical training, discipline, and the obligations of citizenship are as much a part of education as many other subjects: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That American colleges and universities, and the Armed Forces, be encouraged to inaugurate or expand ROTC programs and that where such programs are already in operation every qualified male student attending such colleges or universities be required to participate in ROTC basic training as one of the requirements for obtaining a degree.

RESOLUTION 16, NATIONAL DEFENSE

Whereas the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States has for many years urged the Congress of the United States to enact legislation to provide for a strong national defense force; and

Whereas world conditions and the Communist threat are still a menace to the security of our Nation and the free world: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That—

1. We continue a full combat-ready Marine Corps with the appropriation of sufficient funds to maintain a strength of at least 175,000.

2. The Department of the Army be maintained at a minimum of not less than 870,000.

3. The U.S. Navy be maintained as the strongest and most versatile naval force in history by continuing to modernize the Navy by replacing World War II vessels, by supporting a program of building an adequate number of submarines for the successful defense of the United States and the free world against the growing Soviet submarine force.

4. We urge Congress to appropriate sufficient funds to maintain a strength of the National Guard at 400,000 and 300,000 for Army Reserve.

5. We maintain a strong air striking force and air defense capable of meeting any threat to the security of this Nation.

6. We support a strong national civil defense program, including legislation which would provide for the continuity of our Federal Government in case of thermonuclear attack or other catastrophe.

7. We reaffirm our support of a strong, privately owned and operated American merchant marine as our fourth arm of defense.

8. We advocate continued development of atomic and hydrogen weapons and the necessary testing of such weapons to achieve and preserve world leadership. The successful development of an antimissile missile requires continued testing of missiles until such a defensive weapon is a reality.

9. We approve the control of inter-service space rivalry and urge the Secretary of Defense to exercise said controls with firmness and wisdom to prevent waste and duplication, but not to deny the individual services the right to exercise ingenuity and imagination in initiating and developing approved space projects. We further advocate a complete exchange between the various branches of the Armed Forces of information regarding offensive and defensive armaments and weapons.

RESOLUTION 17, FAVORING A STANDING VETERANS' COMMITTEE IN THE U.S. SENATE

Whereas the U.S. Senate does not have a standing Committee on Veterans' Affairs similar to the Veterans' Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives; and

Whereas it has long been a major objective of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States to have such a committee established with jurisdiction and duties concerning veterans' affairs similar to the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs; and

Whereas the establishment of this committee would help produce more harmonious and beneficial relations between the U.S. Senate and all veterans and their families; and

Whereas the establishment of this committee would eliminate the charge that the Senate is failing to fully discharge its obligation to veterans, their widows and dependents; and

Whereas a special subcommittee of the Senate Rules and Administration Committee has recommended that a standing Veterans' Affairs Committee be created in the Senate; and

Whereas more than half of the U.S. Senators have indicated they will vote in favor of this recommendation when it is presented to the full Senate for consideration and vote: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we petition the Members of the Senate to take the necessary action toward establishment of a standing Committee on Veterans' Affairs so that all veterans, their widows, and dependents will be fully represented in the U.S. Senate.

RESOLUTION 18, TO PROTECT THE SECURITY AND SOVEREIGNTY OF THE UNITED STATES

Whereas according to its congressionally bestowed charter, one of the major reasons for the formation of the Veterans of Foreign Wars was "to preserve and defend the United States from all her enemies, whomsoever"; and

Whereas Nikita Khrushchev, like the leaders of the world Communist movement who have preceded him, has openly threatened the United States and proclaimed the desire and intent of world communism to conquer the free nations of the world by all possible means, including violent overthrow of our Government; and

Whereas, certain subversive groups and movements and their adherents have not ceased their efforts to advance ideologies that would destroy the sovereignty of these United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That—

1. We reaffirm our complete, unwavering opposition to communism in all its forms, both foreign and domestic, and will resist all Communist policies affecting the United States and all persons who support, defend, aid, and abet them.

2. We reaffirm our opposition to world government, such as Atlantic Union or any other scheme that has as its purpose the surrender of the sovereignty of the United States of America.

3. We strongly support a U.S. foreign policy designed to aid the liberation of the enslaved peoples of the world.

4. We oppose the admission of Red China to the United Nations, its recognition by the United States, and any trade with Red China.

5. We oppose any weakening of the basic security laws of this Nation, including the Internal Security Act, Communist Control Act, and the Smith Act.

6. We oppose any U.S. aid, military or financial, to Communist nations.

7. We endorse and recommend the continuation of the work of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, the House Committee on Un-American Activities and other Federal and State agencies charged wtih protecting the internal security of the United States.

8. We urge the renegotiation of the status-of-forces treaties to more clearly define the jurisdiction of criminal courts of foreign countries with respect to U.S. servicemen.

RESOLUTION 20, DEDUCTIONS FROM INCOME UNDER PUBLIC LAW 86–211

Whereas Public Law 86–211, the new pension law which becomes effective July 1, 1960, provides that the amount paid by the widow or child of a deceased veteran for his just debts, the cost of his last illness and the cost of his burial in excess of burial benefits paid by the Veterans' Administration may be deducted from the total of all income as that income of the widow or child is computed for pension purposes; and

Whereas benefits deriving to the widows and children of deceased veterans as a result of this provision might also derive to veteran applicants for pension under Public Law 86–211; and

Whereas entitlement of veterans to any benefit paid by the Veterans' Administration should at least equal that of widows and children of deceased veterans: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, by this resolution, go on record as favoring the inclusion of the right of veterans making application for pension benefits under Public Law 86–211 to deduct the just debts of his deceased wife, the cost of her last illness and the cost of her

burial as he computes his income for pension purposes as a proposed change in Public Law 86-211; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted, through channels, to the national headquarters of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, thence to the 61st national convention for proper consideration and appropriate action.

RESOLUTION 21, FAVORING ENACTMENT OF H.R. 9336, A BILL CONCERNING WORLD WAR I PENSIONS

Resolved, That it is the sense of this session that, meeting in regular session we place ourselves on record as favoring the enactment by Congress of H.R. 9336 which, among other things, favors a pension for those of the First World War; and be it further

Resolved, That we direct that copies of this resolution be forwarded to Honorables GEORGE C. MCGOVERN and E. Y. BERRY, Members of the House of Representatives, Washington, D.C., and the Honorables CARL E. MUNDT and FRANCIS CASE, Members of the U.S. Senate, from the State of South Dakota; and be it further

Resolved, That we ask of the four to use their good offices to have H.R. 9336 cleared from the House Veterans' Affairs Committee and placed upon the floor of the House so the Members may vote upon it; and be it further

Resolved, That we ask our Congressional Representatives, BERRY, MCGOVERN, MUNDT, and CASE to favor, by their vote, enactment of H.R. 9336.

RESOLUTION 22, CHANGING THE METHOD OF PAYMENT OF FEDERAL AID TO THE STATE SOLDIERS' HOME

Whereas the State of South Dakota has a State soldiers' home; and

Whereas the Federal Government pays for part of the expense of operating the home through the payment of a sum of money each year to the State of South Dakota for each veteran residing in the home; and

Whereas the support of the veterans residing in the home is and should be a basic obligation of the Federal Government; and

Whereas a bill is now before the Congress of the United States to increase the amount paid by the Federal Government toward the support of the veterans residing in the home by increasing the payments from $700 per year per veteran to $2.50 per day per veteran; and

Whereas it is to the advantage of the State of South Dakota and the people thereof to have as much of the expense of the home as possible paid by the Federal Government; and

Whereas the bill, known as H.R. 10596, passed the House of Representatives on May 2, 1960; and

Whereas H.R. 10596 was read twice in the Senate on May 3, 1960, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Department of South Dakota, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, go on record as favoring the passage of H.R. 10596 by the U.S. Senate before the close of this session of Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge Senators KARL MUNDT and FRANCIS CASE to do all in their power to have H.R. 10596 favorably reported out to the Senate floor by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and that we further urge them to vote in favor of H.R. 10596 when it is considered by the U.S. Senate.

RESOLUTION 24

Whereas the Congress of the United States and the respective sovereign States have provided that a full-functioning employment service be operated in the Nation for all workers seeking job placement and for employers in securing qualified workers; and

Whereas these agencies have the legal and moral responsibility of providing employment counseling services as well as the maximum of job opportunity to all veterans; and

Whereas experience has shown that only through an adequately financed and effective organization from local, State, and national offices can the objectives of this service be accomplished: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Department of South Dakota, in convention assembled at Aberdeen, S. Dak., this 13th day of June 1960, That we strongly advocate and urge the Congress of the United States to appropriate adequate funds to insure the continued operations of an effective State employment service as well as the veterans' employment service; that copies of this resolution be forthwith forwarded by department adjutant to each member of our congressional delegation.

RESOLUTION 26, EXPRESSING HOPE TO CUBA

Whereas elements of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, our comrades of the Spanish-American War, died or were wounded or became ill with tropical diseases to liberate the people of Cuba; and

Whereas the people of Cuba and the United States have enjoyed an uninterrupted and close friendship throughout our history; and

Whereas that friendship was further demonstrated in two World Wars during which Cubans and Americans fought and died side by side, and was strengthened through the years by numerous exchanges in all fields of endeavor; and

Whereas official relations between our two countries have become strained during recent months: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the Department of South Dakota, in annual convention assembled, this 13th day of June 1960, That we shall continue to extend the hand of friendship on a people-to-people basis to our friends, the people of Cuba, with sympathy for their desire for progressive social changes and economic betterment, but with the hope that, having shed one form of tyranny, they not be enslaved by another.

RESOLUTION 29, NONVETERAN PATIENTS IN VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION HOSPITALS

Whereas the Congress of the United States has seen fit to authorize the construction, operation, and maintenance of a system of hospitals for the care and treatment of sick, disabled, and needy veterans of this country in several wars; and

Whereas the construction, operation, and maintenance of this system of hospitals at a size sufficient to meet the needs of all veterans who might be forced to ask for the care and treatment authorized for them by the Congress of the United States, has been down through the years, and presently is of vital concern to the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States did delegate to the Veterans' Administration only the responsibility of the construction, operation, and maintenance of this system of hospitals, and

Whereas the Veterans' Administration has by central office directive of recent date, seen fit to authorize the care of nonveteran patients who are the direct responsibility of Government agencies other than the Veterans' Administration, and

Whereas this Veterans' Administration directive authorizes care and treatment far beyond that which true emergencies and humanitarian needs might call for: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States take that action immediately necessary to effect the recision of any and all Veterans' Administration directives which permit the treatment of nonveteran patients in Veterans' Administration hospitals except for that treatment required to meet emergency and humanitarian needs; and be it further

Resolved, That, as new directives are prepared to permit this emergency and humanitarian treatment they shall be specific and restrictive in the definition of emergency and humanitarian needs to the end that no reasonable question can be raised as to their real meaning and intent.

WILLIAM J. RADIGAN,
Adjutant, Department of South Dakota VFW.

REPORT ON REVIEW OF CAPEHART HOUSING PROJECTS BY COMPTROLLER GENERAL—STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD OF VIRGINIA

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, the Comptroller General of the United States has submitted to me as chairman of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures a report on his review of so-called Capehart housing projects on or near 40 military installations.

I wish to compliment the Comptroller General, Hon. Joseph Campbell, and his General Accounting Office staff for the work they are doing in this matter. I hope it will be continued with vigor. The so-called Capehart program evades appropriation control, and without the Comptroller General's audit there is no independent expenditure review.

I have prepared a statement summarizing this report and commenting upon it. I ask unanimous consent to have this statement prepared by me printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD OF VIRGINIA

CAPEHART HOUSING AUDIT

The Comptroller General of the United States, Hon. Joseph Campbell, has advised me that completed audit reviews of Capehart housing projects at 40 military establishments in 13 States revealed waste, extravagance, inefficiency, and bad practice in at least 9 named categories.

I include a list of the 40 installations covered by the review.

(See exhibit 1.)

This is another in a series of audit reviews on military housing projects the Comptroller General undertook as the result of findings in an audit of a project at Fort Belvoir, Va., in 1959, which was made at my request.

So-called Capehart projects provide housing for military and related personnel on or near military installations. They are financed through private mortgages which are insured by the Federal Housing Administration and guaranteed by the military departments.

At the outset, in the present report, the Comptroller General found construction in excess of need. In 15 of the 40 installations he found 5,900 houses estimated to cost $147 million, including interest, were being built or programed in excess of actual or apparent need.

I include a list of the 15 installations where Capehart housing was found to be in excess of need.

(See exhibit 2.)

These houses in excess of need totaled more than 20 percent of the 26,000 Capehart units built or programed for the 40 installations, and I estimate the nonessential expenditures involved will run to $300 million including maintenance and upkeep costs over the life of the mortgages.

Under present law FHA is authorized to insure up to $2.3 billion in Capehart mortgages. As of April 11, 1960, $1.4 billion had been committed, and more than 107,000 units in 278 projects were completed or under way.

The Comptroller General recommended to the Secretary of Defense that the military departments should reappraise the need for Capehart projects and "reduce or terminate projects which cannot reasonably be justified."

In the course of these audits the Comptroller General found recent defaults on FHA-insured mortgages for 300 civilian units following completion of Capehart projects in the areas. He estimated that "the losses on these properties will range from $540,000 to $1.2 million."

I include a list of the three localities where FHA-insured civilian housing units were found to be in default because of completion of Capehart projects.

(See exhibit 3.)

The report said the significance of Capehart housing on local economy cannot yet be determined, but it is evident that careful consideration must be given to its effect on existing housing in the community.

Urgent need was found in Hawaii for coordination of the Capehart housing programs of the three military departments. Lack of coordination was said to be a material factor in overbuilding on Oahu where units in excess of need totaled 1,700 at an estimated cost of $42 million.

The Comptroller General recommended that the Secretary of Defense establish a central authority in Hawaii to control military housing, and said there was reason to assume that the Hawaii situation could exist in other localities where there is more than one military activity.

The military departments have defeated the purpose of the congressional unit cost limits by making the high cost area maximum the standard for all units. In low cost areas costs have been increased up to the ceiling by adding nonessential luxuries such as prefabricated fireplaces, etc.

The Secretary of Defense was told that military departments should put more emphasis on economy; that controls should be established to assure adequate and desirable housing at minimum cost; and that compliance with the intent of the congressional cost limitation should be enforced.

The report said the Air Force and Army were guilty of circumventing the average per unit cost limitation of $16,500 by improperly using appropriations for costly facilities which should be included in project costs financed under the mortgage. The Comptroller General recommended that the Secretary of Defense stop the practice.

The Air Force was found to be building Capehart housing for officers at costs averaging 37 percent above amounts authorized for housing constructed with appropriated funds. The costs of these units were said to range from $21,000 to $38,000. A report on this matter was made to Congress.

Air Force and Navy were found failing in "several instances" to adjust prices when contractors substituted cheaper materials. The Comptroller General recommended to the Secretary of Defense that he obtain adjustments on the contractors' prices, and institute effective controls for the future.

The audits disclosed that the "military departments, the Air Force in particular, have been lax in proceeding against architect-engineers and construction contractors to recover costs incurred in correcting project deficiencies even though it is apparent that there is probable cause for action."

The Comptroller General estimated that costs amounting to $2 million will be borne by the Government to correct deficiencies at eight projects, and recommended to the Secretary of Defense that the military departments take action to recover these costs.

The review found with respect to housing that military installation personnel are not as well qualified to determine available and usable community support as are the specialists of FHA. The Comptroller General recommended transfer of this function to FHA.

In conclusion, the Comptroller General recommended to the Secretary of Defense that each military department review all proposed Capehart housing projects, in all of their pertinent aspects, to assure full conformity with the law and governing directives.

The Comptroller General said a copy of his report had been sent to the Department of Defense, and that the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Properties and Installations did not agree with his major findings. The Comptroller added that he had considered the Defense Department's comments and "found no reason to make any significant changes in the findings and conclusions in the report."

The report clearly shows waste, extravagance, inefficiency, and bad practice that will result in nonessential expenditures totaling hundreds of millions of dollars in the relatively small fraction of the whole Capehart program covered by these audits.

There are 26,000 units in the projects reviewed by the Comptroller. This represents less than 25 percent of the units under way as of April 11, 1960; and those under commitment at that time represent only about 60 percent of the total mortgage authorization.

Waste, inefficiency, and bad practice are characteristics generally found in mass housing production under federally insured mortgages. These audits show the situation in military projects where responsibility for determining need and other important elements of control are left largely with local post commanders.

I commend the Comptroller General for the work of the General Accounting Office in connection with this program. I hope it will be continued and not relaxed. This Capehart program evades appropriation control, and without the Comptroller General's audit there is no independent expenditure review.

HENRY CABOT LODGE: AMERICA'S ANSWER TO THE COMMUNIST CHALLENGE

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, the August 8 edition of Newsweek magazine carried a cover story on Ambassador to the United Nations Henry Cabot Lodge, the Republican nominee for the Vice-Presidency.

This article, entitled "This Is Cabot Lodge," gives a very fair, colorful, and informative picture of Ambassador Lodge, both as a man and as a public servant. It points up his long and distinguished career at State, National, and international levels, and particularly notes his experience in dealing with the Communists on a day-to-day, all-issues, all-areas basis.

I ask unanimous consent that this interesting article about a great American be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIS IS CABOT LODGE

Even on the jetliner winging west last week from New York to Chicago, almost keeping pace with the reddening glow of the sunset, Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., was establishing the sort of figure he will cut during the coming campaign. Here was the U.S. Ambassador to the U.N., comfortably wedged back in an aisle seat, on his way to the Republican convention to accept his party's nomination for Vice President. Here was a man as pleased and relaxed as he could be. The Ambassador's coat was off.

Lodge—"Cabot" to his family and his close friends—plowed his way through the airline meal-on-a-tray, all the time talking to reporters, signing autographs for other passengers, shaking hands, and in general behaving like a candidate on the go. Lodge is highly accomplished as a handshaking politician; he is at the same time far too much the American aristocrat to be a backslapper. Lodge is affable, but to him, most adult males he meets are "sir," from 21 to 90: "How are you, sir? Delighted to meet you, sir."

Lodge was a newspaperman himself once—as he is fond of recalling—so that he instantly understood a question that a reporter put to him in newspaper terms:

"Mr. Ambassador, the envelopes of clippings about you in our morgue begin in 1932 (when Lodge first ran for the Massachusetts Legislature), and all through the years, they identify you as 'Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., politician,' until you get to the year 1953 (when President Eisenhower named Lodge chief of the U.S. mission to the U.N.). From then on, the envelopes identify you as 'Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., diplomat.' Tell me, sir, how does it feel now to be going back to politician?"

Lodge laughed.

"I wouldn't give up my U.N. experience for anything in the world. But I must admit I like politics. I like campaigning. I like talking to people. After 8 years of talking to foreign diplomats about the problems that divide us, it will be a pleasure to talk to Americans about the problems that we share."

The first thing that strikes people when they meet Lodge is his physical attractiveness—more marked in person even than comes over television—and his enormous physical energy, both of which have been trademarks of his career ever since 1932.

Even today, at 58 and a grandfather eight times over (he has two sons, Henry and George; his newest grandchild—a grandson—was born almost as he was being nominated for the Vice-Presidency), Lodge is by all odds the handsomest of the candidates. A shade under 6 feet 3, Lodge exudes an aura of strength and physical toughness. In his younger days he was a superb horseman and sailor; he was captain of a Harvard crew; he does not smoke, and drinks very sparingly; through the years he has disciplined his body so that today he has apparently endless stamina.

In his younger days, Lodge was a lady-killer of the first water. Besides his physical attractiveness, Lodge comes from one of the very first families of Massachusetts. Whereas JACK KENNEDY is sprung of the powerful, self-made Boston Irish, Lodge is the eighth generation of Massachusetts Cabots (not so much Boston as Salem, Beverly, and Nahant) with the tradition of wealth that began early in the 18th century, first founded on the sailing ship empires of those days, enlivened with a touch of piracy on the high seas. Six of Lodge's ancestors were U.S. Senators, one a Secretary of State, one Secretary of the Navy, one a candidate for Vice President, one a Governor of Massachusetts.

Yet times have changed, and Lodge himself is the first to recognize it. He would be the last man on earth to mention his social background. (Among other things, with two centuries of New England ancestors, it would be gauche.) Lodge, in addition, went out of his way to indicate his personal friendliness with JACK KENNEDY.

"We get along very well, indeed," he said. "In fact, we're related, somehow. One of his cousins is related to a brother of one of my daughters-in-law." He grinned and went on: "I'm even grateful to JACK for 1952. (This was the year when Lodge, acting as President Eisenhower's campaign manager, lost his own Senate seat in an upset at the hands of JACK KENNEDY.) JACK himself has said that some political defeats are good for you. If he hadn't lost to ESTES KEFAUVER (for the Democratic vice-presidential nomination in 1956), he might not be running for President today. Well, if I hadn't lost to JACK, I never would have had 8 years at the U.N., and I might not be running for Vice President."

Lodge went on to mention one problem of KENNEDY's that he understands perfectly: Age. In 1936, running against the redoubtable James M. Curley (James Myself) for the U.S. Senate, Lodge himself was the target of "he's too young" tactics. Then 34, Lodge was "Little Boy Blue" to the Curley forces, but Lodge went on to upset James Myself.

Lodge laughed in recalling this.

"Never, never, during this campaign will I refer to JACK'S age," he promised. "I know just how he feels."

If times have changed so that a Massachusetts Lodge claims a Boston Kennedy for a friend, the times also have changed that see a Henry Cabot Lodge basing his entire political campaign on the American role on world affairs—for to anyone with even an amateur's acquaintance of U.S. history, the name Henry Cabot Lodge recalls Lodge's grandfather, the wily and sardonic U.S. Senator from 1893 to 1924, who killed the treaty that would have put the United States into the League of Nations (against even the protest of the conservative Elihu Root). Today's Lodge hardly thinks of the differences between himself and his grandfather, what he does remember are the things he learned from his grandfather.

Lodge's own father, the Boston poet, George Lodge—died when Lodge was only 7. Lodge remembers his grandfather's house on Massachusetts Avenue in Washington, where President Theodore Roosevelt was an almost daily visitor, coming in through a special door that had been cut to make it easier for him to walk directly into the library. Lodge still remembers the discussions of politics that went on then, and, most of all, two points that his grandfather made.

"An important maxim (in politics)," Lodge has written, "was 'don't be an amateur.'" And the second point: "Journalism," his grandfather said, "is at least the equal of the law as a training for political life."

So, bent on a career of politics, when Lodge got out of Harvard in 1924 (cum laude, after a 4-year course in 3 years), he worked for the old Boston Evening Transcript, moved on to the New York Herald Tribune, where he worked in Europe and the Far East, on the Washington staff, and as editorial writer until 1932. It was that year that Lodge entered politics. He won a seat in the Massachusetts Legislature from the 15th District, which includes Beverly—where even today Lodge maintains his permanent home, a magnificent mansion set directly on Massachusetts Bay. In 1936, Lodge went on to the U.S. Senate—to which he was twice reelected.

In World War II, two significant things happened to Lodge.

First, he changed from an isolationist to an internationalist. (He was the first U.S. Senator ever to resign his seat to go into combat; he saw action in the armored force both in North Africa and in Europe.) He came out of the war firmly convinced that the U.N.—shaky an instrument as it then might have been—represented the only real hope of eventual peace for the world. "The Lodge that came back from the war," he remarked himself, "was not the Lodge that went into it."

And second, in the early days of the war, he met Dwight D. Eisenhower. The two men took an instant liking to each other. It was this liking—and Lodge's conversion to internationalism—that brought Lodge to be one of the very first supporters of Eisenhower for President and made him one of Eisenhower's campaign managers in the months before the 1952 Republican Convention. This, too, may have contributed to his own loss of his Senate seat to JACK KENNEDY in the campaign—he spent almost as much time working for Eisenhower as he did campaigning for himself.

Directly after the election, however, Lodge embarked on the course that was to bring him to the Republican nomination for Vice President. Lodge had been convinced ever since the days of World War II that the Communist dictatorships represented the greatest threat to world peace, and directly after he took office as the U.S. representative to the U.N. he resolved, as he said, "to use that forum on behalf of my country so that the big truth would demolish the big lie of communism. I made it a rule always to speak on the day that the Communists speak so that never, so long as I am Ambassador, will a news story go out to the world which does not contain mention of the U.S. position."

As RICHARD NIXON very well recognized months ago, when it became apparent that the Democrats would make foreign policy a major issue in the campaign, Lodge's years in the U.N. have made him one of the Nation's outstanding figures in knowing how to deal with the Russians.

Lodge's role as escort officer for Nikita Khrushchev's U.S. tour and especially the U.N. affairs of recent months—the case of the microphone hidden in the U.S. Embassy seal in Moscow, the U–2 incident, the Cuba problem, the Congo riots, the RB–47 incident—all have brought Lodge into the homes of the television viewers of the Nation as the forceful, articulate spokesman of the American position vis-a-vis the Russians. It is true that delegates from some of America's strongest allies have complained that Lodge is sometimes more interested in racking up points for the American position than he is in substantive results, but there is no doubt that his U.N. appearances have made him—with the exception of the Secretary of State—America's best known diplomat.

What will Lodge do now?

* * * * *

The man Americans will see will be the epitome of the experienced diplomat—tall, distinguished, thoroughly in command of himself—presenting the Republican answer to the Democratic attacks on the conduct of foreign affairs. And, if need be, taking his coat off.

CHARGES OF GROSS WASTE BY THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, on yesterday my colleague, the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a rebuttal by the Department of Defense to the charges which I had made of gross waste in their procurement practices. It is to be found on pages 16443 to 16447.

I am sorry that their rebuttal was placed in the RECORD yesterday without my knowledge, for when they originally issued it on July 11, 1960, I made a rather thorough statement concerning it. It would have been better had my statement appeared immediately following their rebuttal in the RECORD and I would have placed my statement in the RECORD yesterday had I received notice.

I was deeply disappointed with the reply of the Defense Department. In the first place, they made no reply to my charges that 86 percent of all contracts are negotiated, rather than bid for competitively; that 35 percent, or $14.3 billion, of supplies in the supply system inventory are excess or surplus; that some $60 billion of surplus supplies are to be sold over the next 3 to 4 years and that the Government receives an average of only 2 cents on the dollar of acquisition cost when it sells such surplus. In addition, they did not make any explanation concerning the 52 General Accounting Office reports of excessive prices which the military had paid in contracts in the last 2 years, which I placed in the RECORD at the time of my speech.

DEFENSE DEPARTMENT VOUCHERS SHOW EXCESSIVE PRICES

Second, it should be noted that before I gave my speech concerning gross waste in the Defense Department procurement system, I had in my possession the vouchers made out by the Defense Department itself concerning the 10 items which I used as examples of the more general charges. In each case, these invoices or vouchers, made out by the Defense Department, gave the acquisition cost of the items.

DEFENSE DEPARTMENT CONFIRMED PRICES

In addition to that, before I made my speech I had a staff man make further inquiries of the General Services Administration concerning these items. The General Services Administration inquired of the Defense Department about them, and the facts which I used were then substantially corroborated by the Defense Department itself.

Thus, before I made my speech and before I made these items public, I had two sets of documents: First, the invoices made out by the Department of Defense; and second, confirmation by the Department of Defense, through the General Services Administration, of the essential correctness of the facts.

It was only after I made my speech and made this information public that the Department of Defense claimed that I was in error or that their records were in error or that the information which was on their vouchers or which had been further confirmed by them was in error. I think it is very important to know this when one reads their rebuttal.

Furthermore, apart from their claim now that their own records and/or their own confirmation of the records were in error, they now try to claim that the items were highly specialized or of experimental design.

EXCUSE OF SPECIALIZED ITEMS ABSURD

Mr. President, the physical examination of these items shows just how absurd that claim is.

One of the items—the blower—for which they claim specialized or experimental design was, in fact, patented some 11 to 12 years before the item was procured. The patent documents state that the invention was of "general application," that it had a "wide range of application," that it was "inexpensive," and that the invention resulted in a "minimum size and cost for a given horsepower rating." So that defense does not stand examination.

In addition, on another four of the items, they merely claim that the overall contract was for an item of experimental or specialized design. When it comes to the items themselves, it is found that they were merely a part of the tooling for the contract, and examination indicates that there was nothing about them which could possibly have justified the excessive cost for them.

In addition, with respect to the cable headset, for which they paid $10.67, the General Accounting Office has now furnished me with a breakdown of the cost which the contractor charged and the Department of Defense paid for this item. It is nothing more than a cable of about 6 feet in length, with a jack at one end and a plug at the other. I have priced the same cable at 8 cents a foot if bought in quantity, or 13 cents a foot if bought in small amounts. The plug is worth 54 cents. The company says the jack is worth $2.77; but examination will show this price gives every appearance of being excessive.

EXCESSIVE CHARGES FOR OVERHEAD, HANDLING, ETC.

However, in order to "beef up" the price to $10.67 they are claiming that there should also be added $1.46 for labor, factory overhead of 124 percent or $1.81—which is certainly highly questionable—additional general and administrative costs of 10 percent or 73 cents, a profit of 10 percent or 81 cents, and packaging and handling of 20 percent or $1.80.

I may say, parenthetically, that one could put this item into a box and ship it across the country for 25 cents or 50 cents, at the most. But the fact is that the item was made in Maryland; it never left the plant; and it was physically disposed of at the plant. How they could add $1.80 for the packaging and handling of this item deserves some more detailed explanation. It certainly does not fit the facts.

Mr. President, I could take the time of the Senate to go further into each one of these items. I have already done so in detail; and, as I have said, before I made the prices of them public, I had both the invoices made out by the Defense Department and the Department's substantial confirmation of the facts.

I believe that there is no question about the gross waste involved.

CONGRESS CUT PROCUREMENT FUNDS BY $400 MILLION

Furthermore, the Congress thought so highly of these charges, as well as of the numerous investigations by various congressional committees and the General Accounting Office, that $400 million was cut from the procurement funds of the Defense Department. Inasmuch as I made my speech in connection with the Defense Department appropriation bill, in an effort to get the Senate and the House to accept the $400 million cut voted by the House committee, I think these charges and the various other charges of waste in the Defense Department have been fully vindicated.

What we had hoped that the Department would do was first, cut back on negotiated contracts, second, review their procurement methods, and third, get busy with the various mandates of Congress with respect to integrating the supply systems. But if they reply that no mistakes have been made, and that everything is just fine, then there is the very real danger that Congress must further curtail their expenditures in these areas and insist that the military carry out our mandate.

Personally, I shall continue to expose waste where it exists and make a constant review of their activities, to make certain that the military carry out the mandate of Congress and subordinate themselves to the civilian branch of the Government.

I ask unanimous consent that my statement of July 11 be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR DOUGLAS CONCERNING DEFENSE DEPARTMENT REPLY TO HIS CHARGES OF GROSS WASTE IN PROCUREMENT AND SUPPLY PRACTICES OF THE MILITARY DEPARTMENTS

I am deeply disappointed that the administrative officials of the Department of Defense will not admit making a single mistake with respect to their procurement and supply practices but stubbornly defend their position. My purpose in speaking both generally about procurement and supply practices and in detailing certain specific examples was to try to eliminate wasteful practices in order to help strengthen our national defense and to provide needed combat troops, tanks, planes, guns, missiles, and space vehicles instead of excessive supplies bought at high prices. In my charges, I deliberately did not single out any individual or company in the hope that the Department of Defense might attempt to meet the problems of procurement, supply and surplus disposal in a constructive manner. I am disappointed that they apparently refuse to budge.

In the meantime, I have asked the General Accounting Office both to make a full investigation of the 10 specific items I detailed and to go into perhaps as many as 1,000 additional items. They have agreed to an investigation.

GENERAL REBUTTAL

The rebuttal of the charges I made takes several forms which, upon examination, are either absurd or raise even more serious charges than I made. These include:

1. They claim that on 7 of the 10 items, the prices they paid were not the prices which they gave in their own reports. If this is true (and I have evidence to contradict it), it is certainly an indictment of their entire accounting and supply system.

2. They claim that 7 of the 10 items were necessarily of "experimental or specialized design." This claim could not possibly stand the test of physical inspection of the items. In the case of four of these seven items, their own fact sheets do not substantiate the specific claim. Of the remaining three items, the contractor states that one would now cost half as much, another was patented 11 or 12 years before they say it was procured as an "experimental or specialized" item, and the contract for a further item was made under the loosest possible arrangement which made it almost inevitable that it would end up in the surplus junk pile.

It is clear from the evidence that the claim of "experimental or specialized items" is an attempt to excuse obvious procurement or supply mistakes.

3. One of the inferred defenses of the Department is that the items were old and hence do not reflect current practices.

Of the 9 out of 10 items on which they supply information, 7 of the 9 were procured as late as 1956–57, the price on another was set in 1958, and on another, the item was currently carried at the price I gave.

Seven of the ten items were physically located at the contractors' plants when declared surplus. Since this was recently, no argument of age can generally apply nor justify these practices.

4. Finally, the Defense Department did not even reply to the basic criticisms in my speech, namely, that 86 percent of all contracts are negotiated, that 35 percent or $14.3 billion of supplies in the supply system inventory are excess or surplus, that some $60 billion of surplus supplies are to be sold off, that the Government receives only an average of 2 cents on the dollar for these surpluses, and that the 52 General Accounting Office Reports—which I placed in the RECORD—put out in the last 2 years, and which show excessive prices for military contracts, indicate that the conditions I detailed are general in nature.

I shall now take up each of these points in more detail.

CLAIM THAT THEIR OWN PRICES WERE IN ERROR

They say to begin with that the prices I reported, even though taken from their own reports, were not the prices paid for 7 of the 10 items. They claim "clerical errors," "erroneous confirmation" of the prices by the Department of Defense to the General Services Administration or to me, or "estimates from the subcontractor" which were in error.

If true, this is a most damaging admission. It confirms what I charged in my speech, namely:

"In the examples I have brought here today, either the military has been taken in by the contractors or the military is charging off to the donable property program these useless and surplus items at costs which are fantastic and which are misleading."'

Furthermore, it can be of considerable advantage to the military to charge off items at excess prices, if this is in fact what actually happened, for under section 203, paragraph 1, subsection (j) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended, the Comptroller General has ruled that:

"Such authority to donate property necessarily includes the authority to adjust the accounting records of the Government to reflect the decrease in assets."

If the Department of Defense's and the individual service's own reports of the prices they paid are in error for 7 of the 10 items—as they claim but which I have evidence to contradict—this is an amazing indictment of their entire accounting and supply system.

CLAIM OF SPECIALIZED OR EXPERIMENTAL DESIGN

Their claim that seven of the items were necessarily of "experimental or specialized design" is ridiculous—as any examination of the items will readily show.

In the case of four of these seven items, their fact sheets do not substantiate the claim but merely argue that the overall contract was for a specialized or experimental contract or final item. Examination of the gage blocks, transfer punches, drill bushings, and locating plugs show that they are either very crudely and roughly milled scrap items or, at best (in the case of the bushings), items which required no minute tolerances or specialized design.

A $19,980 contract for six rocket sleds does not justify paying $10, $8.19, $9.65 and $11 apiece for what is essentially roughly milled junk.

Cable headset: Their justification for paying $10.67 for a cable headset as an item of experimental or specialized design is rebutted by the statement of the contractor which is found under item 1 of enclosure 3 of their own reply. It says:

"Current price, based on business from commercial sources, is about half."

The fact that commercial sources are using this "specialized and experimental item" and paying about half the cost would indicate that it is neither put to such special uses or worth as much as the rebuttal claims.

Blower: With respect to the blower, which was purchased in 1956, they again claim that the item was specialized or experimental. They say "smallness is the key," that it had "specialized characteristics," etc.

However, the blower is a patented item. The patent numbers appear on it. (Nos. 2,423,345; 2,483,024; 2,547,599). Although they state that the item was bought in 1956 as a "specialized" item, the applications for the patents were filed on February 9, 1944, March 3, 1945, and October 31, 1945—or 11 to 12 years before the item was procured by the Air Force as a specialized or experimental item.

The very first page of all three potent documents states:

"While the invention is of general application, it is especially adapted to fractional horsepower motors and generators having power outputs in the range up to one-half horsepower."

"Fractional horsepower motors have a wide range of application in industrial and domestic appliances."

In addition, on the first page of patent No. 2,423,345, this statement is found:

"It is an object of the present invention, therefore, to provide a new and improved alternating current dynamoelectric machine which is small, compact, inexpensive, and which avoids one or more of the abovementioned disadvantages of the arrangements of the prior art."

On patent No. 2,483,024, which is a patent for the method of manufacturing the motor, the following statement is to be found:

"It is another object of the invention to provide a new and improved method of manufacturing dynamoelectric machines by means of which there may be produced a machine having high performance characteristics while at the same time being simple and inexpensive in construction."

On patent No. 2,547,599, an improvement on the first patent, this statement is to be found:

"It is an object of the invention, therefore, to provide a new and improved * * * machine of improved and simplified construction resulting in a minimum size and cost for a given power rating."

Delay line: The final item for which the Defense Department claims "experimental or specialized design" is the delay line. The Department of Defense claims that it was made "specially to order for this contract."

The item was made by a sub-subcontractor. In my staff's interrogation of the prime contractor, it was established that notwithstanding the claim that it was made "specially to order," the sub-subcontractor was not required to meet either detailed written specifications or detailed performance specification in order to have his item accepted and paid for. Of the five delay lines purchased, at prices from $40 to $325, all five apparently ended up as surplus when at least four of them failed to meet the need for which they were made.

This item points up very sharply the abuses which have come from "negotiated contracts" and especially those with "subcontractors" about which the General Accounting Office has filed report after report.

SUMMARY

In summary, the claim of "specialized or experimental items" could in no way apply to four of the seven items for which such claim is made by the Defense Department. Of the remaining three, the contractor states that one would now cost half as much as was paid and is produced commercially, another was patented as a standard item 11 to 12 years before procured by the Air Force with claims under the patents that it had "general application" and that the object of the patent was to produce a "small," "compact," "simple," and "inexpensive" item, and the final item was made under the loosest type of contractual arrangement which almost made it inevitable that it would end up in the surplus junk pile.

It is clear from the evidence that the claim of "specialized or experimental items" is an attempt to play down obvious procurement blunders.

CLAIM OF AGE

While it is not generally stated, one of the inferred defenses of the Department is that the items were old, and hence current practices were not at fault.

Of the 10 items, they claim they have no knowledge of the circumstances surrounding the purchase or pricing of one (the small wrenches).

On one other item (the wrench sets) they claim it was purchased during World War II and that their records are now inadequate to establish the original purchase price. However, on that item the price was set at $29 in 1958 from the then current Teletype Corp., catalog price list of December 1957.

They also state that the Navy has bought 42 such tool kits in the period of 1957–59. The price for these they state was from 32 to 38 percent below list price, or from $17.98 to $19.72 per set. Any examination of this item will indicate that such current prices appear to be grossly excessive.

On one other item, the lamp socket, they claim no purchase since 1954. However, I have in my possession the Department of Defense excess personal property sheet dated October 26, 1958, which lists the lamp socket at $21.10. I also have a copy of the report of excess personal property dated September 30, 1958, giving the price of the item as $21.10. Further, the General Services Administration report, dated January 4, 1960, states that the item was then currently in the Navy standard stock catalog at a list price of $21.10. Finally, the same General Services Administration report, which the Department of Defense includes as a part of its own rebuttal, states that the item is "Carried today at NSD Great Lakes, at $21.10 each."

Since the Navy Department requires periodic reports on its stock status and prices, it seems strange that this item would have been carried on the books at such an outrageous price as late as 1960 if the item had not at some time been procured for that amount.

Of the remaining seven items, four of them were procured under a contract let in 1956 and the prices were established from "estimates of the subcontractor" when the contract was terminated in 1958. These were the gage blocks, transfer punches, drill bushings, and locating plugs.

The remaining items were purchased in 1956 and 1957.

Furthermore, 7 of the 10 items were physically located, at the time they were declared surplus, at the contractor's plants. Since they have only recently become surplus, no argument of age can generally apply, for renegotiation could still be applied.

A detailed analysis of these 10 items indicates quite clearly that no claim of age can justify these practices.

The following table gives information about the dates for the 10 items.

Dates of contracts, when prices were set, and remarks concerning 10 examples

Item	Date of contract, manufacture, or purchase	Date price set	Remarks
1. Cable headset	1957	1957	Declared surplus at plant. Picked up by State agency Apr. 3, 1959.
2. Wrench set	Army claims during World War II.	1958	Price established from catalog of Teletype Corp. dated December 1957.
3. Lamp socket	Various, 1947-54	Various	Carried at Naval Supply Depot, Great Lakes, in 1960 at $21.10.
4. Delay line	1957	1957	Declared surplus at plant. Picked up Nov. 17, 1958.
5. Blower	1956	1956	Do.
6. Gage blocks 7. Transfer punches 8. Drill bushings 9. Locating plugs	1956	1958	Declared surplus at plant. Price established on "estimates of contractor." Picked up Sept. 16, 1958.
10. Small wrenches	Defense Department says unknown.	Unknown	Item was delivered to surplus at the same time and on the same invoice as item 2. Price probably set by Army for National Security Agency at same date.

OTHER POINTS

Lamp socket: The Navy claims that the price of $21.10 for this item is a "clerical error." They now say that the price and stock number was for a complete lampholder assembly and not merely the "socket" itself.

I have in my possession no less than four official military documents relating to this item all of them dated within the past 2 years. On all of these documents the description of the item is for the lamp socket itself and not for some larger unit. On each the price is given as $21.10. Furthermore, the General Services Administration provided me with the information that a specific purchase by the Electric Supply Office of the Navy on purchase order NR 39282 for a quantity of 14 of these each at $21.15 was made under a negotiated contract with the Ford Instrument Co. This document is to be found as item 3 of enclosure 3 of the Defense Department's own rebuttal.

Even if this were a "clerical error," it was a very expensive "clerical error," for on the Department of Defense excess personal property report it is listed as a "reimbursable" item.

When this item was "excess" to the needs of the Navy a report was made to all other Government agencies to see if they could use the item before it was given away as surplus. However, as a reimbursable item, any using agency would be required to pay to the Navy either the listed acquisition cost of the item or its fair value as determined by the Navy. In this case the acquisition cost was given as $21.10 and the fair value at $7.39.

Because of these excessively high prices, obviously no other agency would pay $21.10 or $7.39 from their current appropriated funds for this item, as is required for a reimbursable item. Consequently, the "clerical error" itself would insure that this item was never used by any other agency even if they wanted it or needed it.

I have long been a critic of the reimbursable practice, as applied to this item and to the stock funds of the Navy and Army. In fact, I went into this subject in detail in my speech. If such a practice is general, it indicates why the Navy or the Army would gain great advantage from placing high prices on excess items, or why so much of our military supplies and equipment—$10 billion per year—end up as surplus. If the item were used by another agency, the Navy would receive additional funds. If the prices were so high that no one would pay them, items will obviously end up as surplus even though needed within the Government.

FAILURE TO REPLY TO GENERAL POINTS

The Defense Department does not reply to the general points in my speech of which the 10 items I displayed were illustrative. I made the speech in the hope that the administrative officials of the Department of Defense would cooperate to clean up some of the indefensible practices which now exist, and to eliminate excessive waste and fat in order that we might have more military muscle and provide more combat troops, tanks, guns, planes, missiles, and space vehicles.

I am extremely disappointed that they say nothing on these main points. These general criticisms included:

1. The fact that 86.4 percent of Defense contracts are negotiated rather than let by competitive bidding. This is excessive and wasteful.

2. That $14.3 billion or 35 percent of the $41 billion in the supply system inventories of the Department are in excess of the needs either to run the military on a day by day peacetime basis or to go to war tomorrow morning.

3. That some $26.7 billion or 23 percent of the entire personal property inventory of the Defense Department has already been identified as excess or surplus or in long supply of present defense needs.

4. That some $60 billion of supplies are to be sold off as surplus over the next 3 or 4 years at the rate of $10 to $12 to $15 billion per year with an average return of only 2 cents on the dollar. Thirty to forty percent of this total are supplies of common commercial items and not merely outmoded weapons.

5. The placing in the RECORD of 52 General Accounting Office reports issued during the past 2 years showing excessive charges for military supplies. The amount involved ranged from a few hundred thousand to over $6 million in individual cases.

6. Detailing how the stock fund system of the Navy and Army had led to "double payment" for many supplies and had, in some cases, prevented the Government from using equipment and supplies which it owned but which were given away or sold at an average price of 2 cents on the dollar because of the silly "reimbursable" requirements.

ADDITIONAL ITEMS NEEDING INVESTIGATION

Since my speech on defense waste on June 13 I have collected numerous additional items where either the contractors were paid too much or the military wrote off the supplies at excessive prices. These items have not been checked out as were the original 10 items I gave, but I am asking that the General Accounting Office check these items as well as those which they are now working on. They include:

1. A kit heater, disposed of by the Aberdeen Proving Grounds, which is a piece of metal about 4 feet long, rather roughly made, for which the military has listed the acquisition value as $300 and which could be worth no more than $10 to $20.

2. A small screwdriver, disposed of by the Army at Fort Meade, for which the military gives an acquisition cost of $1 but which is certainly worth a great deal less than that. A fair judgment would value it as 15 to 25 cents at most.

3. A wrench socket disposed of by the Army at Fort Meade for which the military gives an acquisition cost of $1.50 but which is worth a good deal less. A fair value might well be 25 or 50 cents at most.

4. A concealable waist pocket device for the purpose of "bugging" conversations. It was disposed of by Fort Holabird and an acquisition cost of $1,100 is given. While this item is somewhat complex, it is almost impossible to believe that it cost or should have cost $1,100.

5. A ground lock bag which is about 3 feet long and 1½ feet wide, or the size of a suit box, which is nothing more than heavy cardboard covered with about $2 worth of canvas with pockets and some stitching. It was disposed of by the Air Force and the acquisition cost is given as $93.68. A manufacturer would make money selling it for from $8 to $12.

6. A mockup reactor consisting of several loose pieces of balsa wood, a few pieces of iron and which originally had two small motors worth from $35 to $50 apiece. At most the entire item would be worth from $100 to $125. The acquisition cost of this item is given as $20,312.44, which is both ridiculous and absurd. It would appear, as this was a termination contract, that the military wrote off all the costs of labor or research or overhead, etc., against this pile of junk which was the only item produced. This raises a real question about the proper method of writing off materials as a result of the termination of a contract.

CONCLUSIONS

The reply of the Department of Defense to my charges is grossly inadequate. The Congress has just cut $400 million from the procurement funds of the Department because of the numerous examples of wasteful practices which have been uncovered by various congressional committees, by the General Accounting Office, and by individual Members of the Congress.

When this cut was made, a mandate was given to the Department for more competitive bidding, greater intergration of supply activities, and the carrying out of the O'Mahoney and McCormack-Curtis amendments calling for more efficient supply practices.

The answers given to me by the Department, and their refusal to admit any errors, certainly raises the serious question as to whether or not the Defense Department will carry out, in good faith, the mandate of the Congress. I, for one, will continue to call to the attention of both the Department and the public, the inefficient supply and procurement practices of the Department and will insist that the mandate of Congress be carried out in both letter and spirit.

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT—ADDRESS BY SENATOR KENNEDY

Mr. MCNAMARA. Mr. President, on last Sunday, August 14, 1960, the junior

Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] spoke at Hyde Park, N.Y., in commemoration of the 25th anniversary of the signing of the Social Security Act by President Roosevelt.

There, at the home and resting place of this Nation's greatest President, the Senator from Massachusetts recalled to us the great battles for human dignity waged by Franklin Roosevelt.

I share the Senator's belief that the victory won in the social security battle was one of the greatest this Nation has ever achieved.

I ask that the Senator's address, which I believe also demonstrates his own determination to provide leadership in the tradition of Franklin Roosevelt, be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF SENATOR JOHN F. KENNEDY, MEMORIAL PROGRAM, 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF SIGNING OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT, HYDE PARK, N.Y., AUGUST 14, 1960

I am grateful to you, Mrs. Roosevelt, for allowing me to be here today. For I come to Hyde Park not to instruct but to learn.

And I think that we can all agree that Eleanor Roosevelt is a true teacher. Her very life teaches a love of truth and duty and courage. The wide world is her neighborhood. All its people are her daily concern. She is frank; she is outspoken; she is forthright—and I know she always will be.

A visit to Hyde Park is both a pilgrimage and a challenge. We journey here to pay tribute to one of America's most honored leaders. And we find here a challenge to renew the march toward those high goals of peace, and freedom, and a decent life for all men, to which he dedicated his life.

"I occasionally go back home to Hyde Park," said Franklin Roosevelt, "so that I can have a chance to think quietly about the country as a whole." Today, in the turmoil and conflict of our daily lives, we too can pause here a moment to think about the man whose home this was—and about the Nation which he led to greatness.

Standing on this quiet lawn—this spacious and soothing scene—it is difficult to recall the furious battles which were fought by the man who lies here in honored glory—the conflicts which he waged; the victories which he won.

Yet we who lived while he governed can, here at Hyde Park, still hear the echoes of those heroic struggles: the struggle to rescue America from poverty and economic collapse, the struggle to build a new America where all could live in dignity, the struggle to secure freedom against the ominous armed advance of tyranny and oppression, and, the last, the most arduous, the unending struggle, the struggle which his wife still steadfastly carries on, the struggle to build a world of free and peaceful nations.

If these battles were nobly fought, if the America of Franklin Roosevelt had a rendezvous with destiny, it met that rendezvous only because it was guided to its destination by a great leader of men.

Today we commemorate one of those battles—the passage of the Social Security Act of 1935—the most important single piece of social welfare legislation in the history of this country. It was 25 years ago this very day that Franklin Roosevelt could say, after a long and arduous struggle: "Today a hope of many years' standing is in large part fulfilled"; and with that he signed his name and social security became law.

For millions of Americans, with that one stroke of the pen, their insecurity and fear were transformed into hope—their poverty and hunger were transformed into a decent life—their economic degradation was transformed into a chance to live out their days in the dignity and peace they had so richly earned.

But the job which Franklin Roosevelt set out to do in 1935 is not yet done. That opening battle was won—but the war against poverty and degradation is not yet over. And no one realized this more than Franklin Roosevelt himself. "This law," he said, 25 years ago today as he signed it, "represents a cornerstone in a structure which is being built, but which is by no means complete." We are here at Hyde Park today—not merely to commemorate the cornerstone—but to help complete the edifice.

It is fitting that we celebrate this anniversary. It is essential, from time to time, that we pay tribute to past greatness and historic achievement. But we would betray the very cause we honor if we did not now look to the future as well. We would be unfaithful to the man we honor if we did not look beyond his work to the new challenges—the new problems—the new work which lies ahead. For the last public message he ever wrote, on the morning of his death, closed with these words to the American people: "The only limit to our realization of tomorrow will be our doubts of today. Let us move forward with strong and active faith."

This is not 1935—or 1945. This is 1960—and today there are 16 million Americans past the age of 65; 3 out of every 5 of these—more than 9½ million people—must struggle to survive on an income of less than $1,000 a year; 3 million more receive less than $2,000 from all sources combined; and those who draw social security receive an average check of $72 a month which—in 1960 dollars—does not begin to do the job.

With the cost of living continually spiralling upward, with the cost of basic items continually rising—$72 a month or $1,000 a year cannot pay for even the most basic rudiments of a decent and dignified old age. And, even worse, the substandard incomes—the poverty and neglect—dissipate and destroy the morale, the self-respect, the personal pride of our older citizens.

These are shocking and shameful figures. They unmistakably reveal the dismal poverty, the hardship and the lonely want which millions of Americans must face as they near retirement—they describe the meager and humiliating reward which this, the richest country on earth, gives to those who have contributed to our country's strength.

This poverty and hardship becomes heartbreak and despair when illness threatens. No costs have increased more rapidly in the last decade than the cost of medical care. And no group of Americans has felt the impact of these skyrocketing costs more than our older citizens. Almost 20 percent of all those on social security must use one-quarter to one-half of their meager annual incomes for medical expenses alone. Those over 65 suffer from chronic diseases at almost twice the rate of our younger population—they spend more than twice as many days restricted to bed—and they must visit a doctor twice as often. And even these impressive figures do not tell us of the uncounted thousands who suffer from lack of needed medical care—from lack of vital drugs—and of hospitalization simply because they cannot afford to pay the bills.

Of course some of those who are now uncared for can get free health care. But such public assistance is often painstakingly slow, the tests for giving it are often rigid and unrealistic. The care itself is often impersonal and inadequate.

And even more important—thousands of our older citizens would rather endure pain and suffering than rely on public charity. And they should not have to ask for charity.

This story is a living story, not merely statistics. It is deeply burned into every city and town, every hospital and clinic, every neighborhood and rest home in America, wherever our older citizens live out their lives in want and despair under the shadow of illness. You have seen it in your States—I have seen it in my travels across all 50 States. It is a sight engraved upon our minds and hearts—but it is a sight which, together, we can wipe from the face of this great rich land forever.

First, we must enact immediately an adequate, comprehensive plan to enable our older citizens to meet their pressing medical needs. Such a plan, a soundly financed program without a destructive, degrading means test—based on the tried and tested operation of the social security system, is now before the Congress; and it can—and should—and must be enacted this year.

But I also say to you that this bill will be—like the original social security law—only a single stone in an unfinished structure. It is an important start toward meeting the health problems of our older citizens—but it is only a start. And the coming years will require even more of us.

Second, we must broaden and extend the current scale of social security benefits, which have barely kept pace with the rising cost of living. We must devise machinery that will enable us to keep ahead of rising prices—so that human welfare will not be cruelly dissipated by inflation.

Third, we must raise the amount which retired persons can earn and still be eligible for social security benefits—so that our older people can supplement their meager benefits with meaningful outside employment.

Fourth, we must provide more than benefits. Our older people must receive not only their earned reward for their contributions to America's past—they must be allowed to share in the great task of building America's future. Today too many of our older people who can work—who want to work—cannot find work. Their abilities and skills—their experience and wisdom and knowledge—are wastefully ignored, by a country which desperately needs their services.

We must embark on a great program to use the skills of older Americans—through changes in Government hiring policies—through expanded employment services—and through an intensive education of our Nation's employers to the immense value of this great reservoir of unused talents.

And, since new work for our older citizens will often require new training, we must expand vocational training facilities to ease their change to new job opportunities.

Fifth, we must provide adequate housing for the aged—housing which will be an integral part of the community in which they live. For this we may need a new program of loans, and new incentives to builders to construct homes which meet their special requirements.

Sixth, if we adopt these programs of housing and employment, and construct a system of adequate benefits—then we can move to reduce the number of those who must depend on public assistance, thus increasing the benefits to those who still need assistance.

Seventh, we must expand our basic research into the causes and prevention of those chronic illnesses and diseases which are associated with advancing age.

Eighth, we must do more for the widows and children who survive. Today the widow whose savings are gone—who is forced to live on an income even less than her husband's retirement benefits—is truly the "forgotten woman" of social security.

We must remedy this shameful defect in our law.

And social security is just one of the many, vital battles for human welfare which are now being waged. I come to you from a Congress where we are fighting to secure a decent, minimum wage for millions of Americans. This too is an important and arduous struggle. And many other such struggles lie ahead.

To meet these urgent responsibilities will take determination, and dedication, and hard work. But I believe that America is ready to move from self-indulgence to self-denial. It will take will and effort. But I believe that America is ready to work. It will take vision and boldness. But I believe that America is still bold.

The writers of the Declaration of Independence did not promise us happiness—they promised only the "pursuit of happiness"—and by this they meant fulfillment as a Nation and as human beings.

It is this pursuit—this endless questing—which we must now resume. There are new problems, new dangers, new horizons—and we have rested long enough. The world is changing—the perils are deepening—the irresistible march of history moves forward. We must now take the leadership in that great march—or be forever left behind.

And this is why we have gathered here at the home of enduring greatness—not merely to pay tribute—but to refreshen our spirits and stir our hearts for the tasks which lie ahead. We celebrate the past to awaken the future.

This was said for all time almost 100 years ago, by a great American standing at another graveside, at another memorial service. "It is," he said, "for us the living to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us, that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion * * * that this Nation, under God, may have a new birth of freedom."

Today, in that spirit, we pay our humble tribute.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate stand in recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, August 17, 1960, at 10 o'clock a.m.

NOMINATION

Executive nomination received by the Senate August 16 (legislative day of August 11), 1960:

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

Fraser Wilkins, of Nebraska, a Foreign Service officer of class 1, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of Cyprus.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, AUGUST 16, 1960

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Reverend Father Daniel E. Power, S.J., Georgetown University, Washington, D.C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and Eternal God, Omnipotent Creator of the Universe, in whom we live and move and have our being, from whom we have received all that is good in ourselves and in our blessed country, we humbly invoke Thy blessing today upon this the Congress of our Nation. Whether they gather in session or in conference, inspire them, we beg Thee, with a love for truth and a passion for justice that will enable them to be as responsive to the demands of Thy law as to the clamor of selfish interests; as dedicated to the need of the many as to the plight of the few; as ready to do the truth with charity as Thou are to help them with Thy loving providence. Insofar as it is humanly possible, may the laws passed in this Chamber represent the wisdom of the best minds and hearts and, as such, mirror clearly the divine law which Thou hast revealed through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation:

AUGUST 8, 1960.

HON. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker, House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I hereby resign my office as Representative in the Congress of the United States from North Dakota.

Respectfully,

QUENTIN N. BURDICK.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that pursuant to the order of the House of July 3, 1960, empowering him to accept resignations, he did, on August 8, 1960, accept the resignation of the Honorable QUENTIN N. BURDICK as a Representative in the Congress of the United States from North Dakota and informed the Governor thereof of the receipt of said resignation.

POINT OF NO QUORUM

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 6 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, August 17, 1960, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY ON USE OF COUNTERPART FUNDS

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, the Mutual Security Act of 1958, chapter IV, section 401(a), requires the Committee on House Administration to publish in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, within 10 legislative days after receipt, the consolidated report of each committee of the House using foreign currencies—counterpart funds—during the preceding year. Accordingly, there is shown herein, within the prescribed time limit, the consolidated report of the Committee on Banking and Currency:

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Statement by Senator Douglas on the Occasion of the Silver Anniversary Convention of Catholic War Veterans of the United States of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 16, 1960

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement to be given by me on the occasion of the silver anniversary convention of the Catholic War Veterans of the United States of America meeting this week in Chicago. I am glad to give this recognition here in Congress to an organization with such an outstanding record of devotion to God, to country, and to home.

There being no objection, the statemented was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR PAUL H. DOUGLAS ON THE OCCASION OF THE SILVER ANNIVERSARY CONVENTION OF THE CATHOLIC WAR VETERANS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The Catholic War Veterans of the United States of America will hold their 25th annual convention in Chicago during the week beginning August 15. Elaborate preparations have been made to make this silver anniversary the largest convention ever held by this organization. It is anticipated that the extensive program planned will attract more than 7,000 members of the Catholic War Veterans and its auxiliaries. I assure them all a warm welcome from our great, hospitable city of Chicago.

The convention committee has set up an agenda calling for a full schedule of committee meetings that will study and prepare resolutions for action by the entire body. Hundreds of resolutions have already been received covering many phases of American life including "Veterans Affairs," "Youth Welfare," "Catholic Action," "Americanism," "Membership," and many other subjects in which an organization of war veterans is vitally interested.

At various times throughout the convention, prominent Americans are scheduled to address joint sessions of the Catholic War Veterans and its auxiliaries. These men, all outstanding in their particular field, will bring to the Catholic War Veterans and through them to all veterans and Americans messages on "National Security," "Veterans Affairs," "International Relations," and other vital subjects.

Although the convention will have many serious aspects, varied and interesting recreational events have been arranged for the members of the organization, their wives and families. On Tuesday evening preceding the convention, Comiskey Park will hold Catholic War Veterans night with a baseball game between the Chicago White Sox and the Detroit Tigers to be followed by a fireworks display. On the following day a golf tournament will be held at the Acacia Country Club, and at noon a band concert will take place at State and Madison Streets in downtown Chicago. Throughout the week there will be other interesting activities and ceremonies including a parade on Friday evening, and on Saturday morning a Pontifical High Mass will be celebrated by His Eminence, Cardinal Meyer, archbishop of Chicago. Closing events of the week-long gathering will include a banquet on Saturday evening to be followed by the convention ball.

The Catholic War Veterans of the United States came into existence in the year 1935 when it was founded by a former Army chaplain, the Right Reverend Monsignor Edward J. Higgins, LL.D., of Astoria, Long Island, N.Y. Recognizing a need for a militant veterans organization composed of Catholic men and women who served their country in time of war, Monsignor Higgins founded an organization that has grown throughout the years and now has posts in more than 40 States.

Over the past quarter of a century the Catholic War Veterans has been been a bulwark against many of the tyrannical "isms" that constantly threaten our country and its freedoms. Since its beginning the Catholic War Veterans have brought their greatest force against the evils of communism and its insidious designs to destroy Christianity and create a godless world. For the 25 years that this organization has been in existence it has steadfastly supported and protected the traditions that have made America the great country that it is.

As well as fighting relentlessly against communism the Catholic War Veterans have been active on other fronts sponsoring such programs as "Americanism," "Catholic Action," "Leadership," "Membership," and "Veterans Affairs." In addition, through its publications and other media of communication, this organization has encouraged active civil defense programs, educational activities, and youth programs, as well as the establishment of scholarships.

In the field of veterans' affairs the Catholic War Veterans have always exerted their influence. Each year the organization has sponsored or lent its support to legislation that would be beneficial to veterans, their widows, or dependents. Through welfare and rehabilitation officers located throughout the country it has assisted countless veterans in obtaining benefits under the laws of the Veterans' Administration. The Catholic War Veterans have maintained a strong and active hospital program giving comfort to our thousands of hospitalized veterans. These and many other programs stand as a tribute to the Catholic War Veterans on this, its 25th anniversary.

The Catholic War Veterans have received the acclamation of numerous Government agencies, business groups and patriotic, veteran and fraternal organizations. It has the approbation of the present Pope, John XXIII, and all Popes from the date of the founding of the organization. It has been lauded by every President of the United States and by numerous legislators and other statesmen.

Article II, section 1 of its constitution best describes the aims and purposes of this great organization:

"This organization of Catholic War Veterans is established to promote zeal and devotion for God, for country, and for home:

"(a) For God: To promote through aggressive, organized Catholic action a greater love, honor, and service to God; an understanding and application of the teachings of Christ in our everyday life; recognizing the wisdom of the church in all matters of faith and morals.

"(b) For country: Through a more vivid understanding of the Constitution of the United States of America and through active participation in the promotion of its ideals of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, to develop a more zealous citizenship; to encourage morality in government, labor, management, economic, social, fraternal, and all other phases of American life; to combat aggressively the forces which tend to impair the efficiency and permanency of our free institutions.

"(c) For home: To promote the realization that the family is the basic unit of society; to aid in the development of an enlightened patriotic American youth; to assist all veterans and widows and dependents of deceased veterans.

"(d) These objectives are encouraged without regard to race, creed, or color."

As they celebrate this silver jubilee, the Catholic War Veterans can look back upon a history of accomplishment and to the future with a feeling of confidence.

I am sure all their many friends join in wishing for them the best convention in their history and continued success in working for their high ideals.

The Control of Crime Through Cooperation

OF
HON. CARL HAYDEN
OF ARIZONA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 16, 1960

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, because of the excellent way in which the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia, Hon. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, has set forth the importance of effective cooperation between the State and the Federal authorities having jurisdiction over the enforcement of laws to control and punish criminal activities, I am directing the attention of Senators to an address that he is delivering this evening at Richmond, before the convention of the Virginia State Sheriffs' and City Sergeants' Association.

All of us who have been privileged to serve with him in the Senate have repeatedly observed the way in which Senator ROBERTSON has forcefully demonstrated his ability to utilize his wide and accurate knowledge of historical facts to stress the importance of maintaining a clear-cut distinction between the functions to be performed by the State and Federal Governments. At Richmond there will be no departure by the Senator from his usual clarity of expression in that respect.

We have in common experience gained as law enforcement officers when we were young men. Senator ROBERTSON was the Commonwealth's attorney for Rockbridge County for 6 years and I was the sheriff of Maricopa County in the Territory of Arizona for 5 years. I learned, as he did, that there are those who will commit crimes and that there are always available many others who can be depended upon to support law and order when convinced that honest enforcement efforts are being made.

As the Senator from Virginia clearly indicates, the availability of speedy transportation has made crime a national menace. I join with him in praise for the way in which the Federal Bureau of Investigation is rendering invaluable assistance to the States in resisting the impact of organized crime. No such help was available when we were county officers.

In 1923, I first became acquainted with J. Edgar Hoover, then a young man serving as an Assistant Director of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice. I was impressed with his earnest plea for the establishment of an Identification Division in that Bureau where fingerprints from all parts of the Nation could be assembled and classified. I promptly agreed to assist him in that effort because during my service as sheriff fingerprints and a photograph which I had the good fortune to obtain from the Ohio State Penitentiary resulted in the capture of Louis V. Etynge, who, after I brought him back from San Francisco, was convicted of murder in the first degree.

When the Department of Justice appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1924 was under consideration, I joined in urging that the Bureau of Investigation be provided with funds to acquire, maintain, and exchange criminal identification records with the State and city authorities, and my recollection is that about $50,000 were made available for that purpose.

It was not until 1931 that Mr. Hoover's proposal was finally consummated by the permanent establishment of the Division of Identification in the Bureau of Investigation. As Senator ROBERTSON points out, during the intervening 36 years the FBI Identification Division has acquired more than 150 million fingerprint cards in its files.

I ask unanimous consent that the address to be made by Senator ROBERTSON, to which I have referred, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CONTROL OF CRIME THROUGH COOPERATION

(Remarks of Senator A. WILLIS ROBERTSON at the convention of the Virginia State Sheriffs' and City Sergeants' Association, John Marshall Hotel, Richmond, Va., Aug. 16, 1960)

For 6 years, I served as the Commonwealth's attorney for Rockbridge County, and will always be grateful for the experience, because, through it, I learned about county government and the problems of law-enforcement officers. I soon learned that a Commonwealth's attorney could not hope to make a record as a good prosecuting attorney without a good sheriff. You can't send a felon to the penitentiary before he is caught, and after he is caught you can't convict him without proving criminal intent and the corpus delicti.

A joke is told on some criminal lawyers that their fee is determined by whether they must furnish the evidence or have it furnished by the client. Commonwealth's attorneys must rely principally upon their sheriffs in establishing the fact that a crime has been committed and connecting the prisoner with it.

Nothing more clearly indicates the march of time and changes in social customs than the history of the office of sheriff. It was an office we inherited from our English ancestors, where it existed among the Anglo-Saxons even before the Norman Conquest. In fact, the word "sheriff" is a Saxon word indicating the executive officer of a shire, or English county. The Saxons probably elected their sheriffs, but after the Norman Conquest the sheriff became the personal representative of the King, appointed by him from a list of three submitted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Judges of the King's Bench. As the personal representative of the King, the sheriff was the most important and most powerful man in his shire, which was known as his bailiwick; and, incidentally, the office was very remunerative. I don't know what the early office of sheriff paid in England, but I find a record of the fact that in Scotland the deputies, there known as sheriff's deputies, received salaries from $2,500 to $10,000 a year, so the sheriff probably received as much as $25,000 per year.

However, in Scotland, in addition to being an administrative official, the sheriff and his deputies were also trial justices for misdemeanors and warrants on small claims.

When the Colonial Government was set up in Virginia, we naturally followed the English system, with sheriffs appointed for a term of 1 year by the Governor (the King's representative) from a list of three peace commissioners recommended by the county court. The sheriffs of that day and time were also tax collectors, and that duty is still exercised by the sheriffs of West Virginia. From colonial days until a fish and game department was created in 1916, Virginia sheriffs were the sole game wardens; and until the creation of the motor vehicle division, they were highway traffic patrolmen, combining all of these duties and functions in some counties for the munificent salary of $600 a year, plus some small fees which usually went to the deputies, as they received no salary. About the only thing the Virginia sheriff doesn't have to do that the English sheriff did is to furnish liquor and other refreshments to the judges. But even in that pleasant function of the English sheriff he has assistance from a distinguished group known as "riders with the sheriff."

The appointment of sheriffs by the Governor continued until the spring of 1775, when the then Governor, Lord Dunsmore, suspended normal governmental functions, declared martial law, and took refuge on a British man-of-war. On March 20, 1775, a convention was held in the city of Richmond to consider what steps the Colonies should take to preserve their freedom, and as stated in the call of the convention: "To bring about a return of the halcyon days of peace and prosperity." That was a remarkable convention, attended by two representatives who afterwards became President—Washington, who represented Fairfax; Jefferson, who represented Albemarle; and Benjamin Harrison of Charles City County, father of a third President. Rockbridge, which was then a part of Botetourt, was represented by John Bowyer; Augusta, east of the Alleghenies, was represented by Thomas Lewis (a descendant of John Lewis, the first white settler in the valley), and Samuel McDowell. The area west of the Alleghenies that extended to the Mississippi River was represented by John Harvie. Shenandoah County, then called Dunmore, was represented by a young Lutheran preacher named Peter Muhlenberg. It was in that convention that he made the acquaintance of George Washington, who in 1776 named him a colonel in the Continental Army, where he served with much bravery and distinction and rose to the rank of major general.

The convention met again in Richmond on July 17, 1775, and again on December 1, 1775, and at this last session, among other things, made provision for the appointment of sheriffs. Under the terms of that resolution, whenever the term of a sheriff expired his successor was appointed for a term of 1 year by the county court. In colonial times the office of sheriff in Virginia, as in the mother country, was a very high and respected post, but in Virginia the work of the sheriff has always been difficult, at times dangerous, and in many counties underpaid.

In many respects, I think Virginia has the best government of any State in the Union. I am satisfied that in no State is justice administered on a cleaner and higher basis, but I have frequently felt that we in Virginia have not attached sufficient importance to the offices of sheriff and city sergeant, nor adequately remunerated the clean, able, and brave men who have been willing to assume those important posts.

One must smile as he reads the record that there could be no court held in Augusta County for 4 years after it was formed from Orange in 1738 because no one could be found willing to assume the duties of sheriff. And for many years after the county was formed, there was a continuing order of the court exempting from jury duty in Staunton citizens of the county who lived on the Mississippi River. We have expected too much of our sheriffs and city sergeants and at times have required them to make brick without straw. The real significance of that Biblical reference was that the children of Israel had to furnish their own straw, gathering it in the fields at night after making brick in the concentration camps all day. And out of the meager salaries and fees allowed our sheriffs and city sergeants we have expected them to respond to every call for help (traveling at their own expense), and, when some major crime has been committed, to spend days and weeks in working up the evidence.

It was not surprising that our State and local law enforcement officers found themselves unable to compete with ruthless bands of organized criminals, operating across State lines. Good roads and fast, easy means of transportation became the allies of organized crime as far back as 1920, when bootleggers and hijackers began to operate in this country on a major scale. It was in response to this situation that the Federal Government in 1934 passed the Fugitive Felon Act. As you know, this act, as it exists today, makes it a Federal offense to flee across State lines to avoid prosecution, custody or confinement for serious criminal acts. The FBI has had the responsibility of investigating violations under this statute, but before it can enter such a case, there must be indication that the fugitive has left the State, and local authorities must agree to extradite the criminal when he is located. The law provides for Federal prosecution, but, very properly, this rarely occurs since the primary purpose of the act is to locate and return to local custody those individuals who have committed serious crimes.

The value of this cooperative function, between Federal and local governments, is evident when statistics for the fiscal year 1959 are noted. In that year, 1,149 Fugitive Felon Act subjects were located by the FBI, an increase of more than 12 percent over the previous alltime high established in 1958.

I mention this act, because it seems to me that it furnishes the framework of a proper relationship between the Federal Government and local governments for cooperation in law enforcement. It is a framework in which the responsibilities are shared, but the primary responsibility for crimes of a local nature remains with the local law enforcement officers. There are, of course, other proper areas where the Federal Government can and does assist you in your most important work. When I spoke to your group in 1936, I urged you to make full use of the facilities which had only recently been made available to you through the FBI. The FBI National Academy had been initiated only in 1935, the year before I spoke to your group, and I urged your members to attend the courses of training provided by the Academy, which is commonly referred to as the "West Point of law enforcement." I'm glad to learn that you have done so. Since the inception of this Academy, there have been a total of 133 graduates from the State of Virginia, and of this number, I am informed, 94 are still active in law enforcement in Virginia.

One of the most notable Virginia graduates of the National Academy is Col. Charles W. Woodson, Jr., superintendent, Virginia State Police, Richmond, Va., who is currently president of the International Association of Chiefs of Police. Colonel Woodson was also the president of his National Academy class in 1940.

Two very excellent officers in the State of Virginia have been selected to attend the National Academy starting on August 15, 1960. They are Sheriff Harold Clark Taylor, Isle of Wight County, and Lt. Julius Marvin Boyers, police department, Staunton, Va.

It is heartening to note that the citizens and law-enforcement officials of the State of Virginia have recognized the professional nature of police work and are actively participating by sending police officers to the FBI National Academy.

Other services of the FBI which I called your attention to in 1936 were the FBI Laboratory and the FBI Identification Division.

During fiscal year 1959, a total of 1,886 examinations were made by the FBI Laboratory on specimens submitted by Virginia law-enforcement agencies. The FBI Laboratory is an excellent source of scientific aid which is available to law-enforcement agencies simply for the asking. The examination of a piece of evidence is performed without cost to the agency, and, if requested, the FBI will send the laboratory technician to testify as an expert witness at a local trial, also at no cost to the agency.

The FBI Identification Division now includes in its files 156,402,518 fingerprint cards, representing over 75 million persons. Ninety-five law-enforcement agencies in the State of Virginia are presently contributing to this division.

The FBI has established a disaster squad of highly trained fingerprint experts who, upon the request of law-enforcement authorities, are immediately dispatched to disaster areas in an effort to identify casualties. This humanitarian service has been utilized in the last several years largely in connection with plane crashes. In January of this year, the disaster squad was called upon to assist local authorities in identification of the victims of the plane crash which occurred in Charles City County, Va. This again, it seems to me, is a proper function of the Federal Government.

Another service provided by the Federal Government is the FBI police schools.

During fiscal year 1960, a total of 54 police schools were conducted by the FBI in the State of Virginia. In addition, the FBI conducted five specialized law-enforcement conferences on the subject of auto theft during the first part of 1960. These schools not only acquaint officers with new investigative techniques and methods, but also advise them of the many ways the FBI can assist them in the solution of a crime through the use of their Laboratory or Identification Division.

Schools of this nature are an example of the excellent instruction that is available to law-enforcement officers today. Officers, because of the highly professional nature of their work, should constantly strive to keep abreast of new scientific methods and techniques which they may apply in the course of their investigations.

In spite of the cooperation between local law-enforcement officials and the Federal Government, and in spite of the modern methods of scientific detection and identification, crime in the United States continues to rise.

An estimated 1,553,992 serious crimes were committed in the United States in 1958, a rise of 9 percent in comparison with the previous year. This rise in crime has far exceeded the rate of population increase in the country. The overall rise of 9 percent for 1958 was supported by increases in each of the 7 serious crime categories, namely, forcible rape, robbery, burglary, larceny over $50, aggravated assault, murder, and automobile thefts.

Preliminary crime data for 1959 reveals that crimes against the person rose 7 percent. Crimes against property increased 1 percent, according to reports received from police in cities over 25,000. Some individual offenses showed marked changes as follows: Aggravated assault, up 7 percent; murder, up 5 percent; rape, up 4 percent; and robbery, down 2 percent. Burglary showed no noticeable change, while auto thefts and major larcenies rose 2 percent and 1 percent respectively.

The continuing increase in crime is reflected in statistics for the first 6 months of 1960, when crime increased an additional 9 percent. During this period there was a sharp upward trend in serious crimes reported by cities over 25,000. Robberies were up 13 percent, reflecting the highest increase, followed closely by burglaries with a 12 percent rise, while larcenies over $50 rose 8 percent. These figures for the first 6 months of 1960 show a total of 462,396 offenses against property reported by contributing cities. That is an increase of over 40,000 more burglaries, robberies, and thefts than occurred during the same period in 1959. The minimum loss which this figure represents is a staggering $134 million.

In view of this increase in crime, all of us, and not only those of you who are immediately responsible, should concern ourselves with the problem of law enforcement. In my opinion cooperation, as exists between the State and Federal Governments, is the most effective weapon against the criminal world. This cooperation, however, must extend to every citizen of the United States.

In speaking of the continued increase in crime in the United States, J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, has observed that many citizens have a detached attitude toward crime; that they are seldom concerned with the plight of their neighbors who have been victimized by vicious criminals. He pointed out that all too often brutal crimes arouse only morbid curiosity or mild sympathy for the victims, instead of indignation and concerted action against lawbreakers who all too often have shown utter contempt for human lives and rights.

Mr. Hoover cited the fact that the rising tide of crime is not attributable alone to our population growth, but is traceable primarily to the two following conditions:

(1) There has been an unfortunate spread of moral deterioration among growing communities of our population. This is not evinced alone in the rise of bank robberies and crimes of violence but includes the willingness of many law-abiding Americans to compromise their ideals if an easy dollar can be made. This concept is commonly known in our society as "payola."

(2) Public apathy toward crime and other dangerous conditions has been on the rise in too many American communities. Such apathy attacks man's sensitivity to the difference between right and wrong. Its symptoms are lethargy, self-indulgence, and the desire of personal pleasure before duty.

The problem of young people involved in crime activities is tragic. The increasing frequency of youth crimes is compounded by an increasing savagery in their commission.

Many authorities in noting the continued increase in crime and the resultant danger to our country have loudly advocated the establishment of various types of national crime commissions and national police forces. Crime commissions and national police forces are not the answer to this serious problem. Local crimes should be handled by local authorities with the assistance of the many cooperative facilities available to all law enforcement today.

There have also been in recent years many proposals for invasion of the police powers of States by the Federal Government, in the guise of so-called civil rights bills, while the U.S. Supreme Court on a number of occasions has used the due process clause of the 14th amendment as an excuse for invading the police powers of the States, especially with respect to religious and loyalty issues. Those of us who have opposed these invasions have not done so because of any lack of sensitivity to the rights of every American to enjoy the benefits of the Constitution, but because we know that ultimately the enjoyment by all citizens of all their civil rights depends upon the preservation of a Federal Union composed of sovereign States which had reserved to themselves or the people thereof all powers not delegated to the Central Government. The retention within the States of the police power is one of the most important elements of sovereignty which were wisely retained by the State governments at the time of the formation of the Union. Alexander Hamilton recognized this. In spite of his reputation as an advocate of a strong Central Government, he wrote in The Federalist, No. 17, as follows:

"There is one transcendent advantage belonging to the province of the State governments, which alone suffices to place the matter in a clear and satisfactory light—I mean the ordinary administration of criminal and civil justice. This, of all others, is the most powerful, most universal, and most attractive source of popular obedience and attachment. It is that which, being the immediate and visible guardian of life and property, having its benefits and its terrors in constant activity before the public eye, regulating all those personal interests and familiar concerns to which the sensibility of individuals is more immediately awake, contributes, more than any other circumstance, to impressing upon the minds of the people, affection, esteem, and reverence toward the Government. This great cement of society, which will diffuse itself almost wholly through the channels of the particular governments, independent of all other causes of influence, would insure them so decided an empire over their respective citizens as to render them at all times a complete counterpoise, and not unfrequently, dangerous rivals to the power of the Union."

Even though Hamilton may not have been accurate in his prediction that the retention of police power in the States would make them "dangerous rivals to the power of the Union," he was entirely accurate in his appraisal of the importance to the concept of federalism of the retention of the police powers within the States. It is no accident that the dictatorships of the recent past, and the Communist nations of the present, are called police states. Every government, of course, exercises police powers; but in the police states those powers are exercised with oppressive ruthlessness by the Central Government rather than by local jurisdictions.

Those of us who represent you in the Federal Government must maintain the concept of States rights if our Government is to remain one of individual freedom and opportunity. But the success of our efforts, and the retention of our liberties and opportunities, depend to a great extent upon those of you who have the duty and responsibility for exercising the great police powers which you continue to hold. I know that Virginia peace officers will, as they have in the past, be worthy custodians of these powers.

Democratic National Convention Keynote Address by Senator Church

OF
HON. ALBERT GORE
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 16, 1960

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, during the recent Democratic National Convention, the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH] delivered a brilliant and eloquent keynote address. His address set the tone of the convention. His address was well composed, masterfully delivered, and splendidly received. Seldom in the history of our country has the honor of delivering a keynote address to a national convention come to one so young as the junior Senator from Idaho; never has it come to one who has spoken more sincerely, more pungently, or more eloquently.

I ask unanimous consent that his very able address, together with some editorial comment which I have collected, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address and the editorial comment were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KEYNOTE ADDRESS BY SENATOR FRANK CHURCH, OF IDAHO, AT THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION, LOS ANGELES, JULY 11, 1960

A keynote speaker is often expected to perform like a cheerleader at a pep rally. But these are solemn times that summon us to reason together. We are Democrats, not because our party has always done everything right, but because it has been the principal party of progress. We face the future with assurance, because of the way our party has served the country in the past.

No other party, for example, has furnished so many great Presidents—the author of our liberties, Thomas Jefferson; the framer of frontier freedom, Andrew Jackson; the sentinel of integrity in public office, Grover Cleveland; the scholarly architect of world order, Woodrow Wilson; the giant of humanitarian reform, Franklin Roosevelt; and that indomitable man of the people, Harry Truman.

Nearly everybody now acclaims the liberal reforms that Democrats had to hammer out, against determined Republican opposition, a few short years ago—the Social Security Act, to give a minimal retirement income to our senior citizens; the minimum wage and hour laws, to upgrade menial wages to decent standards; the REA, bringing electric light to the countryside of America; and the Federal housing program, which has enabled the bulk of our people to become the owners of their own homes.

I wish that time would permit a review of all the achievements of former Democratic administrations. But the laurels of the past alone do not entitle us to the keys to the future. We will deserve to win the coming election, not on account of yesterday's service, but on the basis of the programs we present for today, and the plans we project for tomorrow. Therefore, I must speak to you tonight of the grave crisis confronting us all.

Ours is an awesome age. We live anxiously in the shadow of the mushroom cloud, and wonder whether the human race itself is to be consumed in the witchfire of thermonuclear war. We see the world in upheaval, polarized about two gigantic adversaries, the United States and the Soviet Union. At stake is the shape of the future.

If the Soviet Union is communism on exhibit, even more is the United States the showcase of democracy. How urgent it is for us to demonstrate to all the watching world that democracy has the will to serve vital public needs. How ironic that our national administration should have fallen into the hands of the "holdback" party, during the times that beseeched us to push ahead.

For the heralded "crusade" of 1952 brought only complacency back to Washington. It was the same old "keep cool with Coolidge" attitude of the twenties; it was the familiar "prosperity is just around the corner" spirit which prevented Herbert Hoover from ever coming to grips with the great depression. Once the new Eisenhower "team" had been installed, Madison Avenue eagerly took charge, and a barrage of bland ballyhoo soon filled the land. Like a drug, if you please, it has tranquilized our leadership for ever 7 years.

Now we must be done with this addition. We must seek candid answers to the hard questions: Where do we really stand? Where are we headed? What must we do about it?

We are told by the Republicans to be content, that they have done as much about our problems as we can afford, and that the present prosperity attests to their prudent management of our affairs.

But do we have a wholesome prosperity? I submit it is a pitchman prosperity, the kind that results when government is run by hucksters not unaccustomed to selling inferior products by wrapping them in bright packages.

It is no accident that big business profits are higher than ever, nor that small business is failing at a record rate. The Republicans tell us that this is due to the immutable law of the survival of the fittest. The fittest, of course, are the biggest, as anyone knows who has ever been in an alley fight. If small business doesn't want to get licked, it will have to get out of the alley. In any case, it is "paternalism," according to the Republican rulebook, for the Government to intervene as referee.

Who suffers from this pitchman prosperity? Not just small business, but the farmers as well.

This administration, in dealing with the farm problem, has treated the American people like the fabled blind men of India who went to see the elephant. One felt his side and thought him like a wall; one his tail and thought him like a rope; one his ear and thought him like a fan:

"And so these men of Indostan
Disputed loud and long,
Though each was partly in the right,
And all were in the wrong."

To the farmers, the Republicans have said: "Price supports have induced you to overproduce. We will lower them. Less food will mean higher prices, and this will make you prosperous."

To the consumers, they have said: "We are lifting acreage restrictions and reducing the farmers' price supports. This will mean more food at cheaper prices in the marketplace."

To all of us who are taxpayers, they have said: "We are paring down the farm program to save you taxes."

With such conflicting arguments, the administration won approval from a Republican Congress, in 1954, of its flexible price support program, and the use of the veto has kept it alive ever since. With the same arguments, the program is still defended, despite all the accumulated evidence of its failure.

Has it helped the consumer? The housewife will tell you that groceries are higher than ever.

Has it helped the taxpayer? Why this administration has spent more money on its farm program than all previous administrations combined, from the time the Department of Agriculture was first established in 1862. Instead of declining, our surpluses have grown mammoth. Just to maintain them, now costs us more than a billion dollars a year. For some of those who own storage bins, this may be the road to riches, but for the farmer, it is the road to ruin.

Farm income has dropped 23 percent since 1952, while costs have continued to rise, in a squeeze that has driven nearly 5 million people off the farms. We Democrats reject the proposition that the family farm is finished. The farmer is entitled to a fair return on the food and fiber he raises, and no prosperity is genuine that excludes him.

Yet those who pay for this pitchman prosperity are not confined to either farmers or small businessmen. Workingmen pay for it. Elderly people on pensions pay for it. Everyone who has to borrow pays for it. The cost is exacted in higher interest rates.

I swear Rip Van Winkle could have gone to sleep during anytime in this century past, and upon awakening, could readily have determined which party was in control, merely by asking, "How high are the interest rates?" And, if they were hovering up there close to the ceiling, he could bet his life that the Republicans had taken over in Washington.

One of the first acts of this administration, in 1953, was to raise the interest rates, a policy that has already cost the taxpayers $12 billion, just to pay the increased interest on the national debt. Imagine what the boosted tax cost has been on money borrowed by the States, the cities, and the school districts of the land.

But even this is not all. Pile on top of it the added money paid out by every person who has had to buy his TV set, refrigerator, or automobile, on the installment plan, and you can begin to understand how spiraling interest rates have intensified the inflation, and lifted the cost of living to an alltime high.

The fact is that the tight-money policies of this administration have sapped our vitality and shackled our economic growth. Compare the past 7 years under this Republican administration with the previous 7 years under the Democrats. During the Truman administration, our gross national product increased an average of 4.7 percent each year. Under the Eisenhower administration, the increase has averaged only 2.3 percent, less than half as much. And if our growing population is taken into account, the per capita rate of growth for the 7 years under the Democrats was four times as great as under the Republicans.

Indeed, our economic vigor has been undermined to the point that our urgent needs at home have been left untreated like festering sores.

Private slums are spreading through the rotting cores of our big cities, while our urban renewal and public housing programs are "too little and too late." Our private automobiles are stalled in traffic jams, while rapid public transportation, for lack of funds, lags 20 years behind our needs. Private dissipation flourishes, while public education flounders. The classroom shortage has not been met, and we continue to spend more for liquor and tobacco than for public schools. To sweeten private life, our stores display a billion bottles of deodorant, yet a modest bill to reduce the stench from our polluted public rivers was vetoed, and the urban air—thickening with contamination—begins to threaten public health.

We have cared so much about "conspicuous consumption" that our lives are cluttered with gadgets. Yet, we have cared so little about our public responsibilities, that both young and old have been neglected; gangs of switchblade delinquents haunt the public streets, while the lack of adequate medical care for the aged is fast becoming a national disgrace.

What does all of this portend for America? Are we to become a modern Babylon of public want amidst private glut? Is this to be the last port of call for the great American Republic? Such has been the direction of our course—under this Republican administration.

I say to you: The issue in the coming election is not Dwight Eisenhower, whether the strong or the weak; it is not RICHARD NIXON, whether the new or the old; the issue is our country's course—whether we can risk another 4-year ride on the Republican train.

For it is the same old train. He who sits in the cab up front cannot change the direction of the ride. The train runs on Republican tracks, and they are fixed in place. To change direction, we must change trains, and that is just what the American people plan to do in November.

What will be our new direction? Well, let's see what the Democrats in Congress have done—even in the face of veto, and the threat of veto—these past few years.

We have advanced the cause of good health through larger appropriations for vital medical research against cancer, heart disease, tuberculosis, and a host of other chronic ailments.

We have kept faith wtih our forefathers by overcoming 40 years of resistance, to embrace Alaska and Hawaii within the Federal Union, as our 49th and 50th States.

We have broken a stalemate in the fight for full equality under law, by enacting the first civil rights legislation in 80 years, to better protect the right to vote for all our citizens, regardless of race or color. Much remains to be done, but it is already clear that the Democratic Party is dealing most effectively with the lingering problem of racial intolerance, even as we have rejected religious bigotry. We are proud to count among our leading contenders for the Presidency itself, both Protestant and Catholic alike.

But in other fields, the work of the Democratic Congress has been blocked by the Republican veto. In the field of continued development of our water resources—so important to my own State of Idaho, and the future of the country—the Republican Cabinet is split. One half wants "no new starts," the other half demands "more new stops." Four times in 4 years, rivers and harbors bills have been vetoed.

Twice the Congress has tried to give aid to depressed areas of chronic unemployment, and twice have the bills been vetoed. Twice, because of vetoes, we have seen an adequate public housing program cut below our minimal needs, and many have been the times that Congress has been frustrated in its efforts to deal with the worsening farm problem. Half a dozen major farm bills have been vetoed since 1956.

If only there had been a Democrat in the White House, these past 7 Republican years, and we had continued to enjoy the same rate of economic growth we experienced during the previous 7 Democratic years, there would have been plenty of revenue to enact all of these programs into law, plus urban renewal and school construction besides, without deficit spending, and without need for any increase in Federal taxes.

This is why the American people are determined to put an end to divided government. Not only are they going to reelect a Democratic Congress, but they are going to make sure that the man we nominate in this convention becomes the next President of the United States.

We must make the change. Our problems at home call for it. Our predicament abroad compels it.

The President and his representatives, under the Constitution, conduct our foreign policy. For over 7 years, they have staged it as though the world were a grandstand, where showmanship might be the easy substitute for statesmanship.

Before it's too late, we must begin to see the world realistically. We live on a shrunken planet, where the prevailing order of the past three centuries has been destroyed. New nations rise from the wreckage of old empires, so that our world, like ancient Gaul, lies divided in three parts: One part consists of the Western nations, led by the United States; one part of the Communist nations, dominated by the Soviet Union; while the third part is made up of the newly emerging nations in the old, colonial regions of Africa, Asia, and the southern seas.

These undeveloped and uncommitted nations are the "no man's lands" on which the destiny of the human race will be decided. For if the continents of Africa and Asia are drawn behind the Iron and Bamboo Curtains, the economy of Western Europe is at once undermined. And if we yield Europe, Asia, and Africa to the Communists, the balance of power will fatally shift against us, thus assuring eventual Communist domination of all the world.

Two ways of life—freedom and communism—are locked in mortal competition. Until the debris has been cleared away from the wrecked summit conference in Paris, until the tumult that turned the President back from Tokyo is better understood, we cannot know, for sure, what form this competition may take. But this we do know: we shall either win it or lose it. There is no way out of it. History's verdict will be rendered. The days of our years will determine whether freedom shall endure.

Accordingly, we must inquire, How have the Communists been doing in this dire contest?

A few months ago, my wife and I stood in a long line which moved slowly across the Red Square in Moscow, into the marble mausoleum beneath the Kremlin wall. We went there to see the mortal remains of Lenin and Stalin, laid out upon beds of bronze. The mausoleum is the pagan cathedral of world communism, and each day the "comrades" comes there, three and four abreast, in a never-ending procession.

It is the same procession that emerged from the ruin of Russia at the end of the Second World War to thrust up a Red empire—the only new empire of the 20th century. It now engulfs all of Eastern Europe and vast China, and encloses a third of the world's people within its spreading reach. Its method of expansion has always been conquest, either from within or from without; in no Communist land have the people ever freely voted the system in, and in no such land have they ever been given a chance to vote it out.

Now the tyranny invades the Middle East, and plants its seeds in restless Africa.

I have listened to Nikita Khrushchev, behind the closed doors of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. I have heard his certain prediction that communism would win history's verdict. He boasted that, although we may be freemen, our grandchildren will be Communists.

Is this an idle boast? The Communists have seized a third of the world in 15 years. History does not record another conquest so large in so short a time. I submit to you that the fateful decisions taken in Washington today and tomorrow will determine whether or not our grandchildren shall be free.

These are the grave stakes deeply involved in the coming national election, and the mission of the Democratic Party is to reawaken America to the mighty task before her. The hinge of the future swings on the United States. The maintenance of peace, the preservation of freedom, the fate of the world, all ultimately depend upon American principle, American prestige, and American power.

What has been happening to American principle? Under Truman we had a Marshall plan to restore economic strength to the free governments of Western Europe, but of late we have courted tyrants, as though they were the friends of freedom.

We have pinned medals upon the chests of hated dictators like Peron of Argentina and Perez Jimenez of Venezuela, and when they were driven into exile, we were aghast at the stoning of our own Vice President on the streets of Caracas.

We have carelessly furnished weapons to other petty tyrants, like Batista in Cuba, who turned them upon his own people, and now we are dismayed at the vehemence of the "Hate America" rallies in Havana.

We have helped to arm a Fascist Franco in Spain, and a Communist Tito in Yugoslavia, until the world has been left to wonder if we still stand for freedom. And as traditional American principles have been obscured, a tide of suspicion and hostility rises against us.

We must also ask: What has happened to American prestige?

Long have we been known as a generous people. Since the end of the Second World War, we have given freely of our treasure to help raise standards in far-flung parts of the world. To the needy, our hand has been extended in friendship. Yet, an overemphasis on military aid has caused the hand, in many places, to be mistaken for a fist. Worse still, by allowing our surplus foods to pile up in massive quantities, by failing for too long to implement an imaginative food-for-peace program, this administration has wrongfully permitted the ugly image to spread of a fat America hoarding food in a hungry world.

But our prestige has suffered in yet another way. We live in an age of science, when men equate national excellence with technological achievement. In such a competition, how could this country—the most highly industrialized and technically advanced in history—possibly stumble and fall behind? Well, during these Republican years, we've done it.

Somehow we lost, and have yet to recapture, the initiative in space. The Russians were the first to launch a satellite, the first to strike, and then to photograph the far side of the moon, the first to orbit the sun. So effectively have they capitalized on these feats, that our own public opinion experts tell us that the average citizen of the world believes today that the Soviet Union has become the leading scientific nation. Don't ever discount the effect of this upon people in primitive lands, where the promise of modern science alone seems to hold out hope for a better life in the years ahead.

So we are left with the final question: What has happened to American power?

As long as the Russian and Chinese Governments live by the sword, our military strength must be second to none. We understand that arms alone can never perpetuate the peace, but can only buy us time with which to supplant the rule of force among nations with the rule of law.

Yet it must be clear by now that if this objective is ever to be won, if nuclear weapons tests are ever to be suspended, if open skies for the prevention of surprise attack is ever to be established, if enforcible arms control is ever to commence, these complicated problems will be worked out—not at ceremonial summit conferences—but through long, painstaking, and skillful negotiation. At the conference table, our chances for success will depend upon our ability to negotiate, not from weakness, but from strength.

What has happened to our strength? Our Army has shrunk from 20 to 14 divisions. Our Navy has lost scores of fighting ships. We concede to the Russians superior numbers of intercontinental ballistic missiles, which we ourselves describe as the "ultimate weapon." Still, we are told by this administration that we need not match the Soviet Union in missile strength, for this would impose too heavy a strain upon us. Is it possible that the richest nation in history can no longer afford to be the strongest?

In these many ways, we have watched our country shrink in stature, only to be told that Mr. NIXON, the single aspirant in either party who upholds the very policies that have led us into fiasco, is the man best qualified to lead us out.

Well, the American people won't be fooled. Remembering the famous admonition of Theodore Roosevelt, "Speak softly and carry a big stick," they are not about to substitute, "Talk tough and carry a toothpick."

They know that scowls will never scuttle the Communist thrust, that this can be accomplished only by a mighty striving to revive American principle, to restore American prestige, and to rebuild American power.

I shall never forget the words of a Polish lady, spoken to me last year on the square of the inner city of old Warsaw. She spoke with a wisdom and perspective forged in nearly a century of life. "Senator," she said to me, "America is truly the hope of the world."

It is the American Revolution—not the Russian—that has served as the inspiration of all people who would be free.

It is the American industrial revolution—not the touted "class struggle"—that has created, here in the United States, the world's most classless society.

It is the American technological revolution—not the proletarian state—that has produced, here in the United States, a standard of living that is the marvel of the world.

Nominate a man who will summon this priceless heritage to work. Give us a leader whose program will match this atomic age, and the Democratic Party—true to its tradition—will once again lift our country upon the highroad of destiny.

For only an awakened and rededicated America can raise a standard around which the great fraternity of the free can rally, to summon from a new-found unity, the resolution and the strength to make history's verdict ours.

This is the case for all America that the Democratic Party must carry to the people.

God help us plead it well.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

Los Angeles Evening Express:

"The keynote speech at the Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles was a brilliant political address delivered in dynamic fashion by young FRANK CHURCH, U.S. Senator from Idaho.

"It was a red hot attack on the 7 years of Republican administration in which the speaker detailed what he asserted to be the failures of the top GOP leadership in dealing not only with domestic issues, but also with the tense international crisis.

"And highly laudable in his forceful fighting keynote address was his assertion that peace, freedom, and the fate of the world 'all ultimately depend upon American principle, American prestige, and American power.'"

Los Angeles Examiner:

"As to Senator CHURCH'S keynote speech, it was a vigorous and masterful statement in the grand old tradition of partisan politics."

Washington (D.C.) Post:

"The Democratic keynote speech of Senator FRANK CHURCH * * * was a competent partisan address to a partisan convention assembled for the serious business of choosing a man qualified to be the next President of the United States."

The Portland (Oreg.) Oregonian:

"Senator CHURCH has well performed the task assigned him."

The New York Times:

"Senator CHURCH'S speech was superior to many such in the past. * * * There is a great deal with which we agree in (his) analysis; but we do not find it so easy as he did to apportion the praise and blame along strictly party lines."

Idaho Statesman (Boise):

"Idahoans generally, and her Democrats particularly, will applaud the honor and accomplishment involved in Senator FRANK CHURCH'S keynote address at the Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles. A finished orator, Mr. CHURCH undoubtedly set the theme of the convention, and he did it well.

"What we are watching is American history in the making, and Senator CHURCH, assigned an important place in that activity, did an excellent job in a modernized, fairly brief type keynote address. Unlike tradition, which says that keynoters talk their way into the political graveyard, we think the young Senator attracted favorable attention to himself and the State he represents. Often we disagree with his liberal philosophies but Monday night we felt that he filled an important pair of political shoes with deep determination and enthusiasm. As Idahoans we are proud of the recognition that came to one our citizens."

Lewiston (Idaho) Morning Tribune:

"We commend the speech to the readers of the Tribune, not simply because the speaker is an Idahoan whom many in this area know personally, but, more importantly, because the speech itself is a particularly good one.

"Unlike the usual keynote address, this one wrestles seriously with serious issues: perilous difficulties abroad, wasteful consumption and irresponsibility at home, the erosion of American power and prestige, an absence of executive leadership.

"More than anything else, this was a statement of faith in what the Nation could do if she set herself to doing it, and a declaration of what she must do if disaster is to be avoided.

"It has not traditionally been the purpose of a keynote speech to scold or enlighten but to enthuse, and this one contains its fair share of the trappings of convention oratory. But it contains, in addition, a larger proportion of substance than conventions have grown accustomed to."

The Salt Lake (Utah) Tribune:

"The keynote speech of young, handsome Senator FRANK CHURCH of Idaho at the Democratic National Convention was in keeping with the new political accent on youth and the electronic age.

"While dynamic and to the point, the 45-minute address was terse and restrained, compared with some keynote addresses of past political conventions.

"The sincerity of the youngest Member of the U.S. Senate was impressive.

"Senator CHURCH spoke without notes and without using a teleprompter.

"The able Idahoan drew favorable attention to his State and to the Intermountain West. Many oldtimers undoubtedly recalled the days when another Idaho Senator, the late William E. Borah, was prominent in the conventions and operations of the opposing party."

The Intermountain (Pocatello, Idaho):

"It was a superb appeal to his party. He implored them to restore freedom as the Nation's key export commodity, and to proceed without apology to take new Federal action against festering domestic problems.

"The Senator warned against our becoming a modern Babylon, privately glutted in a state starving for lack of purpose."

The Garden City (Idaho) Gazette:

"FRANK CHURCH did Idaho proud Monday evening.

"His keynote address at the Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles was another example of the masterful oratory that Idahoans have long recognized in the young Senator.

"Once before Idaho produced a U.S. Senator who was known throughout the Nation for his oratory and who brought fame to the Gem State. FRANK CHURCH'S performance Monday night has put him well on the way to being a second Borah in the eyes of the country."

POLITICAL COLUMNISTS

C. F. Byrns in the Fort Smith (Ark.) Southwest American:

"The high spot in the first session of the Democratic National Convention Monday was a brilliant keynote speech by the Senate's youngest Member, Senator FRANK CHURCH, of Boise, Idaho. * * * If there has ever been a keynoter so young, I do not recall it. There have been few who approached his oratorical skill and his attractive personality.

"Senator CHURCH impressed me, not alone for what he said, but how he said it. In a gathering such as this, the speakers normally and obviously refer to written scripts. Senator CHURCH may have had a manuscript tucked away somewhere out of sight; but if he had, he neither used nor needed it. He spoke easily, vigorously, dynamically, and persuasively, covering multiple ideas and situations with sharp criticism of the present administration—which was the object of the meeting."

Roy Ringer in the Los Angeles Mirror News:

"CHURCH of Idaho, at 35 the youngest U.S. Senator, was proof incarnate that the slam-bang art of political oratory is far from dead.

"Matching gesture to voice, inflection to emotion, his 45-minute keynote address was in the grand tradition."

Richard L. Strout in the Christian Science Monitor:

"Boyish looking FRANK CHURCH'S national televised keynote address fulfilled all the standard qualifications of this kind of performance, and added something more.

"Because the United States is engaged in a desperate struggle with communism the Democratic keynote had deeper significance. It not only indicated the prospective Democratic line of attack, but in its own way it seemed to make the attempt, however successfully, to voice the call to greatness which the times require.

"Thus his address, which was interrupted 42 times by applause, touched great issues. The apple-cheeked young Idaho Senator used a style and delivery which were, for this kind of thing, relatively models of restraint. In fact, at various points he seemed to get near the issues that really separate the two great parties."

Frank Hewlett in the Spokesman Review (Spokane, Wash.):

"Idaho's Senator FRANK CHURCH was showered with more than 150 congratulatory telegrams Tuesday on his keynote speech before the Democratic National Convention.

"They came from all sections of the country—and included two from self-styled Republicans who said he had converted them.

"The press also treated the Gem Stater well.

"The Los Angeles Times said he 'did not disappoint the throngs who came to hear him' and the New York Herald Tribune praised the delivery and sincerity of the man from the Potato State.

"Only three or four of the stack of messages were critical. A couple merely attacked the Democratic Party's past position on international affairs.

"An Illinois fan said 'Your speech was like giving light to the blind.'

"A New Yorker commented 'inspiring speech, fit for president' and a Missourian said 'Your speech was the best since Franklin D. Roosevelt.'

"An Ohio man said 'run for president' and one from Tennessee said 'Can't think of a stronger ticket than KENNEDY and CHURCH.'

"'Would be to God that there were more men like you in our great country,' said a message from Rhode Island and from Washington, D.C., came one saying 'Applying now for front row seat on your bandwagon.'

"'Help me organize Republicans for KENNEDY,' messaged a California woman and a New York telegram said 'A Republican small businessman thought your speech excellent.'

"From his home State there was a message from Pocatello which read, 'Fine job, FRANK,' and from Nampa was a message saying the speech was excellent and added the 'TV reception here was fine.'"

Eleanor Roberts in the Boston Traveler:

"The man who won the vote—without so much as a battle—as the glamour boy and Demosthenes of the Democrats last night was handsome, 35-year-old Senator FRANK CHURCH of Boise, Idaho.

"He provided the chief excitement in an otherwise dull evening.

"When he finished his impassioned moving keynote speech—delivered with such force and in such colorful language—he not only brought the convention to its feet for the first time, but left viewers at home silently cheering.

"Obviously, CHURCH knew his speech perfectly. And since he had no need of a teleprompter, he could concentrate on putting it across. Almost every sentence was accompanied by gestures, like raising hands high to indicate how interest rates on installment plans had 'piled up' during the Republican administration.

"It was a dramatic, serious speech in spite of the many catch phrases, and no elder statesman could have put over more effectively the terrifying warning that Russia had conquered one-third of the world in 15 years, a historymaking record."

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 17, 1960

(Legislative day of Thursday, August 11, 1960)

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Vice President.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou hidden source of calm repose, in Thy closer presence the jangling discords of our lives are stilled into the peace that is found only in Thy will.

No matter what gulfs may stretch between us in our feeling or our thinking, in all the traffic of our ways we are one in our desperate need of—

A little shrine of quietness
All sacred to Thyself,
Where Thou shalt all our soul possess
And we may find ourself.

Thus, as in a world of sound and fury, we move in haste from one task to another, may we not miss the green oases with their waving palms and crystal springs which daily beckon—where the light of heaven may shed its radiance on our lives, the vision of the highest and the best enlarge our minds, and the love of God find room in our hearts.

For the dear Redeemer's sake we ask it. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, August 16, 1960, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement entered on yesterday, it is my understanding that the Senate will proceed until 2 o'clock, but that no vote will be taken prior thereto on any amendment, and that the time will be divided equally and will be controlled by the sponsor of the amendment and the majority leader, if he is opposed to the amendment; or, if not, by the minority leader.

I should like to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas how long he would think would be necessary for consideration of the treaties on the calendar which he wishes to call up.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It is my understanding that the treaties are noncontroversial and there is no objection to them; and I think only a very short explanation of them will be needed for the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Then, if agreeable, I shall yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I did not expect to have them considered now; but I can obtain the papers in a very few minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that 10 minutes be made available to the Senator from Arkansas, in connection with consideration of the treaties, and that that time not be charged to the time available to either side under the agreement, although in effect it will come out of the time available to both.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, are we to have a morning hour this morning as of right? If not, why not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate convened this morning following a recess, and there is not to be a morning hour.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The reason is that the Senate has entered into a unanimous-consent agreement by all of its Members. That is the reason. The Senator asked, "Why not?" The reason is set forth on the front of the calendar, and the Senator can read it there.

Mr. JAVITS. But that was not true yesterday, and it may not be true tomorrow. My parliamentary inquiry applies to the general situation.

Let me ask the majority leader whether he intends at any time during this session to adjourn the Senate on any evening when the session for that day is finished.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The majority leader has no disposition to keep the Senate in continuous session. As soon as we act on the pending bill, or it may very well be that we shall adjourn tomorrow——

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would say every Senator gave his consent; and a fair answer to the Senator's inquiry would be that yesterday the Senate entered into an order that provides that beginning at 10 o'clock this morning the time is to be equally divided for the purpose of debate on an amendment to the very important minimum wage bill.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Texas will recognize that on yesterday, when we entered into the unanimous-consent agreement pertaining to my amendment, the agreement had not then been reduced to writing, and was proposed in all good faith in an effort to move toward a solution of the problem.

I believe that the full 4 hours should be allowed for the debate. I am perfectly willing to have the Senator from Texas——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not wish to be picayunish to the Senator from Florida. I will give him the full 2 hours of his time, and we shall try to have a yea-and-nay vote on the treaty and allow additional time therefor.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is never picayunish.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may now yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas, in connection with the treaties.

Mr. KUCHEL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. President, the acting minority leader raises this question: He assumes there will be yea-and-nay votes on the treaties. It was the understanding of some of the Members on the minority side, on yesterday, that there would be no yea-and-nay votes until this afternoon.

Does the majority leader indicate that the yea-and-nay votes on the treaties would come after 2 o'clock this afternoon?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. We had given assurance that before that time there would be no yea-and-nay votes except on some question such as adjourning.

Mr. KUCHEL. Second, does the majority leader plan to ask unanimous consent that some of the committees be permitted to sit while the Senate is in session today?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Until now, I have not received any such requests. If I do receive requests of that sort, I shall submit them.

Mr. KUCHEL. It was my understanding, according to what I read in the newspaper this morning, that the Judiciary Committee was going to hold an open hearing on the Presidential nomination of an Assistant Attorney General, and that the Banking and Currency Committee was likewise contemplating sitting with respect to a Presidential nomination. I think it would be distressing if those committees were not permitted to proceed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I may say that since the Senator began to speak, we have received a request from the Judiciary Committee, but it has just now been submitted to us. It reads "during the session of the Senate until noon today."

Mr. KUCHEL. If the majority leader would consider making that request——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I shall consider it.

But first I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, is a unanimous-consent request pending?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes; that I may yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Then, Mr. President, I withdraw the request.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me? I have no objection to his request; I merely wish to finish what I began to say before about the matter of adjourning or taking a recess.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I shall withhold it.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes, but I do not want the Senator from New York to take up all the time.

Mr. JAVITS. I shall not. I expect to speak for only 30 seconds. I am not long winded, as the Senator from Texas knows.

Of course, Mr. President, I am aware of the fact that the unanimous-consent agreement has been entered into. I, myself, joined in entering into it. But there are certain procedures which are followed when the Senate adjourns, instead of taking a recess; and I merely wish to ascertain at a convenient time the intentions of the majority leader—nothing else. I was not impugning at all what happened this morning.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from New York never impugns; I understand that.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the following committees and subcommittees were authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today:

The subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary considering the nomination of Robert A. Bicks, of New York, to be Assistant Attorney General.

The Committee on Banking and Currency.

The Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Fiscal Affairs Subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Indian Affairs Subcommittee of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs be permitted to sit during the session of the Senate today.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communications and letters, which were referred as indicated:

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE BUDGET, 1961, FOR MUTUAL SECURITY PROGRAMS (S. DOC. NO. 117)

A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting an amendment to the budget for the fiscal year 1961, involving an increase in the amount of $100 million for mutual security programs (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE BUDGET, 1961, FOR VARIOUS AGENCIES IN EXECUTIVE BRANCH AND DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA (S. DOC. NO. 118)

A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting proposed supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year 1961, in the amount of $39,213,050 for various agencies in the executive branch and $155,000 for the District of Columbia (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PLANS FOR WORKS OF IMPROVEMENT IN MARYLAND, OKLAHOMA, TEXAS, AND VIRGINIA

A letter from the Director, Bureau of the Budget, Executive Office of the President, transmitting, pursuant to law, plans for works of improvement on Long Marsh, Md., Timber Creek, Okla., Kickapoo Creek, Tex., and Leatherwood Creek, Va. (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

MAINTENANCE AND OPERATION OF WOODROW WILSON MEMORIAL BRIDGE

A letter from the President, Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to provide for apportioning the expense of maintaining and operating the Woodrow Wilson Memorial Bridge over the Potomac River from Jones Point, Va., to Maryland (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORT OF AMERICAN SOCIETY OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

A letter from the executive secretary, the American Society of International Law, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual audit by a certified public accountant of the financial transactions of that society, covering the period April 1, 1959–March 31, 1960 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PLANS FOR WORKS OF IMPROVEMENT IN OKLAHOMA AND TEXAS

A letter from the Director, Bureau of the Budget, Executive Office of the President, transmitting, pursuant to law, plans for works of improvement on Fourche Maline Creek, and Leader-Middle Clear Boggy Creek, Okla., and Plum Creek, Tex. (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Works.

PETITION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from A. L. Vincelette, of St. Augustine, Fla., relating to juvenile delinquency, which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. KERR, from the Committee on Finance, with an amendment:

H.R. 270. An act to amend title 38, United States Code, to increase the rate of special pension payable to certain persons awarded the Medal of Honor, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 1837).

AMERICAN REPUBLICS COOPERATION ACT

Mr. FULBRIGHT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an original bill (S. 3861) to provide for assistance in the development of Latin America and in the reconstruction of Chile, and for other purposes, and submitted a report (No. 1838) thereon; which bill was read twice by its title and placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CASE of New Jersey:

S. 3860. A bill for the relief of Wieslawa Barbara Krzak; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FULBRIGHT:

S. 3861. A bill to provide for assistance in the development of Latin America and in the reconstruction of Chile, and for other purposes; placed on the calendar.

(See reference to the above bill when reported by Mr. FULBRIGHT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations.)

By Mr. CHURCH:

S. 3862. A bill to provide that certain funds shall be made available to the Nez Perce Tribe of Idaho; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

(See the remarks of Mr. CHURCH when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

AVAILABILITY OF CERTAIN FUNDS TO THE NEZ PERCE TRIBE OF IDAHO

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide that certain funds shall be made available to the Nez Perce Indian Tribe in Idaho.

In 1894 the Congress approved an agreement with the Nez Perce Indians which provided for $1,626,222 to be paid to the Indians as compensation for land and other rights transferred to the United States. At this time there remains in the Treasury of the United States, in two special funds, a little over $6,000 remaining due the Indians arising out of this transaction. Of this, $2,193.33 is in the principal account, and as of October 15, 1959, $4,261.38, interest and accruals on interest. This money is nominally held for individuals who did not receive their shares in the original distributions, made in the years 1895 through 1900.

There is now no way to determine to whom the unexpended balances in the account belong.

The bill I am introducing, at the request of the tribe, would make this small amount of money which belongs to the Nez Perces available for such tribal purposes as may be requested by the tribe and approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3862) to provide that certain funds shall be made available to the Nez Perce Tribe of Idaho, introduced by Mr. CHURCH, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

THE INVOLUNTARY CONVERSION TREATMENT OF PROPERTY DISPOSED OF TO EFFECTUATE ANTITRUST POLICIES—AMENDMENT

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I submit an amendment to section 13 of House bill 5547, with respect to income tax treatment in which the taxpayer is compelled to divest himself of property as a result of governmental action.

I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the RECORD, and remain at the Vice President's desk.

I also wish to state that when the Senate considers H.R. 5547, I expect to offer as an amendment Senate bill 2883, which provides the same Federal income tax treatment for prepaid dues income received by a nonprofit motor club as is provided for prepaid subscription income.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and will lie on the table; and, without objection, the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment is as follows:

On page —, line —, insert the following:

"That subchapter O of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to gain or loss on disposition of property) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new part:

"'PART IX—DISTRIBUTIONS OF STOCK AND DISPOSITIONS OF PROPERTY PURSUANT TO ORDERS ENFORCING THE ANTITRUST LAWS

"'SEC. 1112. DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY TO EFFECTUATE ANTITRUST POLICIES.

"'(a) NONRECOGNITION OF GAIN.—If property (other than stock or securities) is sold or exchanged solely as the result of a judgment, decree, or other order of a court or of a Commission or Board authorized to enforce compliance in a suit or other proceeding brought by the United States or such Commission or Board under the Sherman Act (26 Stat. 209, 15 U.S.C., secs. 1–7), or the Clayton Act (38 Stat. 730, 15 U.S.C., secs. 12–27), and none of the defendants in such proceedings has been named as a defendant in criminal proceedings, such sale or exchange shall, at the election of the taxpayer, be treated as an involuntary conversion of such property within the meaning of section 1033.

"'(b) EXCEPTION.—Subsection (a) shall not apply if the taxpayer could have reasonably anticipated a violation of the Sherman Act (26 Stat. 209, 15 U.S.C., secs. 1–7), or of the Clayton Act (38 Stat. 730, 15 U.S.C., secs. 12–27), at the time of the transactions which gave rise to the proceedings brought under such Acts.

"'(c) DISPOSITIONS TO AVOID FEDERAL INCOME TAX.—Subsection (a) shall not apply to any sale or exchange of property which is in pursuance of a plan having as one of its principal purposes the avoidance of Federal income taxes.

"'(d) REINVESTMENT OF PROCEEDS.—In the case of a sale or exchange of property described in subsection (a), the requirements of section 1033 dealing with investment in property shall be satisfied if the proceeds of the sale have been invested in other property for use in a trade or business and such investment is not inconsistent with the terms of the judgment, decree, or order referred to in subsection (a). In the case of a sale or exchange of property described in subsection (a), the other property in which the proceeds have been invested shall not satisfy the requirements of section 1033 dealing with investment in property unless it is certified by—

"'(1) the Attorney General of the United States or his delegate, if the suit or other proceeding described in subsection (a) was instituted by the Attorney General, or

"'(2) the Commission or Board, if the suit or other proceeding described in subsection (a) was instituted by such Commission or Board, that the investment in such property is not inconsistent with the Sherman Act (26 Stat. 209, 15 U.S.C., secs. 1 to 7), or the Clayton Act (38 Stat. 730, 15 U.S.C., secs. 12 to 27).'

"SEC. 2. Section 1033(a)(3)(B) is amended by redesignating clause (ii) as clause (iii) and by inserting after clause (i) the following new clause:

"'(ii) in the case of a sale or exchange described in section 1112 and to which section 453 applies, on the last day of the taxable year in which the final payment is made, or'

"SEC. 3. Section 1112 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as added by the first section of this Act, and the amendment made by section 2 of this Act, shall apply with respect to amounts received after December 31, 1959, irrespective of the time of the sale or exchange."

SOCIAL SECURITY AMENDMENTS OF 1960—AMENDMENT

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, at this time I submit an amendment to H.R. 12580, the Social Security Amendments of 1960.

I submit the amendment on behalf of myself, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], and myself.

I ask unanimous consent that a brief statement dealing with the amendment be printed in the RECORD at this point, because time is somewhat limited before the measure may be before the Congress, the text of the proposal be printed in the RECORD, as well as a copy of a letter from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] to me, expressing interest in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table; and, without objection, the statement, amendment, and letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement, amendment, and letter are as follows:

SUMMARY OF AMENDMENT ADDING HEALTH BENEFITS FOR THE AGED TO OLD-AGE, SURVIVORS, AND DISABILITY INSURANCE

The amendment provides a fully financed social insurance program.

1. PERSONS ELIGIBLE

All persons eligible for old-age, survivors, and disability insurance benefits who are aged 68 or more would receive lifetime protection, without any means or income test. Nine million persons would be eligible next year, or nearly 3 out of 5 of all persons over age 65.

2. BENEFITS

The cost of 4 important types of health services is covered, subject to certain limits within 1 year:

(a) Hospital inpatient services, for up to 120 days. The individual pays the first $75 each year.

(b) Skilled nursing home recuperative care, up to 240 days.

(c) Home health services by a nonprofit or public agency, up to 365 visits.

(d) Diagnostic outpatient hospital services, including X-ray and laboratory services.

(e) The first 3 types of benefits have interchangeable features with an overall ceiling. A total of 180 units of services are available in 1 year. A unit of service is equal to 1 day of inpatient hospital care, 2 days of skilled nursing home care, or 3 home health visits. This provision is intended to keep down costs and encourage use of other facilities than a hospital.

3. COSTS AND FINANCING

The program would be fully financed and actuarially sound. It would require no appropriations from general revenues nor any contributions by the retired aged.

(a) The level-premium or long-range cost is estimated as 0.50 percent of taxable payrolls.

(b) Contribution rates would be increased in 1961 as follows: One-fourth percent for employers and employees, and three-eighths of a percent for the self-employed, on earnings up to $4,800 a year. These additional contributions would be set apart in a separate account in the OASI trust fund from which all payments for medical services would be made.

4. ADMINISTRATION

(a) The Secretary of HEW would consult with a representative advisory council on policy and regulations.

(b) Agreements relating to the provision of services would be made with the provider of service or with its authorized representative. Any qualified provider of services would have the right to participate, and individuals could choose among them. Payments would be based on the reasonable cost of rendering the services.

(c) Nothing in the act shall be construed to give the Secretary supervision or control of the practice of medicine or the manner in which medical services are provided, or over the administration of participating institutions.

(d) The Secretary is to carry on studies and make recommendations on problems related to the operation and improvement of the program.

MEDICAL INSURANCE FOR THE AGED

SEC. 604. (a) Title II of the Social Security Act is amended by adding after section 225 the following new section:

"MEDICAL INSURANCE BENEFITS

"Entitlement to benefits

"SEC. 226. (a)(1) Every individual who—

"(A) has attained the age of sixty-eight, and

"(B) is entitled to monthly insurance benefits under section 202, shall be entitled to have payment made under this section on his behalf for inpatient hospital services, skilled nursing home services, home health services, and outpatient hospital diagnostic services, furnished in the United States on or after whichever of the following days is the latest: (i) the first day of the month in which he attains the age of sixty-eight, (ii) the first day of the first month for which he becomes entitled to benefits under section 202, (iii) in the case of inpatient hospital services, July 1, 1961, or (iv) in the case of all other services, January 1, 1962.

"(2) For purposes of this subsection, an individual shall be deemed entitled to monthly benefits under section 202 for the month in which he died if he would have been entitled to such monthly benefits for such month had he not died in such month.

"Limitations on payment for services

"(b)(1) Payment for services furnished an individual may be made only in accordance with the provisions of subsection (e) and only if—

"(A) written request is filed for such payment in such form, in such manner, within such time, and by such person as the Secretary may by regulation prescribe, and

"(B) such services are furnished after referral by a physician who certifies in writing

(and recertifies, where such services are furnished over a period of time, in such cases and with such frequency as the Secretary may by regulation prescribe) that such services (other than outpatient hospital diagnostic services) are or were required for his medical treatment or that in the case of outpatient hospital diagnostic services, such services are or were required for diagnostic study; except that such referral shall not be required for inpatient hospital services in case of an emergency which makes such referral impracticable.

"(C) with respect to inpatient hospital services for a continuous period in excess of thirty days, such services are furnished after the need for continued hospitalization has, in such cases and at such intervals as the Secretary may by regulation prescribe, been reviewed by a hospital committee that includes two or more physicians.

"(2) Payment for inpatient hospital services furnished an individual during any benefit period shall be reduced (but not below zero) by a deduction equal to $75.

"(3) Payment under this section for services furnished an individual during a benefit period may not be made for any inpatient hospital services, skilled nursing home services, or home health services after one hundred and eighty units of services have been furnished to him in any such period. For the purpose of this paragraph a unit of service shall be equal to each day on which inpatient hospital services are furnished to him, each two days on which skilled nursing home services are furnished to him, or each three visits during which home health services are furnished to him. Nor may payment under this section for services furnished any individual during a benefit period be made for—

"(A) inpatient hospital services furnished to him during such period after such services have been furnished him on one hundred and twenty days during such period;

"(B) skilled nursing home services furnished to him during such period after such services have been furnished him on two hundred and forty days after transfer from a hospital;

"(C) home health services furnished to him during such period after such services have been furnished to him during three hundred and sixty-five visits in such period.

"(4) For purposes of this section, a 'benefit period' with respect to an individual means a period—

"(A) beginning with the first day (not included in a previous benefit period) in which such individual both is furnished any of the following services: inpatient hospital services, skilled nursing home services, home health services, or outpatient hospital diagnostic services and is entitled to have payment made under this section with respect thereto, and

"(B) ending with the three hundred and sixty-fourth day following such first day.

"Review of determinations

"(c) Any individual (other than a provider of services) dissatisfied with any determination made by the Secretary as to whether he is entitled to have payment made under this section for services furnished him, or as to the amount of such payment, shall be entitled to a hearing thereon by the Secretary to the same extent as is provided in section 205(b) with respect to decisions of the Secretary, and to judicial review of the Secretary's final decision after such hearing as is provided in section 205(g).

"Description of medical insurance benefits

"(d) For the purpose of this section—

"(1) The term 'inpatient hospital services' means the following items furnished to a hospital inpatient: bed and board in the hospital in semiprivate accommodations unless they are unavailable, or other accommodations are required for medical reasons, or other accommodations not more expensive than semiprivate are occupied at his request; and such nursing, and other services, such use of hospital facilities, and such drugs, supplies, and appliances, as are customarily furnished by the hospital for the care and treatment of inpatients while in the hospital; including ambulance services medically required, whether or not furnished by the hospital; and including laboratory, diagnostic X-ray, anesthesiology, physiotherapy, and other ancillary services which are customarily furnished to inpatients either by the hospital or by another person under agreement with the hospital; but excluding clinical medical and surgical services except those rendered in the course of an approved program of medical teaching;

"(2) The term 'skilled nursing home services' means the following items furnished to an inpatient by a skilled nursing facility after transfer from a hospital and which are certified by a physician as being required in connection with the condition or conditions for which he was hospitalized: (A) skilled nursing care provided by a registered professional nurse or a licensed practical nurse; (B) such medical and other services as are generally provided by skilled nursing home facilities; and (C) bed and board in connection with the furnishing of such skilled nursing care;

"(3) The term 'home health services' means (A) professional nursing care by a registered professional nurse or a licensed practical nurse in a place of residence maintained as an individual's home, prescribed by a physician and provided through a visiting nursing agency; and (B) part-time homemaker services; physical and occupational therapy, medical social services, dietary counseling, ambulance service and similar allied services in an individual's home, prescribed by a physician and provided through a homemaker service agency.

"(4) The term 'outpatient hospital diagnostic services' means diagnostic X-ray and laboratory services, and such other services, drugs, and supplies as are generally provided by hospitals to outpatients for the purpose of diagnostic study;

"(5) The term 'hospital' means an institution which (A) is operated in accordance with the laws of the jurisdiction in which it is located pertaining to such facility and in accordance with standards established by the authorities responsible for such standards in such jurisdiction; (B) is primarily engaged in providing diagnostic and therapeutic facilities for surgical and medical diagnosis, treatment, and care of injured and sick persons by or under the supervision of physicians or surgeons; (C) maintains adequate medical records; and (D) continuously provides twenty-four-hour nursing service rendered or supervised by registered graduate nurses. The term 'hospital' shall not include a tuberculosis or mental hospital;

"(6) The term 'skilled nursing facility' means a facility which (A) is operated to provide skilled nursing services in accordance with the laws of the jurisdiction in which it is located pertaining to such facility and in accordance with standards established by the authorities responsible for such standards in such jurisdiction; (B) has beds for the care of patients who require continuing planned medical and nursing care; (C) is under the continuous supervision of a registered nurse or physician; and (D) is operated in connection with a hospital or has medical policies established by one or more physicians (who are responsible for the execution of such policies) to govern the skilled nursing care and related medical care and other services which it provides; (E) maintains adequate medical records; and (F) continuously provides twenty-four-hour nursing service by registered graduate nurses or licensed practical nurses;

"(7) The term 'visiting nurse agency' means a public or other nonprofit agency operated in accordance with medical policies which are established by one or more physicians (who are responsible for supervising the execution of such policies) and which govern the visiting nurse services it provides;

"(8) The term 'homemaker service agency' means a public or other nonprofit agency that employs personnel to furnish home help services to convalescent, or acutely chronically ill, aged persons; and

"(9) The term 'physician' means an individual (including a physician within the meaning of section 1101(a)(7) licensed to practice surgery or medicine by the State in which he provides surgical or medical services.

"Agreements with providers of services

"(e)(1) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall, at the request of any hospital, skilled nursing facility, visiting nurse agency, or homemaker service agency (hereinafter and in subsection (c) referred to as a 'provider of services'), enter into an agreement with such hospital, facility, or agency for payment for services furnished to individuals entitled to have such payment made under this section. Each such agreement shall contain such provisions, not inconsistent with the provisions of this section, as may be mutually agreed to by the Secretary and such provider of services.

"(2) Any agreement entered into pursuant to paragraph (1) shall provide that—

"(A) the provider of services will not charge any individual (or any other person) for services for which such individual is entitled to have payment made under this section, and will make adequate provision for return of any moneys incorrectly collected from such individual or other person;

"(B) the Secretary will pay to any provider of services the reasonable cost of services specified in subparagraph (A) (less the deductions provided for in subsection (b)(2)), but only if the provider of services furnishes such information at such time and in such form as the Secretary may by regulation require; the Secretary shall determine such reasonable costs and in making such determinations is authorized to use such method or methods of estimating as he may by regulation prescribe;

"(C) no payment will be made to any provider of services for any service which such provider is obligated by a law of, or a contract with, the United States to render at public expense;

"(D) where a provider of services furnishes to an individual at his request services which are described in subsection (d), and are in excess of or more expensive than that usually encompassed by the service so described, the Secretary shall pay to such provider of services only the equivalent of the reasonable cost of the service usually so encompassed and that the provider of services may charge such individual for any additional cost of the service furnished at such request; and

"(E) such agreement may be terminated by (i) the provider of services at such time and upon such notice to the Secretary and to the public as the Secretary may specify by regulations and (ii) the Secretary at such time and upon such notice to the provider of services as may be specified by regulations, but only after the Secretary has determined that such provider of services is not complying substantially with the provisions of such agreement or that such provider no longer substantially meets the provisions of subsection (d) and has notified such provider of such determination.

"(3) Nothing in this section shall—

"(A) preclude the Secretary from making payment for the reasonable cost of services furnished to an individual eligible to receive such services by any hospital which is not a party to an agreement under this subsection but only if (i) such services were emergency services and (ii) the Secretary would be authorized to pay for such services had the Secretary and such hospital entered into an agreement under this section;

"(B) preclude providers of services to be represented by an individual, association, or organization authorized by such provider of services to act on its behalf;

"(C) be construed to give the Secretary supervision or control over the practice of medicine, the manner in which medical services are provided, or over the administration or operation, the selection, tenure, or compensation of personnel of any hospital, skilled nursing home, visiting nurse agency, or homemaker service agency which has entered into an agreement under this section.

"(4) Where an agreement under this section between a provider of services and the Secretary has been terminated, the Secretary may, notwithstanding any other provision of this section, enter into another agreement under this section with such provider but only if such provider conforms to the standards set forth in subsection (c) and the Secretary determines that another agreement with such provider will effectuate the purposes of this section.

"(5) The Secretary shall from time to time determine the amount to be paid to each provider of services under an agreement with respect to the services furnished and shall certify such amounts to the Secretary of the Treasury, except that such amount may be reduced or increased, as the case may be, by any sum by which the Secretary finds that the amount paid to such provider of services for any prior period was greater or less than the amount which should have been paid to it for such period. The Secretary of the Treasury, prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office, shall make payment from the Medical Insurance Account, at the time or times fixed by the Secretary, in accordance with such certification.

"Free choice by patient

"(f) Any individual entitled to have payment made under this section for services furnished him may obtain inpatient hospital services, skilled nursing home services, home health services, or outpatient hospital diagnostic services from any provider of services which has entered into an agreement with the Secretary and which admits such individual or undertakes to provide him services.

"Medical Insurance Benefits Advisory Council

"(g) For the purpose of advising the Secretary in the formulation of policy and the promulgation of regulations in connection with the administration of this section, there is hereby created a Medical Insurance Benefits Advisory Council which shall consist of a chairman and twelve appointed members to be appointed by the Secretary, after February 1, 1961, and before April 1, 1961. The chairman shall serve at the pleasure of the Secretary. Not less than four of the appointed members shall be representatives of the general public, and the remainder of the appointed members shall be persons who are outstanding in the fields pertaining to hospitals and health activities. Each appointed member shall hold office for a term of four years, except that any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term, and the terms of office of the members first taking office shall expire, as described by the Secretary at the time of appointment, three at the end of the first year, three at the end of the second year, three at the end of the third year, and three at the end of the fourth year after the date of appointment. An appointed member shall not be eligible to serve continuously for more than two terms but shall be eligible for reappointment if he has not served immediately preceding his reappointment. The advisory council is authorized to appoint such special advisory and technical committees as may be useful in carrying out its functions. Appointed members of the advisory council and members of its advisory or technical committees, while serving on business of the advisory council, shall receive compensation at rates fixed by the Secretary, and shall also be entitled to receive an allowance for actual and necessary travel and for subsistence expenses while so serving away from their places of residence. The advisory council shall meet as frequently as the Secretary deems necessary. Upon request of four or more members, it shall be the duty of the Secretary to call a meeting of the advisory council.

"Rulemaking powers of the Secretary

"(h) The Secretary shall have the power and authority to make rules and regulations and to establish procedures, not inconsistent with the provisions of this section, which are necessary or appropriate to carry out such provisions, and shall adopt reasonable rules and regulations to regulate and provide for the nature and extent of the proofs and evidence and the method of taking and furnishing the same in order to establish the right of individuals to medical insurance benefits hereunder. The Secretary is authorized to utilize the services of appropriate public or private agencies in obtaining information to assist him in performing his functions under this section."

MEDICAL INSURANCE ACCOUNT

(b)(1) Section 201 of the Social Security Act is amended by redesignating subsections (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), and (h), as (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), (i), and (j), respectively.

(2) Section 201 of such Act is further amended by adding after subsection (a) the following new subsection:

"(b) There is hereby created in the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund an account to be known as the Medical Insurance Account. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961, and for each fiscal year thereafter, out of moneys appropriated to the Trust Fund pursuant to subsection (a), there shall be credited from time to time to the Medical Insurance Account in such Trust Fund, amounts equal to the sum of—

"(1) the amounts determined by multiplying one-half of 1 per centum by the amounts of wages (as certified to the Secretary of the Treasury for purposes of paragraph (3) of subsection (a)) paid after December 31, 1960, and

"(2) the amounts determined by multiplying three-eighths of 1 per centum by the amounts of self-employment income (as certified to the Secretary of the Treasury for purposes of paragraph (4) of subsection (a)) for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1960."

(3) Subsection (c) (redesignated as (d) by paragraph (1) of this subsection) of section 201 of such Act is amended by inserting after "Trust Funds" in paragraph (2) the following: "(including the operation and status of the Medical Insurance Account in the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund)"; by inserting "(including the amounts credited to the Medical Insurance Account)" after "Trust Funds" in paragraph (3) as amended by section 701(b) of this Act; by inserting "(including the amounts credited to and the charges made against the Medical Insurance Account)" after "Trust Funds" the first time it appears in the penultimate sentence of such subsection; by inserting "(including the future amounts to be credited to and the future charges to be made against the Medical Insurance Account)" after "Trust Funds" the second time it appears in such sentence; and by inserting "(including the Medical Insurance Account)" after "Trust Funds" the third time it appears in such sentence.

(4) Section 201 of such Act is further amended by adding after subsection (f) (redesignated as (g) by paragraph (1) of this subsection) the following new subsection:

"(h)(1) After the close of each fiscal year, the Secretary of the Tresaury shall determine the average of the amounts in the Medical Insurance Account during such year for purposes of determining the amount of interest that should be credited to such Account from the interest that was credited to the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund during such fiscal year. There shall be credited to the Account from the amounts appropriated to the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund an amount for interest which is in the same ratio to the interest credited to the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund for such fiscal year as the average of the amounts in the Medical Insurance Account during such fiscal year is to the average of the amounts in the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund during such fiscal year.

"(2) The proper share of the proceeds from the sale or redemption of any obligations in the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund which are credited to such Trust Fund shall be credited to the Medical Insurance Account."

(5) Subsection (g) (redesignated as (i) by paragraph (1) of this subsection) of section 201 of such Act is amended by striking out the last two sentences of paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "After the close of each fiscal year, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall analyze the costs of administration of this title incurred during such fiscal year in order to determine the portion of such costs which should be borne by each of the Trust Funds (including the cost which should be charged against the Medical Insurance Account) and shall certify to the Managing Trustee the amount, if any, which should be transferred from one to the other of such Trust Funds (including the amount that should be charged in the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund against the Medical Insurance Account) in order to insure that each of the Trust Funds (including such Account) has borne or has been charged with, as the case may be, its proper share of the costs of administration of this title incurred during such fiscal year. The Managing Trustee is authorized and directed to transfer any such amount from one to the other of such Trust Funds in accordance with any certification so made."

(6) Subsection (g) (redesignated as (i) by paragraph (1) of this subsection) of section 201 of such Act is further amended by inserting immediately preceding the period at the end of paragraph (2) the following: "; from the payment made from the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund the Medical Insurance Account shall be charged with such amounts as the Managing Trustee determines as necessary for such Account to bear a proper share of such payments."

(7) Subsection (h) (redesignated as (j) by paragraph (1) of this subsection) of section 201 of such Act is amended by inserting immediately preceding the period at the end thereof the following: "and in the case of payments required to be made under section 226, such payments shall be charged against the funds credited to the Medical Insurance Account."

AMENDMENTS TO THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1954

CHANGES IN TAX SCHEDULES

Self-employment income tax

SEC. 605. (a) Section 1401 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to rate of tax on self-employment income) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1401. RATE OF TAX.

"In addition to other taxes, there shall be imposed for each taxable year, on the self-employment income of every individual, a tax as follows—

"(1) in the case of any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1959, and before January 1, 1961, the tax shall be equal to 4½ percent of the amount of the self-employment income for such taxable year;

"(2) in the case of any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1960, and before January 1, 1963, the tax shall be equal to 4⅞ percent of the amount of the self-employment income for such taxable year;

"(3) in the case of any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1962, and before January 1, 1966, the tax shall be equal to 5⅝ percent of the amount of the self-employment income for such taxable year;

"(4) in the case of any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1965, and before January 1, 1969, the tax shall be equal to 6⅜ percent of the amount of the self-employment income for such taxable year; and

"(5) in the case of any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1968, the tax shall be equal to 7⅛ percent of the amount of the self-employment income for such taxable year."

Tax on employees

(b) Section 3101 of such Code (relating to rate of tax on employees under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3101. RATE OF TAX.

"In addition to other taxes, there is hereby imposed on the income of every individual a tax equal to the following percentages of the wages (as defined in section 3121(a)) received by him with respect to employment (as defined in section 3121(b))—

"(1) with respect to wages received during the calendar year 1960, the rate shall be 3 percent;

"(2) with respect to wages received during the calendar years 1961 and 1962, the rate shall be 3¼ percent;

"(3) with respect to wages received during the calendar years 1963 to 1965, both inclusive, the rate shall be 3¾ percent;

"(4) with respect to wages received during the calendar years 1966 to 1968, both inclusive, the rate shall be 4¼ percent; and

"(5) with respect to wages received after December 31, 1968, the rate shall be 4¾ percent."

Tax on employers

(c) Section 3111 of such Code (relating to rate of tax on employers under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3111. RATE OF TAX.

"In addition to other taxes, there is hereby imposed on every employer an excise tax, with respect to having individuals in his employ, equal to the following percentages of the wages (as defined in section 3121(a)) paid by him with respect to employment (as defined in section 3121(b))—

"(1) with respect to wages paid during the calendar year 1960, the rate shall be 3 percent;

"(2) with respect to wages paid during the calendar years 1961 and 1962, the rate shall be 3¼ percent;

"(3) with respect to wages paid during the calendar years 1963 to 1965, both inclusive, the rate shall be 3¾ percent;

"(4) with respect to wages paid during the calendar years 1966 to 1968, both inclusive, the rate shall be 4¼ percent; and

"(5) with respect to wages paid after December 31, 1968, the rate shall be 4¾ percent."

Studies and recommendations

SEC. 606. (a) Section 702 of the Social Security Act is amended by inserting "(a)" after "702"; by adding at the end thereof the following:

"In connection with such study and recommendations, the Secretary shall institute and conduct appropriate demonstration programs relating to the health needs of such individuals and the manner and means by which such needs may be fulfilled. The Secretary is authorized to provide for the carrying on of such research studies pertaining to health care and the administration of such care as may be recommended by the advisory council designated pursuant to section 226(g). Such research studies may be carried on directly by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, by others under contracts negotiated for, or grants made by the Secretary for, such purpose."

(b) The Secretary shall carry on studies and develop recommendations to be submitted to the Congress not later than January 15, 1963, relating to (1) the adequacy of existing facilities for health care of the aged; (2) methods for encouraging the further development of efficient and economical forms of health care for the aged which are a constructive alternative to in-patient hospital care; (3) the feasibility of adding supplementary types of medical insurance benefits for the aged within the financial resources provided by this Act; and (4) the effects of the initial deductible of $75 upon beneficiaries, hospitals, and the financing of the program.

AUGUST 17, 1960.

Hon. CLINTON ANDERSON,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR ANDERSON: As you know, I was disappointed in the action of the Senate Finance Committee in failing to report out an adequate bill dealing with medical care for our older citizens. Neither the House bill which was considered by the committee nor the bill which was finally voted out makes provision for:

1. A pay-as-you-go system of sound financing;

2. The care of the vast majority of our older citizens without subjecting them to the humiliation of the means test; or

3. Avoiding a virtually impossible burden upon the States, who have already strained their budgets beyond the bursting point.

The Finance Committee bill is good as far as it goes. But it simply does not go far enough and does not meet all of the problems. Of course, even this improvement would not have been possible, in light of the strong opposition by the administration and others, if it were not for the leadership furnished by you, Senator MCNAMARA, Congressman FORAND, and others in alerting the American people to the urgency of the problem and the solutions that are available.

Extension of the social security mechanism to health benefits for the aged is not a substitute for the committee action; it is an addition to it. Together, these actions would provide help to all our aged—those under social security and those who are not.

Pursuant to the discussions we have had since it became clear that the amendment you offered in June would not be accepted by the Senate Finance Committee, I would like to join with you in sponsoring an amendment to the bill when it is reported to the Senate floor by the Finance Committee.

I concur in your judgment that we must have a health benefits program financed by contributions of a maximum of one-quarter of 1 percent of taxable earnings by employers and employees. Very recent estimates of the actuary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare indicate that such contributions will be sufficient to fully finance four essential types of health benefits for persons over 68. They are:

1. Hospitalization up to 120 days;

2. Nursing home care up to 240 days;

3. Nursing and other health services at home up to 360 days;

4. Outpatient diagnostic services.

Such a program will be soundly financed; it will provide a balanced program of basic health services; it will relieve the burden upon our hospitals by providing incentives for nonhospital care; it emphasizes preventive medical care; and it tends to reduce the overall cost of the program by using less expensive yet more effective medical techniques.

Enactment of this legislation during the present session will be a fitting climax to this 25th anniversary of the Social Security Act and mark an historic step forward in sustaining the dignity and self-reliance of our Nation's senior citizens.

For too long we have relegated medical care for the aged to either the charity of local government or the conscience of members of the families of our older citizens. Almost 20 percent of all those on social security must use one-quarter to one-half of their meager annual income for medical expenses alone.

With every good wish.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN F. KENNEDY.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina:

Address delivered by Representative ROBERT W. HEMPHILL on the occasion of the dinner of the C. Harris Williams memorial fund at Joslin Park, Rock Hill, S.C., July 25, 1960.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider executive business.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I renew my request that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] be recognized for 10 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Arkansas is recognized for 10 minutes.

CONVENTION OF PARIS FOR THE PROTECTION OF INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY

Mr. FULBRIGHT. First, Mr. President, I call up Executive D, the Convention of Paris for the Protection of Industrial Property.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the convention, Executive D (86th Cong., 2d sess.), the Convention of Paris for the Protection of Industrial Property of March 20, 1883, as revised at Brussels, December 14, 1900; at Washington, June 2, 1911; at The Hague, November 6, 1925; at London, June 2, 1934; and at

Lisbon, October 31, 1958, which was read the second time, as follows:

CONVENTION OF PARIS FOR THE PROTECTION OF INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY OF MARCH 20, 1883

(Revised at Brussels on December 14, 1900, at Washington on June 2, 1911, at The Hague on November 6, 1925, at London on June 2, 1934, and at Lisbon on October 31, 1958.)

Federal Republic of Germany, Australia, Austria, Belgium, United States of Brazil, People's Republic of Bulgaria, Canada, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Spain, United States of America, Finland, France, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, People's Republic of Hungary, Indonesia, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Morocco, Mexico, Monaco, Norway, New Zealand, Netherlands, People's Republic of Poland, Portugal, People's Republic of Rumania, Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Sweden, Switzerland, Czechoslovak Republic, Turkey, Union of South Africa, Viet-Nam, Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia

Being unanimously moved by the desire to protect in as effective and uniform a manner as possible industrial property rights,

Judged it advisable to make certain modifications and additions to the International Convention of March 20, 1883, establishing the International Union for the Protection of Industrial Property, revised at Brussels on December 14, 1900, at Washington on June 2, 1911, at The Hague on November 6, 1925, and at London on June 2, 1934,

Resolved to send representatives to the Diplomatic Conference which took place at Lisbon from October 6 to 31, 1958,

And have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1

(1) The countries to which the present Convention applies constitute themselves into a Union for the protection of industrial property.

(2) The protection of industrial property is concerned with patents, utility models, industrial designs, trademarks, service marks, trade names, and indications of source or appellations of origin, and the repression of unfair competition.

(3) Industrial property shall be understood in the broadest sense and shall apply not only to industry and commerce proper, but likewise to agricultural and extractive industries and to all manufactured or natural products; for example, wines, grain, tobacco leaf, fruit, cattle, minerals, mineral waters, beer, flowers and flour.

(4) The term "patents" shall include the various kinds of industrial patents recognized by the laws of the countries of the Union, such as patents of importation, patents of improvement, patents and certificates of addition, etc.

ARTICLE 2

(1) Nationals of each of the countries of the Union shall, as regards the protection of industrial property, enjoy in all the other countries of the Union the advantages that their respective laws now grant, or may hereafter grant, to their own nationals, without prejudice to the rights specially provided by the present Convention. Consequently, they shall have the same protection as the latter, and the same legal remedy against any infringement of their rights, provided they observe the conditions and formalities imposed upon nationals.

(2) However, no condition as to the possession of a domicile or establishment in the country where protection is claimed may be required of persons entitled to the benefits of the Union for the enjoyment of any industrial property rights.

(3) The provisions of the laws of each of the countries of the Union relating to judicial and administrative procedure and competence, and to the choice of domicile or the designation of an agent, which may be required by the laws on industrial property, are expressly reserved.

ARTICLE 3

Nationals of countries not forming part of the Union, who are domiciled or who have real and effective industrial or commercial establishments in the territory of one of the countries of the Union, are treated in the same manner as nationals of the countries of the Union.

ARTICLE 4

A.—(1) A person who has duly filed an application for a patent, or for the registration of a utility model, or of an industrial design, or of a trademark, in one of the countries of the Union, or his successors in title, shall enjoy, for the purpose of filing in the other countries, a right of priority during the periods hereinafter stated.

(2) Every filing that is equivalent to a regular national filing under domestic law of any country of the Union or under bilateral or multilateral treaties concluded between countries of the Union shall be recognized as giving rise to a right of priority.

(3) By a regular national filing is meant any filing that is adequate to establish the date on which the application was filed in the country concerned, whatever may be the outcome of the application.

B.—Consequently, the subsequent filing in any of the other countries of the Union before the expiration of those periods shall not be invalidated through any acts accomplished in the interval, as, for instance, by another filing, by publication or exploitation of the invention, by the putting on sale of copies of the design or model, or by use of the mark, and these acts cannot give rise to any right of third parties, or of any personal possession. Rights acquired by third parties before the date of the first application which serves as the basis for the right of priority are reserved under the domestic legislation of each country of the Union.

C.—(1) The above-mentioned periods of priority shall be twelve months for patents and utility models, and six months for industrial designs and for trademarks.

(2) These periods shall start from the date of filing of the first application; the day of filing shall not be included in the period.

(3) If the last day of the period is an official holiday, or a day when the Office is not open for the filing of applications in the country where protection is claimed, the period shall be extended until the first following working day.

(4) A subsequent application for the same subject as a previous application filed in the same country of the Union shall be considered as a first application within the meaning of paragraph (2), the filing date of which shall be the starting point of the period of priority, provided that, at the time of filing the subsequent application, the previous application has been withdrawn, abandoned or refused, without being open to public inspection and without leaving any rights outstanding, and has not served as a basis for claiming a right of priority. The previous application may not thereafter serve as a basis for claiming a right of priority.

D.—(1) Any person desiring to take advantage of the priority of a previous filing shall be required to make a declaration indicating the date of such filing and the country in which it was made. Each country will determine the latest permissible date for making such declaration.

(2) These particulars shall be mentioned in the publications issued by the competent authority, and in particular in the patents and the specifications relating thereto.

(3) The countries of the Union may require any person making a declaration of priority to produce a copy of the application (specification, drawings, etc.) previously filed. The copy, certified as correct by the authority which received the application, shall not require any authentication, and may in any case be filed, without fee, at any time within three months of the filing of the subsequent application. They may require it to be accompanied by a certificate from the same authority showing the date of filing, and by a translation.

(4) No other formalities may be required for the declaration of priority at the time of filing the application. Each of the countries of the Union shall decide what consequences shall follow the omission of the formalities prescribed by the present Article, but such consequences shall in no case go beyond the loss of the right of priority.

(5) Subsequently, further proof may be required. A person who avails himself of the priority of a previously filed application shall be required to specify the number of that application, which shall be published under the conditions provided for by paragraph (2) above.

E.—(1) Where an industrial design is filed in a country by virtue of a right of priority based on the filing of a utility model, the period of priority shall be only that fixed for industrial designs.

(2) Furthermore, it is permissible to file a utility model in a country by virtue of a right of priority based on the filing of a patent application, and vice versa.

F.—No country of the Union may refuse a priority or an application for a patent on the ground that the applicant claims multiple priorities, even originating in different countries, or on the ground that an application claiming one or more priorities contains one or more elements that were not included in the original application or applications whose priority is claimed, provided that, in both cases, there is unity of invention within the meaning of the law of the country.

With respect to the elements not included in the orginal application or applications whose priority is claimed, the filing of the later application shall give rise to a right of priority under the usual conditions.

G.—(1) If examination reveals that an application for a patent contains more than one invention, the applicant may divide the application into a certain number of divisional applications and preserve as the date of each the date of the initial application, and the benefit of the right of priority, if any.

(2) The applicant may also, on his own initiative, divide a patent application while preserving as the date of each divisional application the date of the initial application and the benefit of the right of priority, if any. Each country of the Union shall have the right to determine the conditions under which such division shall be authorized.

H.—Priority may not be refused on the ground that certain elements of the invention for which priority is claimed do not appear among the claims formulated in the application in the country of origin, provided that the application documents as a whole specifically disclose such elements.

ARTICLE 4 BIS

(1) Patents applied for in the various countries of the Union by persons entitled to the benefits of the Union shall be independent of patents obtained for the same invention in other countries, whether members of the Union or not.

(2) This provision is not to be understood in a restricted sense; in particular, it is to be understood to mean that patents applied for during the period of priority are independent, both as regards the grounds for invalidation and for revocation and as regards their normal duration.

(3) The provision shall apply to all patents existing at the time when it comes into effect.

(4) Similarly, it shall apply, in the case of the accession of new countries, to patents in existence on either side at the time of accession.

(5) Patents obtained with the benefit of priority shall have in the various countries of the Union a duration equal to that which they would have had if they had been applied for or granted without the benefit of priority.

ARTICLE 4 TER

The inventor shall have the right to be mentioned as such in the patent.

ARTICLE 4 QUATER

The grant of a patent shall not be refused and a patent shall not be invalidated on the ground that the sale of the patented product or of a product obtained by means of the patented process is subject to restrictions or limitations resulting from the domestic law.

ARTICLE 5

A.—(1) The importation by the patentee into the country where the patent has been granted of articles manufactured in any of the countries of the Union shall not entail revocation of the patent.

(2) Each country of the Union shall have the right to take legislative measures providing for the granting of compulsory licenses to prevent the abuses which might result from the exclusive rights conferred by the patent, for example, failure to work.

(3) Revocation of the patent shall not be provided for except in cases where the granting of compulsory licenses would not have been sufficient to prevent such abuses. No proceeding for the cancellation or revocation of a patent may be instituted before the expiration of two years from the granting of the first compulsory license.

(4) An application for a compulsory license may not be made on the ground of failure to work or insufficient working before the expiration of a period of four years from the date of filing of the patent application or three years from the date of the grant of the patent, whichever period last expires; it shall be refused if the patentee justifies his inaction by legitimate reasons. Such a compulsory license shall be non-exclusive and shall not be transferable, even in the form of the grant of a sublicense, except with that part of the enterprise or goodwill using such license.

(5) The foregoing provisions shall be applicable, mutatis mutandis, to utility models.

B.—The protection of industrial designs shall not, under any circumstance, be liable to revocation either by reason of failure to work or by reason of the importation of articles corresponding to those which are protected.

C.—(1) If, in any country, the use of a registered trademark is compulsory, the registration shall not be cancelled until after a reasonable period, and then only if the person concerned cannot justify his inaction.

(2) The use of a trademark by the proprietor in a form differing in features which do not alter the distinctive character of the mark in the form in which it was registered in one of the countries of the Union, shall not entail invalidation of the registration and shall not diminish the protection granted to the mark.

(3) The concurrent use of the same mark on identical or similar goods by industrial or commercial establishments considered as co-proprietors of the mark according to the provisions of the national law of the country where protection is claimed shall not prevent the registration or diminish in any way the protection granted to the mark in any country of the Union, provided the use does not result in misleading the public and is not contrary to the public interest.

D.—No indication or mention of the patent, of the utility model, of the registration of the trademark, or of the deposit of the industrial design shall be required upon the product as a condition of recognition of the right to protection.

ARTICLE 5 BIS

(1) A period of grace of not less than six months shall be allowed for the payment of the prescribed fees for the maintenance of industrial property rights, subject to the payment of a surcharge, if the domestic law so provides.

(2) The countries of the Union shall have the right to provide for the restoration of patents which have lapsed by reason of non-payment of fees.

ARTICLE 5 TER

In each of the countries of the Union the following shall not be considered as infringements of the rights of a patentee:

1. The use on board of vessels of other countries of the Union of devices forming the subject of his patent in the body of the vessel, in the machinery, tackle, gear and other accessories, when such vessels temporarily or accidentally enter the waters of a country, provided that such devices are used there exclusively for the needs of the vessel.

2. The use of devices forming the subject of the patent in the construction or operation of aircraft or land vehicles of other countries of the Union, or of accessories to such aircraft or land vehicles, when those aircraft or land vehicles temporarily or accidentally enter the country.

ARTICLE 5 QUATER

When a product is imported into a country of the Union where there exists a patent protecting a process of manufacture of the said product, the patentee shall have all the rights, with regard to the imported product, as are accorded to him by the domestic law of the country of importation, on the basis of the process patent, with respect to products manufactured in that country.

ARTICLE 5 QUINQUIES

Industrial designs shall be protected in all the countries of the Union.

ARTICLE 6

(1) The conditions for the filing and registration of trademarks shall be determined in each country of the Union by its domestic law.

(2) However, an application for the registration of a trademark filed by a national of a country of the Union in any country of the Union may not be refused nor may a registration be cancelled on the ground that filing, registration or renewal has not been effected in the country of origin.

(3) A mark duly registered in a country of the Union shall be regarded as independent of marks registered in other countries of the Union, including the country of origin.

ARTICLE 6 BIS

(1) The countries of the Union undertake, either administratively if their legislation so permits, or at the request of an interested party, to refuse or to cancel the registration and to prohibit the use of a trademark which constitutes a reproduction, imitation or translation, liable to create confusion, of a mark considered by the competent authority of the country of registration or use to be well-known in that country as being already the mark of a person entitled to the benefits of the present Convention and used for identical or similar goods. These provisions shall also apply when the essential part of the mark constitutes a reproduction of any such well-known mark or an imitation liable to create confusion therewith.

(2) A period of at least five years from the date of registration shall be allowed for seeking the cancellation of such a mark. The countries of the Union have the right to provide for a period within which the prohibition of use must be sought.

(3) No time limit shall be fixed for seeking the cancellation or the prohibition of the use of marks registered or used in bad faith.

ARTICLE 6 TER

(1)(a) The countries of the Union agree to refuse or to cancel the registration, and to prohibit by appropriate measures the use, without authorization by the competent authorities, either as trademarks or as elements of trademarks, or armorial bearings, flags and other State emblems of the countries of the Union, official signs and hallmarks indicating control or warranty adopted by them and all imitations thereof from a heraldic point of view.

(b) The provisions of sub-paragraph (a) of this paragraph apply equally to armorial bearings, flags and other emblems, abbreviations or titles of international intergovernmental organizations of which one or more countries of the Union are members, with the exception of armorial bearings, flags and other emblems, abbreviations or titles that are already the subject of existing international agreements intended to ensure their protection.

(c) No country of the Union shall be required to apply the provisions of sub-paragraph (b) of this paragraph to the prejudice of the owners of rights acquired in good faith before the entry into force, in that country, of the present Convention. The countries of the Union shall not be required to apply the said provisions when the use or registration covered by paragraph (a) is not of such a nature as to suggest to the public that a connection exists between the organization concerned and the armorial bearings, flags, emblems, abbreviations or titles, or if such use or registration is clearly not of a nature to mislead the public as to the existence of a connection between the user and the organization.

(2) The prohibition of the use of official signs and hall-marks indicating control or warranty shall apply solely in cases where the marks which contain them are intended to be used on goods of the same or a similar kind.

(3) (a) For the application of these provisions the countries of the Union agree to communicate reciprocally, through the International Bureau, the list of state emblems and official signs and hall-marks indicating control or warranty which they desire, or may thereafter desire, to place wholly or within certain limits under the protection of the present Article and all subsequent modifications of this list. Each country of the Union shall in due course make available to the public the lists so communicated.

However, this communication is not compulsory so far as the flags of States are concerned.

(b) The provisions of sub-paragraph (b) of paragraph (1) of this Article shall only apply to armorial bearings, flags and other emblems, abbreviations or titles of international intergovernmental organizations that the latter have communicated to the countries of the Union through the International Bureau.

(4) Any country of the Union may, within a period of twelve months from the receipt of the communication, transmit through the International Bureau its objections, if any, to the country or international intergovernmental organization concerned.

(5) In the case of State flags, the measures prescribed by paragraph (1) shall apply solely to marks registered after November 6, 1925.

(6) In the case of State emblems other than flags, and of official signs and hallmarks of the countries of the Union and in the case of armorial bearings, flags and other emblems, abbreviations or titles of international intergovernmental organizations, these provisions shall be applicable only to marks registered more than two months after the receipt of the communication provided for in paragraph (3).

(7) In cases of bad faith the countries shall have the right to cancel the registration of marks that contain State emblems, signs or hall-marks even though registered before November 6, 1925.

(8) Nationals of each country who are authorized to make use of State emblems, signs or hall-marks of their country, may use them even though they are similar to those of another country.

(9) The countries of the Union undertake to prohibit the unauthorized use in trade of the State armorial bearings of the other countries of the Union, when the use is of such a nature as to be misleading as to the origin of the goods.

(10) The above provisions shall not prevent the countries from exercising the power given in paragraph (3) of Article 6 quinquies B, to refuse or to cancel the registration of marks containing, without authorization, the armorial bearings, flags, and other State emblems or official signs or hall-marks adopted by a country of the Union as well as the distinctive signs of international intergovernmental organizations mentioned in paragraph (1) of this Article.

ARTICLE 6 QUATER

(1) When, in accordance with the law of a country of the Union, the assignment of a mark is valid only if it takes place at the same time as the transfer of the business or goodwill to which the mark belongs, it shall suffice for its validity in this respect if the portion of the business or goodwill situated in that country, together with the exclusive right to manufacture or sell in that country the goods bearing the mark assigned, is transferred to the assignee.

(2) This provision does not impose upon the countries of the Union any obligation to regard as valid the assignment of any mark the use of which by the assignee would, in fact, be of such a nature as to mislead the public, particularly as regards the origin, nature or material qualities of the goods to which the mark is applied.

ARTICLE 6 QUINQUIES

A.—(1) Every trademark duly registered in the country of origin shall be accepted for filing and protected in its original form in the other countries of the Union, subject to the reservations indicated in the present Article. These countries may, before proceeding to final registration, require the production of a certificate of registration in the country of origin, issued by the competent authority. No authentication shall be required for this certificate.

(2) The country of the Union where the applicant has a real and effective industrial or commercial establishment, or, if he has not such an establishment within the Union, the Union country where he has his domicile, or if he has no domicile in the Union, the country of his nationality if he is a national of a Union country, shall be considered his country of origin.

B.—Trademarks under the present Article may not be denied registration or cancelled except in the following cases:

1. When they are of such a nature as to infringe rights acquired by third parties in the country where protection is claimed;

2. When they have no distinctive character, or consist exclusively of signs or indications which may serve in trade to designate the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, place of origin of the goods or time of production, or have become customary in the current language or in the bona fide and established practices of the trade in the country where protection is sought.

3. When they are contrary to morality or public order and, in particular, of such a nature as to deceive the public. It is understood that a mark may not be considered contrary to public order for the sole reason that it does not conform to a provision of the law relating to trademarks, except where such provision itself relates to public order.

The above is, however, subject to Article 10 bis.

C.—(1) In determining whether a mark is eligible for protection, all the circumstances of the case must be taken into consideration, particularly the length of time the mark has been in use.

(2) Registration of trademarks shall not be refused in the other countries of the Union for the sole reason that they differ from the marks protected in the country of origin only in respect of elements that do not alter their distinctive character and do not affect the identity of the marks in the form in which they are registered in the said country of origin.

D.—No person may benefit from the provisions of the present Article unless the mark for which he claims protection is and remains registered in the country of origin.

E.—However, in no case shall the renewal of the registration of a mark in the country of origin involve the obligation to renew the registration in the other Union countries where the mark has been registered.

F.—The benefit of priority shall be accorded to applications for the registration of marks filed within the period fixed by Article 4, even when registration in the country of origin does not occur until after the expiration of such period.

ARTICLE 6 SEXIES

The countries of the Union undertake to protect service marks. They shall not be required to provide for the registration of such marks.

ARTICLE 6 SEPTIES

(1) If the agent or representative of the person who is the proprietor of a mark in one of the countries of the Union applies, without such proprietor's authorization, for the registration of the mark in his own name in one or more Union countries, the proprietor shall be entitled to oppose the registration applied for or seek cancellation or, if the law of the country so allows, seek assignment in his favor of the said registration, unless such agent or representative justifies his action.

(2) The proprietor of the mark shall, subject to the reservations of paragraph (1) above, be entitled to oppose the use of the mark by his agent or representative if he has not authorized such use.

(3) Domestic laws may provide an equitable time limit within which the proprietor of a mark must claim the rights provided for in the present Article.

ARTICLE 7

The nature of the goods to which the trademark is to be applied shall in no case form an obstacle to the registration of the mark.

ARTICLE 7 BIS

(1) The countries of the Union undertake to accept for filing and to protect collective marks belonging to associations the existence of which is not contrary to the law of the country of origin, even if such associations do not possess an industrial or commercial establishment.

(2) Each country shall be the judge of the particular conditions under which a collective mark shall be protected and may refuse protection if the mark is contrary to the public interest.

(3) Nevertheless, the protection of these marks shall not be refused to any association the existence of which is not contrary to the law of the country of origin, on the ground that such association is not established in the country where protection is sought or is not constituted according to the law of the latter country.

ARTICLE 8

A trade name shall be protected in all the countries of the Union without the necessity of filing or registration, whether or not it forms part of a trademark.

ARTICLE 9

(1) All goods illegally bearing a trademark or trade name shall be seized on importation into those countries of the Union where such mark or name has a right to legal protection.

(2) Seizure shall likewise be effected in the country where the mark or name was illegally applied or in the country into which the goods bearing it have been imported.

(3) Seizure shall take place at the request either of the public prosecutor or of any other competent authority or of any interested party, whether a natural or a juridical person, in conformity with the domestic law of each country.

(4) The authorities shall not be bound to effect seizure in transit.

(5) If the law of a country does not permit seizure on importation, such seizure shall be replaced by prohibition of importation or by seizure within such country.

(6) If the law of a country permits neither seizure on importation nor prohibition of importation nor seizure within the country, then, until such time as the law is modified accordingly, these measures shall be replaced by the actions and remedies available in such cases to nationals under the law of such country.

ARTICLE 10

(1) The provisions of the preceding Article shall apply in cases of direct or indirect use of a false indication of the origin of the product or the identity of the producer, manufacturer or trader.

(2) Any producer, manufacturer or trader, whether a natural or juridical person, engaged in the production of, the manufacture of, or trade in such goods and established either in the locality falsely indicated as the place of origin, in the district where the locality is situated, or in the country falsely indicated, or in the country where the false indication of origin is used, shall in any case be deemed an interested party.

ARTICLE 10 BIS

(1) The countries of the Union are bound to assure to persons entitled to the benefits of the Union effective protection against unfair competition.

(2) Any act of competition contrary to honest practices in industrial or commercial matters constitutes an act of unfair competition.

(3) The following in particular shall be prohibited:

1. all acts of such a nature as to create confusion by any means whatever with the establishment, the goods, or the industrial or commercial activities of a competitor;

2. false allegations in the course of trade which are of such a nature as to discredit the establishment, the goods, or the industrial or commercial activities of a competitor;

3. indications or allegations the use of which in the course of trade is liable to mislead the public as to the nature, the manufacturing process, the characteristics, the suitability for their purpose or the quantity of the goods.

ARTICLE 10 TER

(1) The countries of the Union undertake to provide nationals of the other countries of the Union with appropriate legal remedies to repress effectively all the acts referred to in Article 9, 10, and 10 bis.

(2) They undertake, further, to provide measures to permit syndicates and associations which represent the industrialists, producers or traders concerned and the existence of which is not contrary to the laws of their countries, to take action in the Courts or before the administrative authorities, with a view of the repression of the acts referred to in Articles 9, 10 and 10 bis, in so far as the law of the country in which protection is claimed allows such action by the syndicates and associations of that country.

ARTICLE 11

(1) The countries of the Union shall in conformity with their domestic law, grant temporary protection to patentable inventions, utility models, industrial designs, and trademarks, in respect of goods exhibited at official, or officially recognized international exhibitions held in the territory of one of them.

(2) This temporary protection shall not extend the periods provided by Article 4. If later the right of priority is invoked, each country may provide that the period shall start from the date of introduction of the goods into the exhibition.

(3) Each country may require, as proof of the identity of the article exhibited and of the date of its introduction, such evidence as it considers necessary.

ARTICLE 12

(1) Each of the countries of the Union undertakes to establish a special government agency for industrial property and a central office for the communication to the public of patents, utility models, industrial designs, and trademarks.

(2) This agency shall publish an official periodical journal. It shall publish regularly:

(a) the names of the proprietors of patents granted, with a brief description of the inventions patented;

(b) reproductions of trademarks registered.

ARTICLE 13

(1) The international office established under the name International Bureau for the Protection of Industrial Property is placed under the high authority of the Government of the Swiss Confederation, which regulates its organization and supervises its operation.

(2) (a) The French and English languages shall be used by the International Bureau in performing the tasks provided for in paragraphs (3) and (5) of this Article.

(b) The conferences and meetings referred to in Article 14 shall be held in the French, English and Spanish languages.

(3) The International Bureau centralizes information of every kind relating to the protection of industrial property and compiles and publishes it. It undertakes studies of general utility concerning the Union and edits, with the help of documents supplied to it by the various Administrations, a periodical journal dealing with questions relating to the objects of the Union.

(4) The issues of this journal, as well as all the documents published by the International Bureau, shall be distributed to the Administrations of the countries of the Union in proportion to the number of contributing units mentioned below. Additional copies as may be requested, either by the said Administrations or by companies or private persons, shall be paid for separately.

(5) The International Bureau shall at all times hold itself at the service of the countries of the Union, to supply them with any special information they may need on questions relating to the international industrial property service. The Director of the International Bureau shall make an annual report on its operations, which shall be communicated to all the countries of the Union.

(6) The ordinary expenses of the International Bureau shall be borne by the countries of the Union in common. Until further authorization is given, they must not exceed the sum of 120,000 Swiss francs per annum. This sum may be increased, when necessary, by a unanimous decision of one of the conferences provided for in Article 14.

(7) Ordinary expenses do not include expenses relating to the work of conferences of plenipotentiaries or administrative conferences or those caused by special work or publications carried out in conformity with the decisions of a conference. Such expenses, the annual total of which may not exceed 20,000 Swiss francs, shall be divided among the countries of the Union in proportion to their contributions towards the operation of the International Bureau in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (8) below.

(8) To determine the contribution of each country to this total, the countries of the Union and those which may afterwards join the Union are divided into six classes, each contributing in the proportion of a certain number of units, namely:

	Units
First class	25
Second class	20
Third class	15
Fourth class	10
Fifth class	5
Sixth class	3

These coefficients are multiplied by the number of countries in each class, and the sum of the products thus obtained gives the number of units by which the total expenditure is to be divided. The quotient gives the amount of the unit of expense.

(9) Each of the countries of the Union shall, at the time it becomes a member, designate the class in which it wishes to be placed. However, any country of the Union may declare later that it desires to be placed in another class.

(10) The Government of the Swiss Confederation will supervise the expenditures and the accounts of the International Bureau and will advance the necessary funds.

(11) The annual account rendered by the International Bureau shall be communicated to all the other Administrations.

ARTICLE 14

(1) The present Convention shall be submitted to periodical revision with a view to the introduction of amendments designed to improve the system of the Union.

(2) For this purpose conferences shall be held successively in one of the countries of the Union between the delegates of the said countries.

(3) The Administration of the country in which the conference is to be held shall make preparations for the work of the conference, with the assistance of the International Bureau.

(4) The Director of the International Bureau shall be present at the meetings of the conferences, and take part in the discussions, but without the right of voting.

(5) (a) During the interval between the Diplomatic Conferences of revision, Conferences of representatives of all the countries of the Union shall meet every three years in order to draw up a report on the foreseeable expenditures of the International Bureau for each three-year period to come and to consider questions relating to the protection and development of the Union.

(b) Furthermore, they may modify, by unanimous decision, the maximum annual amount of the expenditures of the International Bureau, provided they meet as Conferences of Plenipotentiaries of all the countries of the Union, convened by the Government of the Swiss Confederation.

(c) Moreover, the Conferences provided for in paragraph (a) above may be convened between their three-yearly meetings by either the Director of the International Bureau or the Government of the Swiss Confederation.

ARTICLE 15

It is understood that the countries of the Union reserve the right to make separately between themselves special arrangements for the protection of industrial property, in so far as these arrangements do not contravene the provisions of the present Convention.

ARTICLE 16

(1) Countries which are not parties to the present Convention shall be permitted to accede to it at their request.

(2) Any such accession shall be notified through diplomatic channels to the Government of the Swiss Confederation, and by it to all the other Governments.

(3) Accession shall automatically entail acceptance of all the clauses and admission to all the advantages of the present Convention and shall take effect one month after the dispatch of the notification by the Government of the Swiss Confederation to the other countries of the Union, unless a subsequent date is indicated in the request for accession.

ARTICLE 16 BIS

(1) Any country of the Union may at any time notify in writing the Government of the Swiss Confederation that the present Convention shall be applicable to all or part of its colonies, protectorates, territories under mandate or any other territories subject to its authority, or any territories under its sovereignty, and the Convention shall apply to all the territories named in the notification one month after the dispatch of the communication by the Government of the Swiss Confederation to the other countries of the Union unless a subsequent date is indicated in the notification. Failing such a notification, the Convention shall not apply to such territories.

(2) Any country of the Union may at any time notify in writing the Government of the Swiss Confederation that the present Convention shall cease to apply to all or part of the territories that have formed the subject of a notification under the preceding paragraph, and the Convention shall cease to apply in the territories named in the notification twelve months after the receipt of the notification addressed to the Government of the Swiss Confederation.

(3) All notifications sent to the Government of the Swiss Confederation in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) of the present Article shall be communicated by that Government to all the countries of the Union.

ARTICLE 17

Any country party to this Convention undertakes to adopt, in accordance with its constitution, the measures necessary to ensure the application of this Convention.

It is understood that at the time an instrument of ratification or accession is deposited on behalf of a country, such country will be in a position under its domestic law to give effect to the terms of this Convention.

ARTICLE 17 BIS

(1) The Convention shall remain in force for an indefinite time, until the expiration of one year from the date of its denunciation.

(2) Such denunciation shall be addressed to the Government of the Swiss Confederation. It shall affect only the country in whose name it is made, the Convention remaining in operation as regards the other countries of the Union.

ARTICLE 18

(1) The present Act shall be ratified and the instruments of ratification deposited in Bern not later than May 1, 1963. It shall come into force, between the countries in whose names it has been ratified, one month after that date. However, if before that date it is ratified in the name of at least six countries, it shall come into force between those countries one month after the deposit of the sixth ratification has been notified to them by the Government of the Swiss Confederation, and for countries in whose names it is ratified at a later date, one month after the notification of each such ratification.

(2) Countries in whose names no instrument of ratification has been deposited within the period referred to in the preceding paragraph shall be permitted to adhere under the terms of Article 16.

(3) The present Act shall, as regards the relations between the countries to which it applies, replace the Convention of Paris of 1883 and the subsequent acts of revision.

(4) As regards the countries to which the present Act does not apply, but to which the Convention of Paris revised at London in 1934 applies, the latter shall remain in force.

(5) Similarly, as regards countries to which neither the present Act nor the Convention of Paris revised at London apply, the Convention of Paris revised at The Hague in 1925 shall remain in force.

(6) Similarly, as regards countries to which neither the present Act nor the Convention of Paris revised at London, nor the Convention of Paris revised at The Hague apply, the Convention of Paris revised at Washington in 1911 shall remain in force.

ARTICLE 19

(1) The present Act shall be signed in a single copy in the French language, which shall be deposited in the archives of the Government of the Swiss Confederation. A certified copy shall be forwarded by the latter to each of the Governments of the countries of the Union.

(2) The present Act shall remain open for signature by the countries of the Union until April 30, 1959.

(3) Official translations of the present Act shall be established in the English, German, Italian, Portuguese and Spanish languages.

In witness whereof the undersigned Plenipotentiaries, after presenting their full powers, have signed the present Act.

BERN, November 20, 1959.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the International Bureau for the Protection of Industrial Property has been in existence since 1883, and the United States has been a party to the convention creating it since 1887. The convention has been revised four times; and the revision under consideration today was formulated at an international conference held at Lisbon, Portugal, in October 1958. Fifty countries are parties to the convention presently in force.

This major intergovernmental instrument assures protection of industrial property rights of United States nationals abroad—namely, patents, trademarks, designs, commercial names, and related rights. Under the terms of article 2 of the convention, the government of each member country is required to extend to nationals of other member countries the same treatment with respect to the protection of these rights that it extends to its own nationals.

Article 2 also states that the provisions of the laws of each member country relating to judicial and administrative procedure and competence are expressly reserved. Any dispute arising under this convention is to be settled by competent authorities in the country where the dispute arises in accordance with the domestic law of that country. If, after this procedure is followed and the aggrieved party is not satisfied with the decision, the dispute may be resolved on a bilateral, consultative basis between the parties.

The Conference of Revision at Lisbon was attended by representatives of 40 member countries and by observers from 9 additional countries, as well as numerous intergovernmental and private organizations. The Conference adopted a number of provisions designed to broaden the convention's protective framework and to remove certain longstanding ambiguities.

For instance, the Conference agreed on a new provision in the convention which would enable U.S. nationals to acquire industrial design protection in other member countries, where, in the past, they have been unable to do so because of the absence of domestic legislation. Also included in the convention for the first time is a specific reference to the protection of trademarks associated with services, as distinct from those used to identify goods.

In addition, the convention corrected another longstanding deficiency by providing for regular triennial meetings of representatives of the member countries to enable them to discuss more frequently than in the past common problems concerning the administration of their respective patent and trademark laws.

Pursuant to the provisions of article 13, administrative matters relating to the Industrial Property Convention are handled by the International Bureau for the Protection of Industrial Property which is located in Bern, Switzerland. The International Bureau serves as a clearing house for information on and interpretation of patent and trademark laws, collects and publishes information relating to such matters, and handles the preparatory and administrative work of the periodic conferences of revision of the Industrial Property Convention.

Mr. President, the Department of State advises that there are no leading business or professional groups which are opposed to the United States becoming a party to the revised Industrial Property Convention adopted at Lisbon. The United States has been a party to this convention for 73 years, and our participation in this new convention will significantly improve the protection of industrial property rights accorded to U.S. nationals abroad. The revised convention, which will come into force on June 1, 1963, effects long needed changes in the field of international protection of industrial property rights, and it is my hope that the Senate will advise and consent to its ratification.

I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD portions of the report of the committee on this convention.

There being no objection, the extracts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The convention is fully explained in the statement submitted by Edwin M. Martin, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, to the Committee on Foreign Relations on June 21, 1960, which is appended hereto.

IMPLEMENTING LEGISLATION REQUIRED

Although the revised Industrial Property Convention makes a number of changes over the previous revision of the instrument, most of these changes are already provided for or taken care of in one way or another by existing law in the United States. There is one minor change, however, which would require a specific amendment to U.S. statutes. This change is represented by the addition of a new paragraph (4) to article 4C of the convention, relating to the starting date of the period of priority during which a patent or trademark application may be filed in another member country.

[1] Signed after Oct. 31, 1958, in accordance with art. 18.

[2] Liberia is not presently a member of the International Union for the Protection of Industrial Property.

Under the provisions of article 4 of the convention presently in force, the filing of an application for a patent in one country constitutes a constructive filing of the application in all of the other member countries on the same date. The constructive filing becomes actual when a formal application is filed in each individual country within 1 year of the date the first application is filed. This so-called period of priority for filing applications is specified in article 4C as 1 year from the date the first patent application is filed, and 6 months from the date the first trademark application is filed. This provision of the convention now in force is currently embodied in 35 U.S.C. 119, in the case of patent applications, and in 15 U.S.C. 1126(d), in the case of trademark applications.

The new paragraph (4) which has been added to article 4C of the revised convention provides that under certain circumstances the period of priority during which a patent or trademark application can be filed in another country may start from the date a second or later application is filed, rather than from the date the first foreign application is filed. Since the language currently incorporated 35 U.S.C. 119 and 15 U.S.C. 1126(d) limits the starting point of the period of priority to the date the first foreign application is filed, an amendment to these two sections would be necessary. It is understood that proposed legislation to accomplish this purpose has been submitted to the Congress. In this connection, the Department of State has assured the committee that the U.S. instrument of ratification of the convention will not be deposited until after the adoption of such legislation as is necessary to bring the domestic law of the United States into conformance with the provisions of the convention.

CONCLUSIONS

The committee is advised that all of the amendments to the Industrial Property Convention which were adopted at the Lisbon Conference were fully supported by the U.S. delegation. In addition, the Department of State is not aware of any leading business or professional group that is opposed to the United States becoming a party to the revised convention adopted at Lisbon. The committee believes that the revised convention represents a significant improvement in the field of international protection of industrial property rights, and recommends that the Senate give its advice and consent to the ratification of the convention.

STATEMENT BY EDWIN M. MARTIN, DEPUTY ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC AFFAIRS, BEFORE THE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE, IN SUPPORT OF THE CONVENTION OF PARIS FOR THE PROTECTION OF INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY

Mr. Chairman, I am appearing in support of the Convention of Paris for the Protection of Industrial Property of March 20, 1883, as revised at Lisbon in October 1958. The convention has previously been revised four times. The revised convention was transmitted to the Senate by the President on February 17, 1960. (S. Doc., Ex. D, 86th Cong., 2d sess.) The United States was a party to the original convention and became a party to the four later revisions. Under the convention's provisions, the United States and the other 49 member countries are constituted into an International Union for the Protection of Industrial Property. They are parties to one or more of the last three revisions, which are currently in force.

The Secretary of State, in his report to the President in February of this year, stated that U.S. participation in the new convention will not only significantly improve the protection in this field accorded U.S. private interests abroad, but will also insure continuing and sound cooperative relations with the other 49 countries that are parties to one or more of the revisions of the convention presently in force.

BACKGROUND OF INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY CONVENTION

The Industrial Property Convention, with the revisions presently in force, is the major intergovernmental instrument assuring protection of industrial property rights of U.S. nationals abroad, namely, patents, trademarks, designs, commercial names, and related rights. It is based on two important underlying principles—that of national treatment and that of the extension of special rights or advantages. Under the national treatment principle, each member government is required to extend to nationals of other member countries the same protection and rights which it grants to its own nationals in this field. Under the second principle, each country is required to provide certain rights or special advantages for other members' nationals, one of the most important of which is the right of priority for foreign patent applicants. Such applicants have a 1-year period, from the date of filing of the first application in their own country, in which to file corresponding applications which are given the benefit of the date of the first filing and receive protection thereon in other member countries.

Prior to the adoption of this international arrangement in 1883, there were no internationally uniform grounds for industrial property protection and inventors sometimes encountered almost insurmountable obstacles in efforts to protect their inventions in various foreign countries. This situation was markedly improved when the Industrial Property Convention, which was negotiated and signed in Paris in 1883, came into force the following year. The United States, which was not one of the original members, acceded to the convention in the spring of 1887. After 1883, there were four successive revisions prior to the Lisbon Conference of 1958. The United States became a party to each of these four revisions which brought about significant improvements in the convention's protective framework. The changes which were made over the years strengthened and made more effective the patent and trademark protection to be afforded nationals of member countries.

During the 76 years of the convention's existence, additional countries have become parties to one or more of its revisions bringing the current total to 50. Practically all of the important industrial and commercial countries are members with the exception of the Soviet Union.

NEW REVISION ADOPTED IN 1958

The latest Conference of Revision at Lisbon was attended by representatives of 40 member countries and by observers from 9 additional countries as well as numerous intergovernmental and private organizations. Thirty member countries signed the revised convention at the Conference, as did one nonmember country. Two other member countries signed at a later date.

The Conference considered a large number of proposals for revision of the convention which had been submitted by governments as well as leading international organizations interested in this field. It eventually adopted some changes in all but 5 of the 19 existing articles of the convention. Six new articles were added.

One of the chief accomplishments was a complete rewriting of the basic provisions concerning the protection of trademarks in such a way as to increase substantially the protection accorded for the trademark rights of nationals of member countries. For example, under the provisions adopted at Lisbon, an American national now clearly may register a trademark in any member country by complying with the formalities of such country without having to prove the existence of a registration in the United States.

Further, the Conference was able to agree on the inclusion of a requirement that all countries grant protection to industrial designs. It also included in the convention for the first time specific reference to the protection of trademarks associated with services, as distinct from those used to identify goods.

A long-standing deficiency in the convention has been the lack of machinery for interim meetings by the member governments between Conferences of Revision to study and discuss problems arising under the convention and to supervise more closely the operations of the International Bureau, presently located at Bern, which administers the convention. One of the most significant steps taken at the Conference, therefore, was to include in the revised convention a provision for regular triennial meetings of representatives of the convention members. This will enable such representatives to discuss more frequently than in the past common problems respecting the administration of their respective patent and trademark laws in relation to their convention obligations. They will also be in a better position to coordinate the preparatory work and resolve administrative details in connection with future Conferences of Revision.

SUPPORT FOR THE CONVENTION

Leading business and professional groups in the United States interested in the industrial property rights field worked closely with U.S. Government representatives preparatory to the adoption of instructions to the U.S. delegation to the Lisbon Conference. These groups included among others, the American Patent Law Association, the American Bar Association, the International Patent and Trademark Association, the U.S. Trademark Association, the National Foreign Trade Council, and the U.S. Council of the International Chamber of Commerce. The delegation also included three leading private patent and trademark attorneys as advisers, namely, Mr. Albert R. Teare, president, International Patent and Trademark Association; Dr. Stephen P. Ladas, of the law firm, Langner, Parry, Card & Langner of New York City; and Mr. John D. Myers of Philadelphia.

The Department is not aware of any leading business or professional group that is opposed to the United States becoming a party to the revision adopted at Lisbon. Further, it is known that the new convention has received the specific approval of some of the most important organizations interested in this field, as for example, the National Foreign Trade Council, the U.S. Council of the International Chamber of Commerce, and the patent and trademark section of the American Bar Association.

In the Department's opinion the new convention merits this strong support because of the improvements which it will effect in the international system for protecting industrial property rights. In this connection, it might be noted that the convention is not designed to replace existing international agreements of a regional nature in this field.

As to the implementation of the latest revision, under the terms of article 17, it is clear that the new revision is not self-executing, that is, its ratification would not by itself modify our domestic law. Any changes in the U.S. patent or trademark laws that are necessary to apply the provisions of the new revision must be enacted by the Congress. A draft bill for this purpose was transmitted to the Senate on March 7, 1960, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. A similar bill, H.R. 11070, is currently before the House Committee on the Judiciary. Only a rather minor change in the U.S. patent and trademark laws will be needed in connection with the new revision. It will be necessary to amend the patent and trademark laws to permit applicants to claim their right of priority in the United States not only from the date of their first filing but also from the date of a subsequent filing in a member country should the first filing be withdrawn under certain specified conditions. The U.S. instrument of ratification will not be deposited until after the above-cited bills embodying these changes are enacted. This treaty creates no problem with regard to Federal-State relations.

IMPROVED RELATIONS IN INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY RIGHTS FIELD

It is the view of the Department of State that U.S. acceptance of the new revision will significantly improve the protection in this field accorded to U.S. private interests abroad. Such acceptance will also set an excellent example for other countries who are considering adherence to the new revision. Finally, U.S. participation in the new revision will insure that our relations with the other 49 countries which are parties to one or more revisions will continue on a sound basis in this important field of industrial property rights protection.

For these important reasons the Department is firmly convinced that ratification of this new revision is highly desirable. It, therefore, strongly endorses the new revision and implementing legislation.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I understand the vote on this convention is to be deferred until after the vote this afternoon on an amendment to the unfinished business. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP AND COMMERCE WITH PAKISTAN AND THE CONVENTION OF ESTABLISHMENT WITH FRANCE

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I now call up for consideration Executive F and Executive G.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the Treaty of Friendship and Commerce Between the United States of America and Pakistan (Ex. F, 86th Cong., 2d sess.), signed at Washington on November 12, 1959; and the Convention of Establishment Between the United States of America and France (Ex. G, 86th Cong., 2d sess.), signed at Paris on November 25, 1959, which were read the second time, as follows:

TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP AND COMMERCE BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND PAKISTAN

The United States of America and Pakistan, desirous of strengthening the bonds of peace and friendship traditionally existing between them and of encouraging closer economic and cultural relations between their peoples, and being cognizant of the contributions which may be made toward these ends by arrangements encouraging mutually beneficial investments, promoting mutually advantageous commercial intercourse and otherwise establishing mutual rights and privileges, have resolved to conclude a Treaty of Friendship and Commerce, based in general upon the principles of national and most-favored-nation treatment unconditionally accorded, and for that purpose have appointed as their Plenipotentiaries,

The President of the United States of America:

Christian A. Herter, Secretary of State of the United States of America, and

The President of Pakistan:

Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, Minister for Commerce of Pakistan, who, having communicated to each other their full powers found to be in due form, have agreed upon the following Articles:

ARTICLE I

Each Party shall at all times accord equitable treatment to the persons, property, enterprises and other interests of nationals and companies of the other Party.

ARTICLE II

1. Nationals of either Party shall be permitted, subject to the requirements relating to the entry and sojourn of aliens, to enter the territories of the other Party, to travel therein freely, and to reside at places of their choice. Nationals of either Party shall in particular be permitted to enter the territories of the other Party and to remain therein: (a) for the purpose of carrying on trade between the territories of the two Parties and engaging in related commercial activities; and (b) for the purpose of developing and directing the operations of an enterprise in which they have invested, or in which they are actively in the process of investing, a substantial amount of capital.

2. Nationals of either Party, within the territories of the other Party, shall be permitted: (a) to enjoy liberty of conscience; (b) to hold both private and public religious services; (c) to gather and transmit material for dissemination to the public abroad; and (d) to communicate with other persons inside and outside such territories by mail, telegraph and other means open to general public use.

3. The provisions of the present Article shall be subject to the right of either Party to apply measures that are necessary to maintain public order and protect the public health, morals and safety.

ARTICLE III

1. Nationals of either Party within the territories of the other Party shall be free from molestations of every kind, and shall receive the most constant protection and security, in no case less than that required by international law.

2. If, within the territories of either Party, a national of the other Party is taken into custody, the nearest consular representative of his country shall on the demand of such national be immediately notified and shall have the right to visit and communicate with such national. Such national shall: (a) receive reasonable and humane treatment; (b) be formally and immediately informed of the accusations against him; (c) be brought to trial with all convenient speed, with due consideration to the proper preparation of his defense; and (d) enjoy all means reasonably necessary to his defense, including the services of competent counsel of his choice.

ARTICLE IV

1. Nationals of either Party shall be accorded national treatment in the application of laws and regulations within the territories of the other Party that establish a pecuniary compensation or other benefit or service, on account of disease, injury or death arising out of and in the course of employment or due to the nature of employment.

2. In addition to the rights and privileges provided in paragraph 1 of the present Article, nationals of either Party within the territories of the other Party shall be accorded national treatment in the application of laws and regulations establishing compulsory systems of social security, under which benefits are paid without an individual test of financial need; (a) against loss of wages or earnings due to old age, unemployment, sickness or disability, or (b) against loss of financial support due to the death of father, husband, or other person on whom such support had depended.

ARTICLE V

1. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded national treatment and most-favored-nation treatment with respect to access to the courts of justice and to administrative tribunals and agencies within the territories of the other Party, in all degrees of jurisdiction, both in pursuit and in defense of their rights. It is understood that companies of either Party not engaged in activities within the territories of the other Party shall enjoy such access therein without any requirement of registration or domestication.

2. Contracts entered into between nationals and companies of either Party and nationals and companies of the other Party, that provide for the settlement by arbitration of controversies, shall not be deemed unenforceable within the territories of such other Party merely on the grounds that the place designated for the arbitration proceedings is outside such territories or that the nationality of one or more of the arbitrators is not that of such other Party. No award duly rendered pursuant to any such contract, and final and enforceable under the laws of the place where rendered, shall be deemed invalid or denied effective means of enforcement within the territories of either Party merely on the grounds that the place where such award was rendered is outside such territories or that the nationality of one or more of the arbitrators is not that of such Party.

ARTICLE VI

1. Property of nationals and companies of either Party shall receive the most constant protection and security within the territories of the other Party.

2. The dwellings, offices, warehouses, factories and other premises of nationals and companies of either Party located within the territories of the other Party shall not be subject to molestation or to entry without just cause. Official searches and examinations of such premises and their contents, when necessary, shall be made only according to law and with careful regard for the convenience of the occupants and the conduct of business.

3. Neither Party shall take unreasonable or discriminatory measures that would impair the legally acquired rights or interests within its territories of nationals and companies of the other Party in the enterprises which they have established, in their capital, or in the skills, arts or technology which they have supplied.

4. Property of nationals and companies of either Party shall not be taken within the territories of the other Party except for a public purpose, nor shall it be taken without the prompt payment of just compensation. Such compensation shall be in an effectively realizable form and shall represent the full equivalent of the property taken; and adequate provision shall have been made at or prior to the time of taking for the determination and payment thereof.

5. Nationals and companies of either Party shall in no case be accorded, within the territories of the other Party, less than national treatment and most-favored-nation treatment with respect to the matters set forth in paragraphs 2 and 4 of the present Article. Moreover, enterprises in which nationals and companies of either Party have a substantial interest shall be accorded, within the territories of the other Party, not less than national treatment and most-favored-nation treatment in all matters relating to the taking of privately owned enterprises into public ownership and to the placing of such enterprises under public control.

ARTICLE VII

1. Enterprises which nationals and companies of either Party are permitted to establish or acquire, within the territories of the other Party, shall be permitted freely to conduct their activities therein, upon terms no less favorable than other enterprises of whatever nationality engaged in similar activities. Such nationals and companies shall enjoy the rights to continued control and management of such enterprises, and to do all other things necessary or incidental to the effective conduct of their affairs.

2. Each Party reserves the right to limit the extent to which aliens may establish or acquire interests in enterprises engaged within its territories in activities for gain (business activities) provided that in any event not less than most-favored-nation treatment shall be accorded. However, new limitations imposed by either Party upon the extent to which alien nationals or companies are permitted to carry on such activitives within its territories shall not be applied as against enterprises which are engaged in such activities therein at the time such limitations are adopted and which are owned or controlled by nationals and companies of the other Party.

ARTICLE VIII

1. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be permitted in accordance with the applicable laws, to engage, within the territories of the other Party, accountants and other technical experts, executive personnel, attorneys, agents and other specialists of their choice. Moreover, such nationals and companies shall be permitted to engage accountants and other technical experts regardless of the extent to which they may have qualified for the practice of a profession within the territories of such other Party, for the particular purpose of making examinations, audits and technical investigations for, and rendering reports to, such nationals and companies in connection with the planning and operation of their enterprises, and enterprises in which they have a financial interest, within such territories.

2. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded national treatment, and most-favored-nation treatment with respect to engaging in scientific, educational, religious and philanthropic activities within the territories of the other Party, and shall be accorded the right to form associations for that purpose under the laws of such other Party. Nothing in the present Treaty shall be deemed to grant or imply any right to engage in political activities.

ARTICLE IX

1. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded within the territories of the other Party:

(a) national treatment with respect to leasing land, buildings and other real property appropriate to the conduct of activities in which they are permitted to engage pursuant to Articles VII and VIII and for residential purposes and with respect to occupying and using such property, and

(b) other rights in real property permitted by the applicable laws of the other Party.

2. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be permitted freely to dispose of property within the territories of the other Party with repect to the acquisition of which through testate or intestate succession their alienage has prevented them from receiving national treatment, and they shall be permitted a term of at least five years in which to effect such disposition.

3. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded within the territories of the other Party national treatment and most-favored-nation treatment with respect to acquiring, by purchase, lease or otherwise, and with respect to owning and possessing, personal property of all kinds, both tangible and intangible. However, either Party may impose restrictions on alien ownership of materials dangerous from the standpoint of public safety and alien ownership of interests in enterprises carrying on particular types of activity, but only to the extent that this can be done without impairing the rights and privileges secured by Article VII or by other provisions of the present Treaty.

4. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded within the territories of the other Party national treatment and most-favored-nation treatment with respect to disposing of property of all kinds.

ARTICLE X

1. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded, within the territories of the other Party, national treatment and most-favored-nation treatment with respect to obtaining and maintaining patents of invention, and with respect to rights in trademarks, trade names, trade labels and industrial property of every kind.

2. The Parties undertake to cooperate in furthering the interchange and use of scientific and technical knowledge, particularly in the interests of increasing productivity and improving standards of living within their respective territories.

ARTICLE XI

1. Nationals of either Party residing within the territories of the other Party, and companies of either Party engaged in trade or other gainful pursuit or in scientific, educational, religious or philanthropic activities within the territories of the other Party, shall not be subject to the payment of taxes, fees or charges imposed upon or applied to income, capital, transactions, activities or any other object, or to requirements with respect to the levy and collection thereof, within the territories of such other Party, more burdensome than those borne by nationals and companies of such other Party.

2. With respect to nationals of either Party who are not resident within the territories of the other Party, and with respect to companies of either Party which are not engaged in trade or other gainful pursuit within the territories of the other Party, it shall be the aim of such other Party to apply in general the principle set forth in paragraph 1 of the present Article.

3. Nationals and companies of either Party shall in no case be subject, within the territories of the other Party, to the payment of taxes, fees or charges imposed upon or applied to income, capital, transactions, activities or any other object, or to requirements with respect to the levy and collection thereof, more burdensome than those borne by nationals, residents and companies of any third country.

4. In the case of companies of either Party engaged in trade or other gainful pursuit within the territories of the other Party, and in the case of nationals of either Party engaged in trade or other gainful pursuit within the territories of the other Party but not resident therein, such other Party shall not impose or apply any tax, fee or charge upon any income, capital or other basis in excess of that reasonably allocable or apportionable to its territories, nor grant deductions and exemptions less than those reasonably allocable or apportionable to its territories. A comparable rule shall apply also in the case of companies organized and operated exclusively for scientific, educational, religious and philanthropic purposes.

5. Each Party reserves the right to: (a) extend specific tax advantages on the basis of reciprocity; (b) accord special tax advantages by virtue of agreements for the avoidance of double taxation or the mutual protection of revenue; and (c) apply special provisions in allowing, to nonresidents, exemptions of a personal nature in connection with income and inheritance taxes.

ARTICLE XII

1. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded by the other Party national treatment and most-favored-nation treatment with respect to payments, remittances and transfers of funds or financial instruments between the territories of the two Parties as well as between the territories of such other Party and of any third country.

2. Neither Party shall impose exchange restrictions as defined in paragraph 5 of the present Article except to the extent necessary to prevent its monetary reserves from falling to a low level, to effect an increase in the reserves in order to bring them up to an adequate level, or both. It is understood that the provisions of the present Article do not alter the obligations either Party may have to the International Monetary Fund or preclude imposition of particular restrictions whenever the Fund specifically authorizes or requests a Party to impose such particular restrictions.

3. If either Party imposes exchange restrictions in accordance with paragraph 2 of the present Article, it shall, after making whatever provision may be necessary to assure the availability of foreign exchange for goods and services essential to the health and welfare of its people, make reasonable provision for the withdrawal, in foreign exchange in the currency of the other Party, of: (a) the compensation referred to in Article VI, paragraph 4, (b) earnings, whether in the form of salaries, interest, dividends, commissions, royalties, payments for technical services, or otherwise, and (c) amounts for amortization of loans, depreciation of direct investments, and capital transfers, giving consideration to special needs for other transactions. If more than one rate of exchange is in force, the rate applicable to such withdrawals shall be a rate which is specifically approved by the International Monetary Fund for such transactions or, in the absence of a rate so approved, an effective rate which, inclusive of any taxes or surcharges on exchange transfers, is just and reasonable.

4. Exchange restrictions shall not be imposed by either Party in a manner unnecessarily detrimental or arbitrarily discriminatory to the claims, investments, transport, trade, and other interests of the nationals and companies of the other Party, nor to the competitive position thereof.

5. The term "exchange restrictions" as used in the present Article includes all restrictions, regulations, charges, taxes, or other requirements imposed by either Party which burdens or interferes with payments, remittances or transfers of funds or of financial instruments between the territories of the two Parties.

6. Each Party shall afford the other Party adequate opportunity for consultation at any time regarding application of the present Article.

ARTICLE XIII

Commercial travelers representing nationals and companies of either Party engaged in business within the territories thereof shall, upon their entry into and departure from the territories of the other Party and during their sojourn therein, be accorded most-favored-nation treatment in respect of the customs and other matters, including, subject to the exceptions in paragraph 5 of Article XI, taxes and charges applicable to them, their samples and the taking of orders, and regulations governing the exercise of their functions.

ARTICLE XIV

1. Each Party shall accord most-favored-nation treatment to products of the other Party, from whatever place and by whatever type of carrier arriving, and to products destined for exportation to the territories of such other Party, by whatever route and by whatever type of carrier, with respect to customs duties and charges of any kind imposed on or in connection with importation or exportation or imposed on the international transfer of payments for imports or exports, and with respect to the method of levying such duties and charges, and with respect to all rules and formalities in connection with importation and exportation.

2. Neither Party shall impose restrictions or prohibitions on the importation of any product of the other Party, or on the exportation of any product to the territories of the other Party, unless the importation of the like product of, or the exportation of the like product to, all third countries is similarly restricted or prohibited.

3. If either Party imposes quantitative restrictions on the importation and exportation of any product in which the other Party has an important interest:

(a) it shall to the extent practicable give prior public notice of the total amount of the product, by quantity or value, that may be imported or exported during a specified period, and of any change in such amount or period;

(b) in case public notice of permitted imports or exports is not practicable, it shall provide to the other Party, upon request, all relevant information concerning the administration of the restrictions; and

(c) if it makes allotments to any third country, it shall afford such other Party a share proportionate to the amount of the product, by quantity or value supplied by or to it during a previous representative period, due consideration being given to any special factors affecting the trade in such product.

4. Either Party may impose prohibitions or restrictions on sanitary or other customary grounds of a noncommercial nature, or in the interest of preventing deceptive or unfair practices, provided such prohibitions or restrictions do not arbitrarily discriminate against the commerce of the other Party.

5. Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded national treatment and most-favored-nation treatment by the other Party with respect to all matters relating to importation and exportation.

6. The provisions of the present Article shall not apply to advantages accorded by either Party:

(a) to products of its national fisheries;

(b) to adjacent countries in order to facilitate frontier traffic; or

(c) by virtue of a customs union or free-trade area of which it may become a member, so long as it informs the other Party of its plans and affords such other Party adequate opportunity for consultation.

7. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraphs 2 and 3(c) of the present Article, a Party may apply restrictions or controls on importation and exportation of goods that have effect equivalent to, or which are necessary to make effective, exchange restrictions applied pursuant to Article XII. However, such restrictions or controls shall depart no more than necessary from the aforesaid paragraphs and shall be conformable with a policy designed to promote the maximum development of nondiscriminatory foreign trade and to expedite the attainment both of a balance-of-payments position and of monetary reserves which will obviate the necessity for such restrictions.

ARTICLE XV

1. Each Party shall promptly publish laws, regulations and administrative rulings of general application pertaining to rates of duty, taxes or other charges, to the classification of articles for customs purposes, and to requirements or restrictions on imports and exports or the transfer of payments therefor, or affecting their sale, distribution or use; and shall administer such laws, regulations and rulings in a uniform, impartial and reasonable manner. As a general practice, new administrative requirements or restrictions affecting imports, with the exception of those relating to customs duties and internal revenue taxes and with the exception of requirements and restrictions imposed on sanitary grounds or for reasons of public safety, shall not go into effect before the expiration of 30 days after publication, or alternatively, shall not apply to products en route at time of publication.

2. Each Party shall provide an appeals procedure under which nationals and companies of the other Party, and importers of products of such other Party, shall be able to obtain prompt and impartial review, and correction when warranted, of administrative action ralating to customs matters, including the imposition of fines and penalties, confiscations, and rulings on questions of customs classification and valuation by the administrative authorities. Penalties imposed for infractions of the customs and shipping laws and regulations shall be merely nominal in cases resulting from clerical errors or when good faith can be demonstrated.

ARTICLE XVI

1. Products of either Party shall be accorded, within the territories of the other Party, national treatment and most-favored-nation treatment in all matters affecting internal taxation, sale, distribution, storage and use.

2. Articles produced by nationals and companies of either Party within the territories of the other Party, or by companies of the latter Party controlled by such nationals and companies, shall be accorded therein treatment no less favorable than that accorded to like articles of national origin by whatever person or company produced, in all matters affecting exportation, taxation, sale, distribution, storage and use.

ARTICLE XVII

1. Each Party undertakes:

(a) that enterprises owned or controlled by its Government, and that monopolies or agencies granted exclusive or special privileges within its territories, shall make their purchases and sales involving either imports or exports affecting the commerce of the other Party solely in accordance with commercial considerations, including price, quality, availability, marketability, transportation and other conditions of purchase or sale; and

(b) that the nationals, companies and commerce of such other Party shall be afforded adequate opportunity, in accordance with customary business practice, to compete for participation in such purchases and sales.

2. Each Party shall accord to the nationals, companies and commerce of the other Party fair and equitable treatment, as compared with that accorded to the nationals, companies and commerce of any third country, with respect to:

(a) the governmental purchase of supplies,

(b) the awarding of concessions and other government contracts, and

(c) the sale of any service sold by the Government or by any monopoly or agency granted exclusive or special privileges.

ARTICLE XVIII

1. The two Parties agree that business practices which restrain competition, limit access to markets or foster monopolistic control, and which are engaged in or made effective by one or more private or public commercial enterprises or by combination, agreement or other arrangement among such enterprises, may have harmful effects upon commerce between their respective territories. Accordingly, each Party agrees upon the request of the other Party to consult with respect to any such practices and to take such measures as it deems appropriate with a view to eliminating such harmful effects.

2. The Parties recognize that conditions of competitive equality should be maintained in situations in which publicly owned or controlled trading or manufacturing enterprises of either Party engage in competition, within the territories thereof, with privately owned and controlled enterprises of nationals and companies of the other Party. Accordingly, such private enterprises shall, in such situations, be entitled to the benefit of any special advantages of an economic nature accorded such public enterprises, whether in the nature of subsidies, tax exemptions or otherwise. The foregoing rule shall not apply, however, to special advantages given in connection with:

(a) manufacturing goods for government use, or supplying goods and services to the Government for government use; or

(b) supplying, at prices substantially below competitive prices, the needs of particular population groups for essential goods and services not otherwise practically obtainable by such groups.

ARTICLE XIX

There shall be freedom of transit through the territories of each Party by the routes most convenient for international transit:

(a) for nationals of the other Party, together with their baggage;

(b) for other persons, together with their baggage, en route to or from the territories of such other Party; and

(c) for products of any origin en route to or from the territories of such other Party. Such persons and things in transit shall be exempt from customs duties, from duties imposed by reason of transit, and from unreasonable charges and requirements; and shall be free from unnecessary delays and restrictions. They shall, however, be subject to measures referred to in paragraph 3 of Article II, and to nondiscriminatory regulations necessary to prevent abuse of the transit privilege.

ARTICLE XX

1. The present Treaty shall not preclude the application of measures:

(a) regulating the importation or exportation of gold or silver;

(b) relating to fissionable materials, to radioactive by-products of the utilization or processing thereof, or to materials that are the source of fissionable materials;

(c) regulating the production of or traffic in arms, ammunition and implements of war, or traffic in other materials carried on directly or indirectly for the purpose of supplying a military establishment;

(d) necessary to fulfill the obligations of a Party for the maintenance or restoration of international peace and security, or necessary to protect its essential security interests; and

(e) denying to any company in the ownership or direction of which nationals of any third country or countries have directly or indirectly the controlling interest, the advantages of the present Treaty, except with respect to recognition of juridical status and with respect to access to courts.

2. The most-favored-nation provisions of the present Treaty relating to the treatment of goods shall not apply to advantages accorded by the United States of America or its Territories and possessions to one another, to the Republic of Cuba, to the Republic of the Philippines, to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands or to the Panama Canal Zone.

3. The provisions of the present Treaty relating to the treatment of goods shall not preclude action by either Party which is required or specifically permitted by the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade during such time as such Party is a contracting party to the General Agreement. Similarly, the most-favored-nation provisions of the present Treaty shall not apply to special advantages accorded by virtue of the aforesaid Agreement.

4. The most-favored-nation treatment provisions of the present Treaty shall not apply to special advantages permitted by the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and accorded by the provisions of any agreement made by either Party with a third country before the coming into force of the present Treaty or an agreement made renewing or continuing any special advantages previously accorded.

5. Nationals of either Party admitted into the territories of the other Party for limited purposes shall not enjoy rights to engage in gainful occupations in contravention of limitations expressly imposed, according to law, as a condition of their admittance.

ARTICLE XXI

1. The term "national treatment" means treatment accorded within the territories of a Party upon terms no less favorable than the treatment accorded therein, in like situations, to nationals, companies, products or other objects, as the case may be, of such Party.

2. The term "most-favored-nation treatment" means treatment accorded within the territories of a Party upon terms no less favorable than the treatment accorded therein, in like situations, to nationals, companies, products or other objects, as the case may be, of any third country.

3. As used in the present Treaty, the term "companies" means corporations, partnerships, companies and other associations, whether or not with limited liability and whether or not for pecuniary profit. Companies constituted under the applicable laws and regulations within the territories of either Party shall be deemed companies thereof and shall have their juridical status recognized within the territories of the other Party.

4. National treatment accorded under the provisions of the present Treaty to companies of Pakistan shall, in any State, Territory or possession of the United States of America, be the treatment accorded therein to companies created or organized in other States, Territories, and possessions of the United States of America.

ARTICLE XXII

The territories to which the present Treaty extends shall comprise all areas of land and water under the sovereignty or authority of each Party, other than the Panama Canal Zone and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

ARTICLE XXIII

1. Each Party shall accord sympathetic consideration to, and shall afford adequate opportunity for consultation regarding, such representations as the other Party may make with respect to any matter affecting the operation of the present Treaty.

2. Any dispute between the Parties as to the interpretation or application of the present Treaty, not satisfactorily adjusted by diplomacy, shall be submitted to the International Court of Justice, unless the Parties agree to settlement by some other pacific means.

ARTICLE XXIV

1. The present Treaty shall be ratified, and the instruments of ratification thereof shall be exchanged at Karachi as soon as possible.

2. The present Treaty shall enter into force one month after the day of exchange of instruments of ratification. It shall remain in force for ten years and shall continue in force thereafter until terminated as provided herein.

3. Either Party may, by giving one year's written notice to the other Party, terminate the present Treaty at the end of the initial ten-year period or at any time thereafter.

In witness whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Treaty and have affixed hereunto their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington, this twelfth day of November, one thousand nine hundred fifty-nine.

PROTOCOL

At the time of signing the Treaty of Friendship and Commerce between the United States of America and Pakistan the undersigned Plenipotentiaries, duly authorized by their respective Governments, have further agreed on the following provisions, which shall be considered integral parts of the aforesaid Treaty:

1. The provisions of Article II, paragraph 1(b), shall be construed as extending to a national of either Party seeking to enter the territories of the other Party solely for the purpose of developing and directing the operations of an enterprise in the territories of such other Party in which his employer has invested or is actively in the process of investing a substantial amount of capital, provided that such employer is a national or a company of the same nationality as the applicant and that the applicant is employed by such national or company in a responsible capacity.

2. The term "access" as used in Article V, paragraph 1, comprehends, among other things, legal aid and security for costs and judgment.

3. The provisions of Article VI, paragraph 4, providing for the payment of compensation shall extend to interests held directly or indirectly by nationals and companies of either Party in property which is taken within the territories of the other Party.

4. With reference to Article VII, paragraph 2, either Party may require that rights to engage in mining on the public domain shall be dependent on reciprocity.

5. The provision for most-favored-nation treatment in Article VII, paragraph 2, shall not apply to the practice of professions.

6. The provisions of Article XI, paragraph 1, shall not prevent a Party from granting an adjustment in the income tax or corporation tax payable by companies which declare and pay dividends within its territories.

7. Nothing in the present Treaty shall be construed to supersede any provision of the Convention between Pakistan and the United States of America with respect to taxes on income, signed at Washington July 1, 1957, and instruments of ratification exchanged at Karachi on May 21, 1959.

8. The treatment provided in Article XII, paragraph 1, as clarified by reference to Article XXII, paragraphs 1 and 2, has only in view to preclude discrimination on the ground of nationality of persons and companies and does not, for instance, preclude special arrangements providing more favorable treatment for transactions in certain currencies than for transactions in other currencies for balance-of-payments reasons, or the application of residence requirements.

9. With reference to Article XIV, paragraph 3(b), the Party applying restrictions may withhold from the other Party, for such period as may be necessary to assure success of the policy of restriction, any information the premature disclosure of which might endanger such policy.

10. The provisions of Article XX, paragraph 2, shall apply in the case of Puerto Rico regardless of any change that may take place in its political status.

11. Article XXII does not apply to territories under the authority of either Party solely as a military base or by reason of temporary military occupation.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed this Protocol and have affixed hereunto their seals.

DONE in duplicate at Washington, this twelfth day of November, one thousand nine hundred fifty-nine.

CONVENTION OF ESTABLISHMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND FRANCE

The President of the United States of America and the President of the French Republic, President of the Community, desirous of strengthening the ties of peace and friendship traditionally existing between the two countries and of encouraging closer economic intercourse between their peoples, conscious of the contribution which may be made to these ends by arrangements that provide in each country reciprocal rights and privileges on behalf of nationals and companies of the other country, thus encouraging mutually advantageous investments and mutually beneficial commercial relations, have resolved to conclude a convention of establishment and, for that purpose have appointed as Plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America,

The Honorable Amory Houghton, Ambassador of the United States of America at Paris, and

The President of the French Republic, President of the Community,

M. Maurice Couve de Murville, Minister of Foreign Affairs, who, having communicated to each other their full powers, found to be in due form, have agreed on the following Articles:

ARTICLE I

Each High Contracting Party shall accord equitable treatment to nationals and companies of the other High Contracting Party, both as to their persons and as to their property, enterprises and other interests, and shall assure them within its territories full legal and judicial protection.

ARTICLE II

1. Nationals of either High Contracting Party shall, subject to the laws relating to the entry and sojourn of aliens, be permitted to enter the territories of the other High Contracting Party, to travel therein freely, and to reside therein at places of their choice. They shall in particular be permitted to enter the territories of the other High Contracting Party and to remain therein, for the purpose of:

(a) carrying on trade between the territories of the two High Contracting Parties and engaging in related commercial activities;

(b) developing and directing the operations of an enterprise in which they have invested, or in which they are actively in the process of investing, a substantial amount of capital.

2. Nationals of each High Contracting Party shall enjoy, within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, freedom of conscience, of worship, of information and of the press.

3. The provisions of the present Article shall be subject to the right of either High Contracting Party to take measures that are necessary for the maintenance of public order and for the protection of public health, morals, and safety.

ARTICLE III

1. Nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party shall be accorded national treatment with respect to access to the courts of justice as well as to administrative tribunals and agencies, within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, in all degrees of jurisdiction, both in pursuit and in defense of their rights. Companies of either High Contracting Party not engaged in activities within the territories of the other High Contracting Party shall enjoy such access therein without any requirement of registration. Nationals of either High Contracting Party shall be accorded the benefits of legal aid within the territories of the other High Contracting Party under the same conditions as its own nationals.

2. Contracts entered into between nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party and nationals and companies of the other High Contracting Party, that provide for the settlement by arbitration of controversies, shall not be deemed unenforceable within the territories of such other High Contracting Party merely on the grounds that the place designated for the arbitration proceedings is outside such territories or that the nationality of one or more of the arbitrators is not that of such other High Contracting Party. No award duly rendered pursuant to any such contract, and final and enforceable under the laws of the place where rendered, shall be deemed invalid or denied effective means of enforcement within the territories of either High Contracting Party merely on the grounds that the place where such award was rendered is outside such territories or that the nationality of one or more of the arbitrators is not that of such High Contracting Party.

ARTICLE IV

1. The lawfully acquired rights and interests of nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party shall not be subjected to impairment, within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, by any measure of a discriminatory character.

2. The dwellings, offices, warehouses, factories and other premises of nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party located within the territories of the other High Contracting Party shall be free from molestation and other unjustifiable measures. Official searches conducted on such premises, when necessary, shall be carried out in conformity with the law and with every consideration for the convenience of the occupants and the conduct of business.

3. Property of nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party shall not be expropriated within the territories of the other High Contracting Party except for a public purpose and with payment of a just compensation. Such compensation shall represent the equivalent of the property taken; it shall be accorded in an effectively realizable form and without needless delay. Adequate provision for the determination and payment of the said compensation must have been made no later than the time of the taking.

4. Nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party shall in no case be accorded, within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, less than national treatment with respect to the matters set forth in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the present Article.

ARTICLE V

1. Nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party shall be accorded national treatment with respect to engaging in all types of commercial, industrial, financial and other activities for gain within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, whether directly or through the intermediary of an agent or of any other natural or juridical person. Accordingly, such nationals and companies shall be permitted within such territories:

(a) to establish and to maintain branches, agencies, offices, factories and other establishments appropriate to the conduct of their business;

(b) to organize companies under the general company laws of such other High Contracting Party, and to acquire majority interests in companies of such other High Contracting Party;

(c) to control and manage the enterprises which they have established or acquired.

Moreover, the enterprises which they control, whether in the form of an individual proprietorship, of a company or otherwise, shall, in all that relates to the conduct of the activities thereof, be accorded treatment no less favorable than that accorded like enterprises controlled by nationals and companies of such other High Contracting Party.

2. Each High Contracting Party reserves the right to determine the extent to which aliens may, within its territories, create, control, manage, or acquire interests in, enterprises engaged in communications, air or water transport, banking involving depository or fiduciary functions, exploitation of the soil or other natural resources, and the production of electricity.

3. Each High Contracting Party undertakes not to intensify, within its territories, existing limitations as regards enterprises belonging to or controlled by nationals and companies of the other High Contracting Party which are already engaged in the activities cited in the preceding paragraph. Moreover, each High Contracting Party shall permit, within its territories, transportation, communications, and banking companies of the other High Contracting Party to maintain branches and agencies, in conformity with the laws in force, which are necessary to the operations of an essential international character in which they are engaged.

ARTICLE VI

1. Nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party shall be permitted to engage, at their choice, within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, accountants and other technical experts, lawyers, and personnel who by reason of their special capacities are essential to the functioning of the enterprise. But these persons must fulfill the conditions necessary to the exercise of their calling under the applicable legislation.

2. In any event, such nationals and companies shall be permitted to engage accountants and other technical experts, who are not nationals of the other High Contracting Party, without regard to their having qualified to practice a profession within the territories of such other High Contracting Party, but exclusively for conducting studies and examinations for internal purposes on behalf of such nationals and companies.

ARTICLE VII

1. Nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party shall be accorded, within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, national treatment with respect to leasing, utilizing and occupying real property of all kinds appropriate to the exercise of the rights accorded them by the other Articles of the present Convention. They shall also be accorded therein, as regards the acquisition and possession of real property, all other rights to which aliens and alien companies are entitled under the legislation of such other High Contracting Party, each High Contracting Party reserving the right to invoke reciprocity in this respect.

2. Nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party shall be accorded, within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, national treatment with respect to leasing and acquiring, by purchase or otherwise, as well as with respect to possessing, personal property of every kind, whether tangible or intangible, with the exception of ships. However, either High Contracting Party may impose restrictions on alien ownership of materials dangerous from the viewpoint of public safety and alien ownership of interests in enterprises carrying on particular types of activity, but only to the extent compatible with the enjoyment of the rights and privileges defined in Article V or provided by other provisions of the present Convention.

3. Nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party shall be accorded within the territories of the other High Contracting Party national treatment with respect to the right to dispose of property of all kinds.

ARTICLE VIII

1. Nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party shall be accorded, within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, national treatment with respect to obtaining and maintaining patents of invention and with respect to rights appertaining to trademarks, trade names and certification marks, or which in any manner relate to industrial property.

2. The High Contracting Parties undertake to cooperate with a view to furthering the interchange and use of scientific and technical knowledge, particularly in the interest of increasing productivity and improving standards of living within their respective territories.

ARTICLE IX

1. The following categories:

(a) nationals of either High Contracting Party residing within the territories of the other High Contracting Party,

(b) nationals of either High Contracting Party not residing within the territories of the other High Contracting Party but engaged in trade or other gainful pursuit within such territories, whether or not through a permanent establishment or a fixed place of business,

(c) companies of either High Contracting Party engaged in trade or other gainful pursuit within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, whether or not through a permanent establishment or a fixed place of business.

(d) associations of either High Contracting Party that are engaged in scientific, educational, religious or philanthropic activities within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, whether through a fixed place of business or otherwise, shall not be subject to any form of taxation or any obligation relating thereto, within the territories of such other High Contracting Party, which is more burdensome than that to which nationals, companies and associations of such other High Contracting Party in the same situation are or may be subject.

2. Nationals, companies and associations of either High Contracting Party, not falling within one of the categories specified in paragraph 1 above, shall not be subject, within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, to any form of taxation or any obligation relating thereto which is more burdensome than that to which nationals, companies and associations of any third country in the same situation are or may be subject.

3. Enterprises of either High Contracting Party, the capital of which is owned or controlled in whole or in part, directly or indirectly, by one or more nationals of the other High Contracting Party, shall not be subject in the first High Contracting Party to any form of taxation or any obligation relating thereto which is more burdensome than that to which other like enterprises of the first High Contracting Party are or may be subject.

4. The nationals, companies and associations of either High Contracting Party referred to in paragraph 1 (b), (c), and (d) of the present Article shall not be subject, within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, to any form of taxation upon capital, income, profits or any other basis, except by reason of the property which they possess within those territories, the income and profits derived from sources therein, the business in which they are there engaged, the transactions which they accomplish there, or any other bases of taxation directly related to their activities within those territories.

5. The term "form of taxation", as used in the present Article, includes all taxes of whatever nature or denomination.

6. Each High Contracting Party reserves the right to:

(a) extend to the nationals, companies and associations of third countries, specific tax advantages on the basis of reciprocity;

(b) accord special tax advantages by virtue of agreements with third countries for the avoidance of double taxation;

(c) apply special provisions in allowing, to non-residents, exemptions of a personal nature in connection with income and inheritance taxes;

(d) extend special advantages to its own nationals and residents in connection with joint returns by husband and wife.

7. The foregoing provisions shall not prevent the levying, in appropriate cases, of fees relating to the accomplishment of police and other formalities, if these fees are also levied on other foreigners. The rates for such fees shall not exceed those charged the nationals of any other country.

ARTICLE X

1. Nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party shall be accorded by the other High Contracting Party the same treatment as nationals and companies of such other High Contracting Party in like situations, with respect to payments, remittances and transfers of funds or financial instruments between the territories of the two High Contracting Parties as well as between the territories of such other High Contracting Party and any third country. This treatment shall be not less favorable than that accorded to nationals and companies of any third country in like situations.

2. Neither High Contracting Party shall impose exchange restrictions as defined in paragraph 5 of the present Article except to the extent necessary to prevent its monetary reserves from falling to a very low level or to effect a moderate increase in very low monetary reserves. The provisions of the present Article do not alter the obligations either High Contracting Party may have to the International Monetary Fund or preclude imposition of particular restrictions whenever the Fund specifically authorizes or requests a High Contracting Party to impose such restrictions.

3. The two High Contracting Parties, recognizing that the freedom of movement of investment capital and of the returns thereon would be conducive to the realization of the objectives of the present Convention, are agreed that such movements shall not be unnecessarily hampered. In this spirit, each High Contracting Party will make every effort to accord, in the greatest possible measure, to nationals and companies of the other High Contracting Party the opportunity to make investments and to repatriate the proceeds of the liquidation thereof. This principle shall apply also to the compensation referred to in Article IV, paragraph 3, of the present Convention. Each High Contracting Party shall make reasonable provision for the withdrawal of earnings from investments, whether in the form of salaries, dividends, interest, commissions, royalties, payments for technical services, or payments for other current transactions relative to investments. If more than one rate of exchange is in force, the rate applicable to such withdrawals shall be a rate which is specifically approved by the International Monetary Fund for such transactions or, in the absence of a rate so approved, a rate which, inclusive of any taxes or surcharges on exchange transfers, is just and reasonable.

4. Exchange restrictions shall not be imposed by either High Contracting Party in a manner unnecessarily detrimental or arbitrarily discriminatory to the claims, investments, transport, trade, and other interests of the nationals and companies of the other High Contracting Party, nor to the competitive position thereof.

5. The term "exchange restrictions" as used in the present Article includes all restrictions, charges and taxes, regulations, or other requirements imposed by either High Contracting Party which burden or interfere with payments, remittances, or transfers of funds or of financial instruments between the territories of the two High Contracting Parties.

ARTICLE XI

Each High Contracting Party will take the measures it deems appropriate with a view to preventing commercial practices or arrangements, whether effected by one or more private or public commercial enterprises, which restrain competition, limit access to markets or foster monopolistic control, whenever such practices or arrangements have or might have harmful effects on trade between the two countries:

ARTICLE XII

The provisions of the present Convention shall not preclude the application of measures:

(a) regulating the importation and exportation of gold and silver;

(b) regarding fissionable materials, the radio-active byproducts of the utilization or manufacture of such materials, or raw materials which are the source of fissionable materials;

(c) regulating the manufacture of and traffic in arms, munitions and implements of war, as well as traffic in other materials carried on directly or indirectly for the purpose of supplying military establishments;

(d) necessary to fulfill the obligations of a High Contracting Party for the maintenance or restoration of international peace and security, or necessary to protect its essential security interests.

ARTICLE XIII

The High Contracting Parties may deny to any company, in the ownership or direction of which nationals of a third country or countries have directly or indirectly a controlling interest, the advantages of the present Convention, except with respect to recognition of juridical status and access to the courts.

ARTICLE XIV

1. The term "national treatment" means treatment accorded to nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party within the territories of the other High Contracting Party upon terms no less favorable than the treatment therein accorded, in like situations, to the nationals and companies, as the case may be, of such other High Contracting Party.

2. National treatment accorded under the provisions of the present Convention to French companies shall, in any State, territory or possession of the United States of America, be the treatment accorded therein to companies constituted in other States, territories and possessions of the United States of America.

3. As used in the present Convention, the term "nationals" ("ressortissants") means natural persons having the nationality of a High Contracting Party and not domiciled in a non-metropolitan territory thereof to which the present Convention does not extend.

4. As used in the present Convention, the term "companies" ("sociétés") means:

(a) as concerns the United States of America, corporations, partnerships, limited liability companies, and other entities having legal personality, whether or not with limited liability, but for pecuniary profit;

(b) as concerns France, "sociétés civiles", "sociétés en nom collectif", "associations en participation", "sociétés en commandite simple", "sociétés en commandite par actions", "sociétés anonymes", "sociétés à responsabilite limitee" and, in general, entities having legal personality for pecuniary profit.

5. Companies constituted under the applicable laws and regulations within the territories of either High Contracting Party shall be deemed companies thereof and shall have their juridical status recognized within the territories of the other High Contracting Party.

6. Non-profit associations lawfully constituted within the territories of either High Contracting Party shall have their juridical status recognized by the other High Contracting Party and shall, inter alia, be accorded within the territories thereof the rights provided in Article III, paragraph 1, of the present Convention.

ARTICLE XV

1. The present Convention shall apply:

(a) As concerns the United States of America, to all territories under the sovereignty or authority thereof, other than the Panama Canal Zone and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands;

(b) As concerns the French Republic, to the metropolitan departments, the Algerian departments, the departments of The Oasis and Saoura, the departments of Martinique, Guadaloupe, Guiana and Reunion.

2. The present Convention may be made applicable, by virtue of exchanges of notes between the Governments of the High Contracting Parties, to the Overseas Territories of the French Republic or to one or several such Territories, under the conditions fixed, in each case, in the said exchanges of notes.

3. The present Convention may be made applicable, in the same manner, to the member States of the Community or to one or several such States.

ARTICLE XVI

1. Each High Contracting Party shall accord sympathetic consideration to such representations as the other High Contracting Party may make with respect to any question affecting the application of the present Convention, and shall afford opportunity for an exchange of views relative thereto.

2. Any dispute between the High Contracting Parties as to the interpretation or application of the present Convention, not satisfactorily adjusted by diplomacy, shall be submitted to the International Court of Justice, unless the High Contracting Parties agree to settlement by some other pacific means.

ARTICLE XVII

The entry into force of the present Convention shall terminate the Trade-mark Convention signed at Washington April 16, 1869.

ARTICLE XVIII

1. The present Convention shall be ratified. It will enter into force one month after the exchange of the instruments of ratification, which will take place at Washington.

2. The present Convention shall have an initial term of ten years. It shall remain in force thereafter until either High Contracting Party terminates it by giving to the other High Contracting Party a written notice one year in advance.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Convention and have hereunto affixed their seals.

DONE in duplicate, in the English and French languages, both equally authentic, at Paris, this twenty-fifth day of November, one thousand nine hundred fifty-nine.

[SEAL]	AMORY HOUGHTON
[SEAL]	M. COUVE DE MURVILLE

PROTOCOL

The undersigned Plenipotentiaries, duly authorized by their respective Governments, are further agreed on the following provisions, which shall form an integral part of the Convention of Establishment between the United States of America and France dated the twenty-fifth of November, one thousand nine hundred fifty-nine.

1. (a) The protection provided in Article I engages the competent authorities of each High Contracting Party to inform immediately the consuls of the other High Contracting Party of the arrest or detention of any of its nationals, if the latter so requests. The consul may then be authorized to visit such national, in conformity with the regulations of the institution of detention, and to confer with him. The competent authority will assure the transmission to the consul of all correspondence directed to him by such national.

(b) Such national shall have the right to all guaranties provided in the laws of the High Contracting Party within the territories of which he is detained, and which assure accused persons of humane treatment, the right to be informed immediately of the accusations against them, to be defended by an attorney of their choice, and to be judged as rapidly as possible.

2. (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of the present Convention, the laws and regulations in force within the territories of either High Contracting Party which govern the access of aliens to the professions and occupations, as well as the exercise of such callings and other activities by them, remain applicable as concerns nationals and companies of the other High Contracting Party.

(b) However, the procedures provided for by the above-mentioned laws and regulations, as well as those provided for by the laws and regulations governing the entry and sojourn of aliens, must not have the effect of impairing the substance of the rights set forth in Article II, paragraph 1 (a) and (b).

(c) The provisions of Article II, paragraph 1(b), shall be construed as extending to nationals of either High Contracting Party proceeding to the territories of the other High Contracting Party for the purpose of occupying a position of responsibility in an enterprise on behalf of nationals and companies of the first High Contracting Party that have invested a substantial amount of capital in such enterprise or that are in the process of making such an investment.

(d) The advantages accorded a national of either High Contractng Party under the provisions of Article II, paragraph 1 (a) and (b), with respect to entry and sojourn in the territories of the other High Contracting Party, shall extend to his spouse and minor unmarried children who accompany or next follow to join him.

(3) The provision of Article III, paragraph 1, relating to access to the courts of justice, shall not affect the regulations in force within the territories of either High Contracting Party concerning the cautio judicatum solvi.

4. The provisions of the last sentence of Article III, paragraph 2, shall not affect the reservation concerning the place where the award is rendered, made by France in adhering to the Convention of New York of June 10, 1958, for the recognition and execution of foreign arbitral awards.

5. In Article IV, paragraph 3, the term "expropriated . . . for a public purpose" extends inter alia to nationalizations.

6. The provisions of Article IV, paragraph 3, providing for the payment of compensation, shall extend to interests held directly or indirectly by nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party in property expropriated within the territories of the other High Contracting Party.

7. The provisions of Article V, paragraph 1, shall not impair the laws and regulations in force within the territories of either High Contracting Party which reserve the practice of certain professions to nationals.

8. The provisions of Article V, paragraph 1, do not preclude the right of either High Contracting Party to apply special requirements to alien insurance companies to the end that they furnish guaranties, in the interest of insured persons and of third parties, equivalent to those required of companies of the country.

9. The provisions of Article VI, paragraph 2, are adopted with regard to accountancy until such time as it may have become possible to conclude an agreement concerning the exercise of this profession.

10. The right to invoke reciprocity as provided in Article VII, paragraph 1, shall permit the French Government, taking into account the treatment accorded French nationals and companies in a State, territory or possession of the United States of America, to apply analogous treatment to nationals and companies of the United States of America, respectively domiciled in such State, territory or possession or constituted under its laws.

11. In the event that a French national or company, having acquired real property by testate or intestate succession, should be precluded by reason of alienage from enjoying rights of ownership in such property in a State, territory or possession of the United States of America, such national or company will be allowed a period of at least five years in which to dispose of it.

12. The provisions of Article VII, paragraphs 2 and 3, shall not prevent the enforcement of regulations governing transactions on the part of non-residents and aliens in foreign stocks and bonds.

13. The provisions of Article X, paragraph 1, shall not preclude differing treatment from being applied to different currencies, as may be required by the state of the balance of payments of either High Contracting Party.

14. Either High Contracting Party, with a view to protecting its currency or facilitating the servicing of the proceeds of investments and the repatriation of capital, may subject to authorization the making of investments by foreign nationals and companies.

15. The phrase, "in the greatest possible measure", employed in Article X, paragraph 3, shall be understood to refer to the conditions cited in Article X, paragraph 2.

16. Residence criteria may be applied for purposes of determining whether or not nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party are in "like situations" as that term is employed in paragraph 1 of Article XIV and in the other provisions of the present Convention.

17. Article XV does not apply to territories which are subject to the authority of either High Contracting Party solely as a military base or by reason of temporary military occupation.

In witness whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the present protocol and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate, in the English and French languages, both equally authentic, at Paris, this twenty-fifth day of November, one thousand nine hundred fifty-nine.

JOINT DECLARATION

The two Governments deem it appropriate to clarify, at the moment of proceeding to the signing of the Convention of Establishment between the United States of America and France, the import of the reservations relating, on the one hand, to the enforcement of the laws governing the entry and sojourn of aliens and, on the other hand, to the enforcement of the laws regulating the access of aliens to the professions and occupations.

It is expressly stipulated in the Protocol to the Convention that those reservations shall not impair the substance of the rights granted to the nationals of either High Contracting Party who have invested a substantial amount of capital or are in the process of making such an investment within the territories of the other High Contracting Party, or who proceed thereto for the purpose of engaging in trade between the two High Contracting Parties.

However, the two Governments also have the intention of facilitating, to the greatest possible extent and on a basis of real and effective reciprocity, the establishment of nationals who are not within the above-cited categories and, in particular, of qualified personnel who are indispensable to the conduct of the enterprises created by nationals and companies of either High Contracting Party within the territories of the other High Contracting Party.

Consequently, and in conformity with the spirit which animated the negotiation of the present Convention, the two Governments consider that they should reciprocally exercise the greatest possible liberality consistent with their national laws both with respect to the entry and sojourn of aliens and with respect to their establishment, effective reciprocity being understood by them as pertaining globally to the whole of the two systems of regulation.

The present Declaration shall be annexed to the Convention of Establishment between the United States of America and France dated the twenty-fifth of November, one thousand nine hundred fifty-nine.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the commercial treaties with France and Pakistan, now before the Senate, are the result of long and continuing effort by the Department of State. They are designed to serve the needs and convenience of American businessmen and corporations who have dealings in Pakistan and France. In the latter case—the Convention of Establishment with France—the agreement will facilitate the creation and development of new business enterprises.

These treaties are in the pattern of other commercial agreements that the United States has negotiated since the end of World War II. They are now 19 in number. The United States has tried to bring about such an agreement with Pakistan ever since the creation of that country, but not until the government of President Ayub assumed control has it been possible to do so. Other Pakistani leaders have been doubtful of any agreement that would deny them the discretionary right to discriminate against the commercial enterprises of other countries. The United States has tried for a much longer period of time to negotiate a commercial treaty with France. The original agreement, signed in 1778, was terminated more than 100 years ago. The French traditionally have opposed proposals for a new commercial treaty. In the distant past, the opposition centered on the question of trade. France was highly protectionist—more so than the United States—and very monopolistic. More recently, French governments have been unwilling to commit themselves to standards of nondiscriminatory treatment of foreign enterprises. As noted in the report, France's balance of payments position has been poor for many years, and this has dictated severe exchange controls. However, with its economy grown stronger under President de Gaulle's stable leadership, France has liberalized some of its policies. Moreover, French political circles are interested in attracting U.S. investment.

Mr. President, both these treaties carry the conventional provisions guaranteeing nondiscriminatory treatment of business enterprises and most favored nations rights. Nothing in either agreement would affect the tax liability of American firms operating in these countries. Nor would any of their provisions alter established Federal-State relations or widen Federal powers at the expense of the States.

Some of my colleagues may be interested in whether these treaties waive the so-called Connally reservation. The answer is that, like most of our other commercial treaties, they do. Under article 23 of the Pakistan agreement and 16 of the convention with France, the treaty parties agree to submit disputes to the International Court of Justice that have not been settled through the normal diplomatic processes. This provision, on balance, becomes more of an advantage to the United States, whose businessmen can be expected to engage in many more transactions than the businessmen of the other treaty parties.

Both treaties are assured a minimum life of 10 years, after which either can be terminated on 1 year's written notice by either party to the other. For the present, the provisions of the convention with France cover only metropolitan France and the oversea departments, but article 15 allows the treaty area to be extended to other territories and member states of the French Community.

Mr. President, the committee is persuaded that these treaties will serve the best interests of American business and hence the country. Therefore, I urge that the Senate approve them both.

I ask unanimous consent to insert portions of the reports in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the extracts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE OF THE TREATIES

The purpose of the treaties is to protect the interests of those nationals and corporate entities of the treaty parties engaged in conducting business and commercial transactions within the territory of the other party.

BACKGROUND

Both agreements are in harmony with several other commercial treaties that the United States has initiated since 1946. The United States has been trying for 11 years to negotiate such an agreement with Pakistan, but not until the present Government assumed direction of that country was it possible to do so. Predecessor governments have opposed any treaty that would oblige Pakistan to forbear from discriminating against foreign business interests on its territories. The convention with France is expected to serve the needs and convenience of business enterprises. "Establishment" in this case means just that—the establishment of business people and enterprises in the two countries. It is a term that is often used by European countries, especially France, and is a sufficiently broad designation for this treaty, which contains no provisions covering trade or navigation.

In 1778, the United States negotiated a treaty of amity and commerce with France, but it was terminated more than a century ago. For a long time the United States has been interested in having another such treaty, but the French have opposed the idea. France's balance-of-payments position has been poor for many years, and this has dictated severe exchange controls. However, with its economy growing stronger within the stabler climate created by the government of President de Gaulle, France has liberalized certain of its policies, and is, in any case, interested in attracting U.S. investment.

SUBSTANCE OF THE TREATIES

Under articles VI, VII, and XII of the treaty with Pakistan—"neither party shall take unreasonable or discriminatory measures that would impair the legally acquired rights or interests within its territories of nationals and companies of the other party. * * *

"Property of nationals and companies of either Party shall not be * * * [expropriated] except for a public purpose, nor shall it be taken without the prompt payment of just compensation. Such compensation shall be in an effectively realizable form and shall represent the full equivalent of the property taken * * *.

"Enterprises which nationals and companies of either Party are permitted to establish or acquire within the territories of the other Party, shall be permitted freely to conduct their activities therein, upon terms of no less favorable than other enterprises of whatever nationality engaged in similar activities. Such nationals and companies shall enjoy the rights to continued control and management of such enterprises and to do all other things necessary or incidental to the effective conduct of their affairs * * *.

"Nationals and companies of either Party shall be accorded by the other Party national treatment and most-favored-nation treatment with respect to payments, remittances and transfers of funds or financial instruments between * * * [their] territories."

This treaty guarantees nondiscriminatory treatment to established enterprises, but is considerably less concerned with "establishment," which is covered merely by a most-favored-nation provision. In this respect, the Secretary of State has suggested that "this treaty resembles most nearly" the commercial treaties with Ethiopia and Iran. The Secretary also observes that, like our other commercial treaties, this agreement "contains assurances relating to personal freedoms, property rights, rights with respect to business activities, exchange regulation, taxation, treatment of imports and exports, and other [relevant] matters."

Article V of the convention wtih France guarantees the rights and nondiscriminatory treatment of American business firms operating in France. It provides that "nationals and companies shall be permitted * * * (a) to establish and to maintain branches, agencies, offices, factories, and other establishments appropriate to the conduct of their business; (b) to organize companies under the general company laws of such other High Contracting Party, and to acquire majority interests in companies of such other High Contracting Party; (c) to control and manage the enterprises which they have established or acquired.

"Moreover, the enterprises which they control * * * shall * * * be accorded treatment no less favorable than that accorded * * * [locally controlled] enterprises * * *

"Both parties oblige themselves not to intensify * * * existing limitations as regards enterprises belonging to or controlled by nationals and companies of the other High Contracting Parties."

Other provisions dealing with exchange regulation, taxation, personal freedoms, and entry rights are roughly comparable to other commercial treaties that the United States is a party to; this convention is the 19th in a series that has been negotiated by the United States since 1946.

As the Secretary of State observes in his letter of transmittal to the President, "the most notable difference between the present treaty and other recent commercial treaties is the absence from the former of provisions dealing specifically with the exchange of goods and with navigation. As concerns the exchange of goods," the Secretary explains, "France, like a number of other European countries, is reluctant to enter into new long-term commitments, in view of the new problems created and new approaches necessitated by the incidence of the various economic integration projects * * *. As regards navigation, France desired to retain without change certain regulations that favor French shipping over foreign shipping."

As with the Pakistan treaty, the term of the convention with France is 10 years, after which it can be terminated on 1 year's written notice by either party to the other. For the present, its provisions cover only metropolitan France and the oversea departments, but under article XV it may later be extended to cover other territories and member states of the French Community.

COMMITTEE ACTION

The treaties were transmitted to the Senate on April 6, 1960. On June 21, 1960, the Committee on Foreign Relations examined the treaties in public session. The witness for the Department of State was Mr. Edwin M. Martin, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs. (See appendix.)

Mr. Martin stated that the two treaties differed from the others in the series principally because of a certain few absent provisions. Owing to special circumstances in both countries it was decided to omit the navigation provision. As for commerce, he further stated that "we found the French Government quite reluctant to enter into obligations in this field because of * * * [developments] in the European Economic Community which will be affecting their trade policies in a number of respects which are difficult to foresee at this time * * *. We felt that our interest in the evolution of the six is a great one, and it was on the whole, best not to press them on this."

One of the members asked whether any provision of either treaty would alter the "existing tax liability of American companies" doing business abroad. Mr. Martin answered in the negative.

The committee also explored the question of whether either treaty in any way altered or enlarged the power of the Federal Government inside the United States so far as the rights of States or individuals were concerned. The Department's answer was that "these treaties do not alter established Federal-State relations or enlarge Federal powers at the expense of the States."

The committee received a communication from the National Foreign Trade Council, Inc., which supported the convention with France and expressed no opposition to the treaty with Pakistan.

COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION

The committee, after reviewing the two treaties, believes that each will broaden the opportunity for American individuals and businesses abroad to conduct their affairs in an effective manner. The committee, therefore, recommends that the Senate give its advice and consent to the ratification of the pending treaty.

APPENDIX

STATEMENT BY EDWIN M. MARTIN, DEPUTY ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC AFFAIRS CONCERNING A TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP AND COMMERCE WITH PAKISTAN (SIGNED NOVEMBER 12, 1959) AND A CONVENTION OF ESTABLISHMENT WITH FRANCE (SIGNED NOVEMBER 25, 1959), JUNE 21, 1960

Mr. Chairman, I am appearing before the committee in support of the Treaty of Friendship and Commerce With Pakistan (S. Ex. F) and the Convention of Establishment With France (S. Ex. G). These treaties, although differing from other agreements of the type as to official designation and somewhat as to content, are units in the series of commercial treaties initiated by this Government shortly after the Second World War. They constitute, respectively, the 18th and 19th signed treaties in this series.

These treaties, aside from certain omissions, conform to the general pattern of the usual U.S. commercial treaty, numerous examples of which have received Senate approval in recent years. Their broad objectives are the same: to encourage investment and commerce, and to provide an agreed basis for the protection of American citizens, their property and other interests in foreign countries. Their provisions are based upon existing precedents, and contain no innovations raising problems as to their effect upon domestic law.

What are regarded as the principal features of these treaties are referred to in the report of the Secretary of State that accompanies each treaty. To supplement and amplify that material, the Department has prepared a paragraph-by-paragraph summary, which indicates the very considerable degree of correspondence between the provisions of these treaties and provisions in the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation Between the United States and the Netherlands, signed March 27, 1956, approved by the Senate July 11, 1956, and now in force. I offer this tabulation for the record. I also offer for the record an up-to-date list of the commercial treaties negotiated under the current program, and of commercial treaties negotiated prior to the initiation of the current program and now in force.

The treaty with Pakistan is regarded as falling particularly within the terms of congressional policy expressed in section 413 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended. That section provides that the President "shall accelerate a program of negotiating treaties for commerce and trade * * * which shall include provisions to encourage and facilitate the flow of private investment to nations participating in programs under this act." Pakistan has long participated extensively in such programs. The aim of the treaty is to help to assure conditions favorable to foreign private investment. The signature of this treaty is only one of a number of steps recently taken by the Government of Pakistan looking to promotion of the economic development of the country. Others include a treaty for the avoidance of double taxation, an investment guaranty agreement, and several domestic measures, of which special mention may be made of provision for the exemption, in certain circumstances, of new investment from taxation for a period of years. The completion of this treaty would seem to add a fitting keystone to the steps the two countries have taken in cooperation to give Pakistan a satisfactory basis for economic growth. It is hoped that acceptance of the treaty by Pakistan will facilitate negotiations for similar treaties with other countries in southern Asia.

France, of course, being a highly industrialized country, is not now in great need of the basic requirements of economic development. It constitutes, however, an attractive field for the establishment of American investment and trading enterprises, and a growing group of French enterprises operate in the United States. The treaty provides the type of assurances that are regarded as advantageous to such enterprises. In this connection may be mentioned especially the matter of rights of employment, particularly of personnel essential to an enterprise. Heretofore, in the absence of a commercial treaty, French enterprises in the United States have not enjoyed the advantages provided by the Immigration Act with regard to treaty traders and treaty investors. France does not, of course, restrict immigration in the same manner as the United States. Entry into France is relatively free, but employment of aliens is highly restricted through a system of work permits. In the provisions of the treaty and the accompanying "Joint Declaration," a sincere effort has been made to assure that Americans will be able to obtain work permits in France to an extent fully commensurate with the rights of entry and employment that accrue to French nationals under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

Two other aspects of the convention with France are worthy of note. First, the establishment of the European Economic Community has given rise to concern as to the possibility of preferential treatment of the interests of member countries, to the disadvantage of the interests of nonmembers. The Rome treaty contemplates the extension by each member state of a considerable degree of national treatment to enterprises established under the laws of other members. Therefore, treaties such as this convention with France, which assure national treatment to U.S. enterprises with respect to establishment and the carrying on of a wide range of activities, should have the effect also of contributing to favorable treatment of certain types of U.S. enterprises throughout the Community. Moreover, the United States will have, upon the completion of this treaty with France, treaties with the four largest members of the Community (the others are Italy, the Federal Republic of Germany, and the Netherlands), which contain extensive assurances of nondiscriminatory treatment for American enterprises.

The other aspect has to do with this Government's policies directed to reaffirming and strengthening the principles of international law concerning the property rights and other rights of aliens. Persons concerned with the problems of foreign investment, not only in this country but throughout the world, are disturbed at the lack of respect shown for private property interest from time to time in many areas. Treaty assurances are widely regarded as an important means of preventing such disrespect. The formal endorsement by France of the property-protection rules expressed in our treaties, particularly that regarding just compensation for property taken for public use, serves as a significant and timely reinforcement of our own efforts in this regard. We cannot consider subscription to these principles as a duty of the less developed countries alone; the readiness of the more developed countries to set a good example by incorporating these rules in agreements between themselves is a very important consideration in establishing them as worldwide standards of conduct.

I should now like to refer briefly to the principal omissions I mentioned at the beginning of my statement. Neither of these treaties contain provisions on shipping. Such provisions are to be found in all the other treaties in the current series, but there are precedents for such omissions in earlier agreements. In the case of Pakistan, we are dealing with a young nation that has not yet settled fully its policies on all matters related to international relations. One of the country's serious problems concerns transportation and communications between East Pakistan and West Pakistan. Government officials in Pakistan have taken the position that it would be advantageous to their country if a common coasting trade could be established for Pakistan, India, and Ceylon, in which vessels of all three countries could participate on equal terms, but with vessels of all other countries excluded. They wished to include a reservation in the treaty to permit such an arrangement. According to U.S. policy, such a system would constitute discrimination in international trade, and it was felt that such a reservation would establish an undesirable precedent in our treaties. Hence, it was decided to omit the shipping provisions. Pakistan does not now discriminate against foreign shipping in any way, except to favor national vessels in the coasting trade when such vessels are available.

In case of France, certain existing arrangements favor French national shipping. An agreement with Tunisia limits trade between the two countries to Tunisian and French vessels, thus continuing the situation prevailing before Tunisian independence. In addition, French vessels are favored in the importation of a very limited number of commodities into France. The French Government concluded that it could not undertake to abandon these arrangements at the present time. Again, in order to avoid seeming to compromise with discriminatory practices, the Department concluded that it would be best to drop navigation provisions from the treaty. Representatives of U.S. shipping interests have in the past advised the Department that they preferred no treaty commitments on shipping to commitments that departed in any way from the usual assurances of nondiscrimination. It is understood that the French practices above referred to do not in fact affect injuriously U.S. shipping interests at the present time, and that the French Government, through the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, has joined in a policy of not extending existing discriminatory practices.

There have also been omitted from the treaty with France the reciprocal commitments to accord most-favored-nation treatment to imports and exports, and the usual ancillary provisions relating to trade in goods. These provisions in our treaties are comparable to provisions in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and are consequently not regarded as essential in treaties with countries that are parties to the General Agreement, as is the case with France. Along with other governments in Western Europe, the French Government is much preoccupied with developments in connection with the European Economic Community, and is reluctant to enter into long-term engagements on trade matters for fear of resulting difficulties for the European integration plans. A similar attitude was encountered in the Netherlands negotiation in 1955–56, but was satisfactorily solved through a special arrangement incorporated in an exchange of notes. This type of solution was not acceptable to the French, and it was mutually agreed not to attempt to negotiate new trade provisions in connection with this treaty.

That completes my prepared statement, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no amendment to be offered, without objection, the pending conventions and treaty will be considered as having been passed through their various parliamentary stages up to the point of the consideration of the resolutions of ratification.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, that applies to all three treaties?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It applies to all three treaties.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that immediately following the vote on the Holland amendment to the unfinished business, we have two rollcalls on the three treaties, one rollcall on Executive D, Calendar No. 13 on the Executive Calendar, and to have Executive Calendars Nos. 14 and 15, Executive F and Executive G, voted on en bloc by one rollcall. I make that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if there are any Members of the Senate who desire to speak at this time, they may be recognized. If not, we will proceed to the consideration of the Holland amendment to S. 3758, the unfinished business.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KUCHEL. The minority members of the Foreign Relations Committee are now being contacted to determine whether any of them wish to discuss these treaties.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I think the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee will agree with me that the treaties were reported to the Senate by the committee unanimously and have the full approval of the administration.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, can we have the yeas and nays ordered on the treaties by two rollcalls? I make that request.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and ask that the time be charged equally to both sides.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I yield 20 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER].

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the pending order of business is a bill which purports to raise the standard of living for millions of American people. The tragedy of this proposed legislation is that, if adopted, it actually will hurt the very persons it claims to help. Instead of creating new job opportunities and increasing wages, it will actually eliminate a large number of jobs now available. For those who continue to work, it offers a reduction in real wages.

Is this idea so unrealistic?

Let us take a look at what happens when we artificially raise the minimum wage without regard to productivity. In the first place, imposition of a minimum wage or raising the existing minimum wage eliminates the lowest grade of workers. When these workers are forced out of the labor market because they cannot earn the statutory minimum wage, there is no place for them to go.

In the second place, the minimum wage imposes price rigidity and makes it more difficult to utilize labor skills to the best possible advantage.

Therefore, labor itself ultimately suffers.

Let us take an example of how this works in the field of agriculture. Citrus pickers work on a piece-rate basis; in 1959 this average rate was about $1.15 an hour. This figure, however, includes some people who earn only 65 cents an hour and others who earn more than $1.50 an hour. The average then covers persons with varying degrees of abilities and aptitudes. Raising the wage rate so as to compensate all in excess of the average will eliminate all those who do not meet a minimum standard of production even though they might be the very ones who need the work the most. Generally speaking, this will be the pattern throughout the economy. Those workers whose jobs require the least training will be those who are most adversely affected by a higher minimum wage. For example, in the food industry wage increases unrelated to productivity have decreased the number of people employed. This industry has become so mechanized that a small number of employees is able to produce a very large volume of retail sales.

Likewise, in the painting business increases in labor costs have caused a marked increase in "do-it-yourself" painting. The National Paint, Varnish, and Lacquer Association has made annual studies of the amount of paint applied to dwellings which show that more than one-half the paint used for this purpose is applied by individual homeowners.

It is a basic fact that wage increases which are not accompanied by increases in productivity will add fuel to the fires of inflation.

There is no way of adjusting wages without adding directly to inflation unless such increases reflect increased productivity. Prices go up because there is more money than there are goods and services. Adding to wages at that point places still more money in circulation without a compensating increase in the volume of goods and services. This simply piles more money on top of more money in circulation, and the inescapable effect is a direct and immediate increase in the price level.

Increases in prices in the Washington area within the last month have been so general that it makes one wonder if, locally, our people are better off with the wage increase recently granted Government workers.

If it can be shown that increases in productivity will permit wage increases, then the wage increases may be granted.

The steady upward movement of wages has brought a steady decrease in employment per unit of output for American industry. It has frequently been the case in the automobile industry; many jobs that the strikers leave are eliminated by mechanization. There is a limit to how far manufacturers and competition can go in raising prices. To keep prices within that limit they must resort to more mechanization. While in the long run mechanization is going to improve our standard of living, in the short run it will bring some degree of readjustment and worker displacement. Forcing increases in wages too rapidly merely accelerates the pressure for increased mechanization. If this process takes place too quickly more workers are displaced than would normally be absorbed by the expansion of industry.

Technically, we could expect any mechanization to free workers for jobs produced by industrial expansion. If too many people are freed at one time, industry does not expand fast enough to mop up that little pocket of unemployment. If we develop, as we are now doing, little pockets of unemployment throughout the country, we are going to have a rather high degree of distress until industry has soaked up these pockets of unemployment one by one. Thus, unquestionably the effect of this bill we are considering today, rather than creating jobs and increasing wages will be to have exactly the opposite effect. For many, it will be to pick the pocket of the worker and place him in a pocket of unemployment.

Using figures that were produced from a study made by the University of Michigan which showed that after the last increase of the minimum wage there was an increase in unemployment, I stated in the Senate the other night that the increase was in the general area of about 4.5 percent. We add to that study the report made by the Secretary of Labor that was required by the bill the last time it was amended. The Department of Labor admits that there was an increase in unemployment. However, they do not give a percentage or a figure. If we apply the 4.5 percent to the same 24 million people who will be covered if the bill is enacted, we find an unemployment figure exceeding 1 million.

I do not accept the figure of the University of Michigan as being one that we can apply generally across the land, but I do think the figure would be approximately half that amount. It is on that basis that I made the statement the other evening that if the Kennedy bill is passed I expect a half million people to become unemployed, within 3 to 4 months after its effect is felt in the retail industry. I do not think that statement can be successfully disputed. I think the statement of the Department of Labor as to the effects on this last raise and the study made by the University of Michigan are significant. Also added to this study are some small figures from Pennsylvania, which I think specify too small a pattern to be accepted as anything substantial.

It is that simple. If unearned wages are forced upon industry, mechanization will be the inevitable result if industry is to survive. If this occurs simultaneously throughout the Nation, displacement is too rapid, causing widespread unemployment. The reason this country has grown so rapidly in the past is that this process has been allowed to flow naturally and the process has been more gradual. Jobs have emerged approximately as rapidly as mechanization made people available. Along with unemployment, other adverse economic effects such as featherbedding develop.

There is always a group of workers who are marginal. If those workers' wages are arbitrarily increased it no longer pays to hire them. Almost all featherbedding is the response to mechanical improvements. Theoretically, when people are forced out through mechanization they become available for other kinds of work; those who are competent workers do. Those who are inherently marginal may never work again and will merely swell our public assistance cost.

There is another factor involving employment that proponents of the measure seem to forget. When a wholesaler or manufacturer is faced with an increased cost, he can meet such increase by increasing his prices. If he has an increased labor cost, he can handle it by mechanization or layoffs. When a retailer is faced with an increased cost today, the only reduction of cost a retailer can make is in his labor cost area. We shall find what I have been relating to be particularly true in the retail industry. The first workers to be laid off will be the marginal workers—the older persons who wish to work only a few hours a week, perhaps one night a week; the young girl who is waiting to be married, and who wants to work a little during the week; and the student who works after school. Those are the types of marginal workers who will go off the retailer's payroll. As I have related several times on the floor of the Senate, the retailers of the country today, with modern vending machines, can sell almost everything in a store by means of such devices, except items which must to fitted before they are sold.

In some areas where population is highly concentrated the situation I have described is already reaching such proportions that the economy's vitality is being sapped. People have been forced out of work or have found the work that they are prepared to do no longer available and have gone on the public assistance rolls. Thus, they constitute a major source of city and State financial hazards.

Without naming the State, there is one State in the Union in which that particular factor is probably a major contribution to all its troubles.

It is difficult for me to understand why in the days of the stiffest competition for world markets this Nation has ever faced, a major effort is now being made to make it just that much more difficult for us to compete. All over the world, little by little, we are pricing ourselves out of the markets of foreign countries. Every place we turn, British, German, Swiss, and Italian equipment is being installed, displacing American equipment.

I invite the attention of my colleagues to the fact that one of our largest typewriter manufacturers went out of business and was absorbed by an Italian firm, because the Italian competition could not be met in this country. Such development is increasingly taking place with respect to other machinery similar to typewriters, such as calculating machines. We see more and more foreign cars on our streets. We see more and more items of wearing apparel being brought in from Italy, France, China, the Philippines, Japan, and even our own little area of Puerto Rico.

We are steadily losing our share of the automobile market in those countries that do not themselves produce automobiles. For example, last year in Costa Rica almost no equipment was bought from the United States. It is often accepted that we cannot compete with the low income of other countries, yet our industrial genius has been in manufacturing—particularly in that type of manufacturing which is based on the concept of an assembly line. We are no longer able to keep our place internationally with the kind of manufacturing in which we are supposed to have the greatest inherent advantage. More and more there is a tendency for heavy installations, particularly power generators, to be made with equipment from other countries. For example, the Los Angeles Department of Water and Power has two Swiss-made generators. The difficulty there was not a matter of different wage rates but of the inability of our own domestic company to quote a firm price.

I recall that some time last year or the year before the State of New York accepted a bid from an Italian steel firm to furnish steel poles for a transmission line in New York. The domestic manufacturer had escalator clauses that would have added 50 percent to the total price of the installation if wage rates had gone up. The bid from abroad was firm. I refer now, not to the steel poles I mentioned, but to the generators used by Los Angeles.

If we do not find a way to utilize our own factors of production more economically, we are going to find ourselves almost completely cut out of foreign markets and to those who doubt the validity of this statement or the seriousness of the problem, I wish to say that for the third straight year this Nation has an unfavorable balance of trade. It means that we are importing more than we are exporting.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I would like the RECORD to show at this time a matter which I am sure the Senator recalls, that the Mitsubishi firm in Japan, competing against our own manufacturers in bidding to supply electric locomotives for our own very highly prized installation at the Panama Canal, was able to underbid us so greatly as to overcome the three differentials in favor of American manufacturers which are embraced in our law, and to secure the contract for the supplying of a large number of electric locomotives to tow ships through the Panama Canal. This event happened only a few months ago. Does the Senator recall that incident?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes; I recall that transaction vividly. It was only one of a long list of similar cases we might cite. However, I think we should make perfectly clear that our object should be not to reduce wages to meet competition from abroad, but at the same time I think we should recognize that wages raised through Government fiat or raised unnaturally cause far more damage to our position in the world markets than the lower wage rates of foreign countries.

Those wage rates in foreign countries are going up. They are beginning to come up, certainly, in Germany, Belgium, and Italy. As they reach our standard of living, or approach our standard of living, the difference in the wage scale is going to disappear. Our Federal Government should certainly not, by fiat, force wage increases which are not won by productivity.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield briefly?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not true that none of the service industries or retail establishments with which the Holland amendment concerns itself is engaged in producing either goods or services for the foreign trade, or is in competition with foreign commodities?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No; that would not be exactly true. Many retailers are engaged in manufacturing. I admit it is to a limited extent, but I would not want to state what percentage would be covered by the Holland amendment. It would be a sizable amount. I do not like to refer constantly to my own experience. However, I was engaged in manufacturing while I was a retailer, and I was selling manufactured articles outside the country. It would certainly apply to my establishment, and it would apply to many others. The effect is there, whether it is direct or not, if the retailer must raise prices to the consumer. In that way the effect of foreign competition will be felt, because as the wage earner in industry is paid more for the goods that are sold, he must bargain for higher wages, and the manufacturer, who has to pay those higher wages, will be placed in an unnatural position as it relates to foreign competition.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. It is not true that in the record of the hearings on the pending bill there is testimony by Mr. Meany and Mr. Greenberg, both highly influential and representative officials of labor organizations, that they regard the minimum wage as the key, as the base, for negotiated contracts, all of which are above that figure?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes; Mr. Meany and Mr. Greenberg both testified that the minimum wage is the basis upon which they base negotiations. If we raise wages under the plan of the Kennedy bill a little bit each year, it will result in negotiations in the same year by the unions for higher hourly wages in industry.

Therefore, we create not only an unnatural wage in retailing and services, but we also create additional unnatural wages in industry.

Again let me make my position perfectly clear. I believe a man in this country should be paid what he can earn. If it is $100 an hour or $200 an hour, he should be paid that amount. However, I do not believe that we should attempt to pay a man $2 an hour if he is worth only $1 an hour.

I believe that industrywide bargaining, for example, is a danger in our economy, because it destroys initiative. It does not force one man to make himself better in order to earn more than his shopmate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield such additional time to the Senator from Arizona as he may require.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Across-the-board raises do the same thing. When a raise is earned by a man who has increased productivity, he should be given that raise. If a factory or a shop increases productivity, it might be because everyone in it contributed to it, and everyone would have the right to the same raise. However, when their wages are raised without having added to productivity, we create unnatural wages which add to the problems of Americans at home and abroad.

We hear a great deal about the need for humanitarian judgment in setting wage rates, and yet wage rates are set competitively. We don't set wage rates because we like to be kind to people. We do the best we can to build flourishing businesses with the full assurance that flourishing businesses provide attractive employment opportunities. If we concentrate largely on increased wage rates then our business flourishes less abundantly. Every time the Government intervenes we get one more rigid factor added to the cost of doing business. What we need is less rigidity. Free prices in open markets constitute our best approach to maximizing our own domestic welfare. Whenever the Government intervenes we have fewer opportunities to manipulate our factors of production to the greatest efficiency.

The real challenge this Nation faces is an internal one and the first consideration should be the containment of inflation. As long as inflation is not contained the price relationships are upset and, consequently, businesses suffer. If we contain inflation our biggest economic challenge is going to be a challenge of marketing. A generation ago the management which could improve manufacturing efficiency had the answer to the Nation's problems. Now we are able to manufacture a wide and varied line of consumer and producer goods but we are not able to market what we can make. If we are ever to improve our marketing techniques and contain inflation, then we will have a happy economic future.

Our forecast today should be not that there will be an immediate major boom in the economy: there are too many indications that there will not be one, because we have not earned it. But there is no reason why, with advanced technology and increased productivity, we cannot continue to maintain our standard of living which is the highest the world has ever known. We have this because the capitalistic system we have is the best the world has ever seen. It produces abundantly and the abundance is distributed to the workers. Our country's wealth is distributed to our workers in direct relation to each man's ability and how he uses it. To upset this principle is to upset the very reason for the success of this Nation.

Mr. President, in closing, I reiterate now, as I will at every opportunity I have, that the great danger to the security of this country and to the security of the free world is that we are more and more swallowing the bait that the Federal Government can do things better than the people of this country.

We are traveling down the precise road that Babylon and Egypt and Greece and Rome were following when they collapsed.

I do not fear our enemies abroad. I fear the people within the boundaries of this country who are succumbing more and more to the siren call with respect to the Federal Government; that we do not have to work to live; we do not have any responsibility to our children; we have no responsibility to take care of our fathers and mothers in their old age; that the Federal Government can do it better. If we continue down this very dangerous road, whose signposts are clear, and the end of which road is clearly known to every thinking person in this country, we will wind up as the other civilizations and governments in history have wound up—bankrupt and defunct.

It is with this thought in mind that I have been arguing against the Kennedy bill, because the Kennedy bill contains many dangerous gimmicks which will transfer more power into the hands of the Federal Government, and take them away from American business and from the American people.

I thank my friend from Florida for yielding time to me.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for two questions?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Would not the pending amendment of the Senator from Florida practically remove the extended coverage from the bill?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes, it would. It would keep things in status quo, so far as coverage is concerned.

Mr. CLARK. Would not that result in a repudiation of both the Republican and Democratic national platforms?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have to admit that it would; but I am one who went before my party's platform committee and said they should reject such a plank in the platform. So I am in the position of one who has no platform except the platform of principle.

Mr. CLARK. I am not criticizing the Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I think the question asked by the Senator from Pennsylvania was a little broad. The pending amendment offered by the Senator from Florida contains, without change, the exemptions for retail trade and service establishments within State lines, as they are in existing law, and as they were included in the original law of 1938; but it does not strike certain other fields of extension of coverage out of the proposal which is before the Senate.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. As I understand—and the Senator, I know, will correct me if I am wrong—if the Holland amendment were adopted, there would still be an extension of coverage to some 280,000 additional employees. In what categories do they fall?

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct; it is approximately that number. I think the major number of them would be those engaged in operating urban transit vehicles, and the like. They are not covered by the committee amendment.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. My recollection is that four fields included within the bill are not affected by the pending amendment: The first one, referred to by the Senator from Arizona, is local transportation employees; second, fish processing employees; third, employees of telephone exchanges, excluding only exchanges which have less than 750 telephones; fourth, seamen on American-flag vessels.

Mr. KEATING. Do those categories appear in the report?

Mr. HOLLAND. They appear in the report.

I simply wish to make it clear that there are certain classifications of added coverage not affected in any way by my amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Are we then in accord that the bill as it was reported by the committee would expand the coverage to approximately 5 million additional workers, but that if the Holland amendment prevails, the figure of 5 million will be reduced to about 250,000?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is substantially correct in that statement.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. As I understand, the time is controlled. I ask the majority leader if he will yield 10 minutes to me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I was attempting to get recognition. Normally, the practice is for the Presiding Officer to recognize the majority leader. Since the time is under control,

I should like to yield 8 minutes to the Senator from Connecticut, if I may.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is correct. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized for 8 minutes.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, this week we have an opportunity to raise to a more just level the wages of many of our less fortunate workers and thereby to do something that is morally right, economically sound and constitutionally justified.

Several million Americans are today laboring for a wage which we in this country must consider beneath any reasonable standard of justice and decency.

There are 2½ million people already covered by our Federal minimum wage law whose hourly wage is approximately $1 an hour, the legal minimum. Their wages have stagnated at that point since 1956, despite the 20-percent increase in the average wage of the great majority of American workers, despite the 15-percent rise in national productivity since 1956, and despite the 10-percent rise in the cost of living.

There are additional millions, principally in the retail and service industries, who are worse off even than these, because they have no minimum wage law protection at all and hence frequently receive less than $1 an hour, without time and a half for overtime.

In the city of New York, in the apparel industry alone, there are 35,000 workers who depend upon the Fair Labor Standards Act to protect their wages. At the present time, these people are living on, and many of them trying to support families on $40 a week, the legal minimum. And the plight of those who are not given this modest protection, those who are outside the Fair Labor Standards Act, is far greater. Fifty percent of all workers in the retail trades are earning less than $1.25 per hour. Twenty-five percent earn less than $1 an hour and there are 10 percent earning less than 75 cents. Think of that in this land of abundance.

These are the forgotten men and women of our time. The onward march of American economic life has passed them by. Their position is declining as normal inflation slowly takes from them even that little which they have. Lacking in skills, living in labor surplus areas, working in industries that are not organized by labor unions, they are forced to accept a wage that has no relationship to human need, to the concept of a just wage or to the dignity of honest labor.

The continuance of this situation is a disgrace to our country and a standing reproach to its lawmakers, whether they be on the State or National level.

What can we do about it?

We can do something about it by passing the pending bill. We can raise the Federal minimum wage to $1.25 an hour. We can extend its protection to 5 million workers not now covered in our larger department stores, chainstores, laundries, and service industries.

Some of our friends in this body say that we should do nothing about this situation. They maintain that this is a question beyond our competence and outside of our legitimate area of concern. They argue that the free system, with its voluntary wage arrangement between workers and employers, is the proper answer to this problem and that where that answer proves inadequate, the State legislature, not the Congress, is the proper resort.

But the fact that the problem of substandard wages is yet with us, is so widespread, and is growing worse instead of improving, is proof that private bargaining between management and labor is sometimes inadequate to meet the just demands of the weakest, least organized group of workers in our country.

Sometimes the bargaining position of workers is so weak that they are subject to exploitation. And a study of the State statutes in this field, which is digested in the tables on pages 57 through 62 of the committee hearings, shows plainly that the State legislatures either cannot or will not solve the problem. There are 20 States that have no minimum wage whatever. And many of the others have laws that are 20 or 30 years behind the times.

It has been frequently asked in this debate whether those who favor Federal minimum wage legislation believe that the State legislatures are less competent than we to judge what the minimum wage in their States should be. I do not hesitate for a moment to say that, on the record, the facts prove that the State legislatures of our country are either not competent or not able or not willing to deal adequately with the problem of the minimum wage and that having failed to do so, they have made it incumbent upon the Congress of the United States to act in a field in which it is given jurisdiction by the Constitution and in which it has legislated repeatedly in the past.

The legislation now before us, the Fair Labor Standard Amendments of 1960, proposes to raise the minimum wage now in effect to $1.25 an hour in three stages, beginning in January 1961 at $1.15 per hour. This legislation would also extend coverage to 5 million men and women, most of them in the retail and service industries, and thereby guarantee to these workers time and a half for overtime work and a minimum wage starting at $1 an hour next year and gradually increasing to $1.25 in the fourth year.

The cost of living varies somewhat from section to section of our country, but there is no section where the cost of living is so low that a minimum wage of $1.25 per hour can support more than a minimum standard of living.

Therefore, I consider the bill to be a modest and conservative bill. The committee in drafting it has leaned over backward to moderate the impact of these wage increases upon our economy and to protect the businesses concerned from harmful effects.

The committee bill graduates the increase over several years in order to have the slightest possible inflationary effect and to allow employers to adjust gradually. And I might add that an analysis of the past three minimum wage bills in Congress, each of which contained a larger increase than the present bill, indicates that the inflationary effect of such legislation is negligible.

This bill exempts from coverage those establishments which, because of their small size, might be damaged by the wage increases called for. We do not help workers by requiring wages that would force small marginal concerns out of business, and the bill seeks to avoid that. No establishment grossing less than $1 million is covered unless it be part of a chainstore operation grossing more than $1 million. Here again the record demonstrates, as found in the study made by the U.S. Department of Labor following the 1956 increase in the minimum wage, that the increase resulted in neither unemployment nor decline in business for the industries affected.

And so we are not dealing here with small, local businesses. We are not dealing with the family grocery store or the corner drugstore or the town barbershop. We are dealing with businesses that gross $1 million a year, businesses that are "going concerns" and are therefore economically able as well as morally bound to pay a minimum decent wage to their workers. We are demanding in this bill not an ideal wage, not a just wage, not an adequate wage, but the minimum wage necessary to sustain life in a manner in which there is some dignity, some satisfaction of basic needs, and some hope for the future.

There are three byproducts of this minimum wage increase which are, in my judgment, highly desirable.

The first is the effect it will have on increases in wages which are slightly above the legal minimum. Many workers who are scraping along on slightly better than $1.15 an hour will have their pay increased as those rates under that level are increased. I believe, however, that such increases will be generally limited to the lowest paid workers. I do not think that the skilled worker getting $3 an hour is going to be raised, thus tending toward inflation, because someone way down at the bottom of the scale goes up from $1 to $1.15. But those immediately above the minimum will probably be raised and ought to be raised.

The second fortunate byproduct of this bill will be the improved competitive position of the businessman who pays a decent minimum wage but who must compete with businesses that do not. One of the evil things about substandard wages is that they tend to place at a disadvantage those businessmen who conscientiously try to pay a fair wage but who must nonetheless compete. This bill will make it easier for enlightened employers to pay a just wage.

Third, an increase in the minimum wage will improve the position of those States which pay fair wages but must compete for markets and for industries with those States in which a just wage is frequently not paid. Like other legislators from New England, I have seen industries leave my State, throwing thousands of our people out of work in order to establish operations in an area where the average wage and the minimum wage were far beneath Connecticut levels.

I do not resent the loss of industry for legitimate reasons—for reasons of geography or transportation or access to markets or proximity to sources of raw materials. We all must take our chances in that kind of fair competition, and each State has its legitimate advantages and disadvantages. But the use of substandard wages and sweatshop conditions as an incentive to lure industries away from high wage areas is a practice which is deplorable, which is unjust, and which is bad for the country. This bill will remedy that injustice to some extent, and that is an additional reason for supporting it.

I support this bill because I want to see the millions of workers earning substandard wages brought back into the mainstream of American economic progress in this decade. I shall vote for this bill because I want to see the Congress carry out its duty in a field allowed to it by the Constitution and the courts, and in a manner which has been marked out for us by three previous Congresses over a 22-year period.

Some of our colleagues have raised the point that this bill represents a departure from previous legislation, in that, by including the retail and service industries, we leave the field of interstate commerce, and enter the field of local commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. DODD. I wonder whether I may have an additional few minutes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I shall arrogate to myself, for the time being, the power to act as majority leader, and I yield 3 additional minutes to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized for 3 additional minutes.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I believe that the jurisdiction of the Federal Government over the enterprises covered in this bill has already been amply demonstrated by previous laws—the pure food and drug laws, the Wool Products Labeling Act, the Sherman Act, the Federal Trade Commission Act, and the Taft-Hartley Act. These laws, and a large number of court decisions interpreting them, have satisfied me that this bill operates in a field in which the Federal Government has the right and the duty to act to prevent abuses.

I congratulate the Labor Committee for the bill which it has reported. And I commend our distinguished colleague from Massachusetts, Senator KENNEDY, for the courageous and effective leadership he has given in this field.

He has taken on a task which perhaps, politically speaking, will do him more harm than good. Most of those who will be helped by this bill may never be aware that Senator KENNEDY led the fight in their behalf. They do not belong to organizations which keep them informed about congressional activities. They are not among those who generally pay careful attention to public affairs. They are in the income group which seldom goes to the polls to vote. I have received almost no mail at all from this group on a matter which is of vital importance to them. But on the other side is a large, highly organized, highly vocal group of merchants and businessmen who are influential in their communities, who are aware of what we are doing here, and to whom this bill is the most important and unpopular piece of legislation of this Congress.

I have received a large amount of mail from this group, and many personal visits. This is highly proper, and I mention it only to indicate that there is a tremendous amount of organized and grassroots pressure from national and local interests against this bill. Senator KENNEDY may pay a high price at the polls for championing the rights of the underpaid and underprivileged workers of this country.

I hope that those who can study this question objectively, who have no personal stake involved, will appreciate the high-mindedness and the dedication which have caused Senator KENNEDY to lead this fight. He has, through his eloquence, his courage, and his thorough mastery of this question, again demonstrated the qualities which will enable him to lead this Nation across the new frontiers of which he has so nobly spoken.

This bill is good for America. It is good for the working people of America. It is good for the economy of America. It is good for the conscience of America. I urge its passage; and I congratulate those who have fought for it in committee and on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, has the Senator from Connecticut concluded his remarks?

Mr. DODD. I have; and I thank the majority leader for yielding this much time to me.

LATIN AMERICA

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield some time to me

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 15 minutes to the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, as might be expected, I am of course wholly in accord with the objectives of the President's new program for Latin America.

I have until now, however, withheld my comments on the program, awaiting some more precise definition and description of the means to be employed.

I now find, following the joint appearance before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, on Monday, of Under Secretary of State Dillon and Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, T. Graydon Upton, that the program of the administration has a rather familiar ring to it.

It ought to. During the last half-dozen years I have myself proposed the major part of it.

Unfortunately, in nearly every case, my proposals were received by this administration either with a yawn or with open hostility. Although against this opposition, I nonetheless had a measure of legislative success with my proposals, sad to say, in nearly every instance my programs fell into unfriendly hands and were quickly put on ice.

The administration has shown little willingness to fight for appropriations to put these programs into effect. Indeed, it has resisted them openly or quietly or simply ignored them. Now an attempt is being made to identify the administration's proposals with "Operation Pan America," first suggested by President Juscelino Kubitschek, of Brazil. Yet it is clear that, although it never directly turned down Mr. Kubitschek, the administration was more than cool to this plan when originally proposed.

These charges are extremely serious in nature. I feel obliged, therefore, to offer the following documentation, not for the sake of saying "I told you so," but because a full recitation of the background is required if we are to deal in the proper context with the President's program.

For a number of years, I have been arguing that our failure to attend closely to the needs and interests of the 20 Latin American Republics was bringing about an everwidening gap between us.

In a speech delivered on the floor of the Senate in May of 1954, I stated:

> Our attitude toward our sister republics in this hemisphere is a striking example of our shortsightedness in our present foreign policy. So preoccupied are we with problems in Europe and Asia that we often forget how vital are our relations with our neighbors to the south. The pattern of events in Indochina and our belated response to them may well serve as a warning in our relations with Latin America. Mr. President, are we repeating that failure in Latin America?

Sad to say, the answer was yes. My words went unheeded.

Later, in the same speech, I commented as follows on the urgent need to give serious consideration to Latin America's pressing economic problems:

> I am hopeful that at the forthcoming Inter-American Economic Conference in Rio de Janeiro a plan will be developed that will guarantee the Latin American nations steady markets for their raw materials so that they can with some certainty lay out economic development projects.

Again my words were unheeded and nothing was done.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. SMATHERS. I am happy to yield to the able majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I wish to commend the very able junior Senator from Florida for his enlightened and constructive attitude toward our good neighbors in this hemisphere, which he has maintained ever since he came to the Congress. I know of no man who has expressed more interest or who has dedicated more of his time or who has performed more like a statesman in the field of our relationships with other nations than has the distinguished junior Senator from Florida. For years he has been telling us—as a matter of fact, for 7 years and 7 months during this administration—what the administration has finally come to accept in the twilight period of this administration and the last few days of this Congress. Those who have sought to awaken our people to the dangers that confront us when we neglect our friends and chase after our enemies should express, and do, indeed, owe, a great debt of gratitude to the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS]. So, Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the people for whom I speak, I want to express it publicly.

If we were not now operating under a time limitation, I would go into some of the details of the President's recommendations, and would point out that those very recommendations have been made time and time and time again, not by the President, but by the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], who anticipated the situation and realized what was taking place and attempted to cope with it before it was too late.

So I commend him for his determined and dedicated interest in this field.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, let me very genuinely thank the majority leader for his warm expression. I must say that I do not know that I would have continued those speeches, which always went unheeded, if it had not been for the friendly encouragement of our very great majority leader, the senior Senator from Texas, who, himself, has long had an interest in this area, particularly in better relationships with the great country of Mexico.

It was in some measure his encouragement which kept me talking. I regret, as he does, and I am sure all of us do, that our warnings to the administration and our country, that neglect of Latin America would result in distrust, recriminations, and chaos, have now proven, unfortunately, true. Now the administration, in the last hours of this Congress, has come forth with a program in which, for all practical purposes, I believe there is not a single recommendation that I have not specifically made over the course of the last 5 or 6 years, urging the Congress and the administration to undertake such programs before it was too late.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SMATHERS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand the administration does not ask for any funds to implement the program and does not anticipate it will be necessary to have any appropriations. They have now asked for an authorization. Although I observed in the morning paper one of our most distinguished journalists says the more crises we get into, the more some candidates benefit, I renounce that doctrine, because I think there is a time when we must all be Americans first. I am much pleased that the Foreign Relations Committee, in its wisdom, by a unanimous vote, has agreed to report and to have placed on the calendar for action in this session, we hope, the substance of the President's recommendation. The Under Secretary of State yesterday told me how pleased he was at the action of this group, which is made up of members of both parties, because certainly politics must stop at the water's edge.

Mr. President, because of the generosity of the Senator from Florida in yielding to me, I will yield him 5 minutes.

Mr. SMATHERS. I thank the Senator.

I think the downtown administration has completely failed in Latin America. In all fairness, no indictment can be leveled at some of the Senators on the other side of the aisle, specifically, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], and several other members of the Foreign Relations Committee who, from time to time, themselves urged the Secretary of State and the President to take more affirmative action in this area before it was too late. Nothing had been done until just the other day.

Again, on January 11, 1955, I urged development of a realistic program of inter-American cooperation. I said:

> Latin America today is beset with gigantic economic problems which must be met and solved if this hemisphere is to remain secure. We must help solve their problems or be prepared to suffer the consequences.

This advice, too, was unheeded.

In 1956, the State Department was, as usual, preoccupied with developments in crises areas elsewhere on the globe. Once more I attempted to alert the administration to the growing need for decisive action in Latin America. On June 7, 1956, I said:

> By allowing conditions in Latin America to worsen through neglect, one day we may find ourselves running southward to patch up the ruins of an explosion. A little more judicious assistance while there is yet time could perhaps save us billions of dollars at a later date; or, as the [Eric] Johnston report put it, "clearly we cannot afford to sit and wait."

But again my words were unheeded.

Three weeks later I tried once more, saying:

> As I have indicated in the past, I am concerned about the trend of relations with Latin America. On every proper occasion the administration has indicated the importance of maintaining and strengthening our ties with the other American Republics. What worries me is the wide gulf between declared intentions and action. It is essential that we take decisive steps toward working out with the other American Republics a courageous, imaginative solution to their economic dilemma.

Once again these words and their warning went unheeded.

On May 2, 1957, I said to the Senate:

> It is a highly precarious gamble to take international friendships for granted, as we seem wont to do with our neighbors. If, at the moment we are inclined to feel a degree of satisfaction with the good will and friendship existing between the Latin America Republics and our country, it would be foolhardy to believe that this state of affairs can continue under any and all circumstances. Under the circumstances—turbulence in the region, Communist activities there, and our cast stake in the political and economic progress of the area—it is difficult for me to comprehend why the administration left the key post of Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs vacant since the resignation of Henry Holland on August 31, 1956.

Once again that call for urgency was not heard.

On February 17, 1958, I again warned:

> Today Latin America is seething with political, economic, and social unrest. Because of Latin America's importance to us from the standpoint of trade, strategy, and raw materials, it is essential that we assist it in solving its problems. It is in our own enlightened self-interest that we do so. If we fail to assume this responsibility, we must be prepared to suffer the consequences. Obviously, if the Communists are allowed to infiltrate in this area while we sit and watch, then our security will be seriously endangered. It is self-defeating for the United States to be exerting itself economically and financially toward other more distant areas of the world if at the same time we do not render the type of assistance needed and asked for by our own neighbors in our own hemisphere. We cannot say that we need not help Latin America because Europe, the Middle East, and the Far East are the immediate danger areas in the cold war. The fact is that any Soviet penetration in Latin America could do us incalculable harm.

Another warning went unheeded.

On May 14, 1958, again I said:

> The United States can certainly not be held accountable for many of the variety of ills—economic, political, and social—which beset the Latin American nations. But we do owe a leadership to those who seek us to be their leader. We must offer effective assistance to halt Communist encroachment into the free world. It must of necessity be a program of vision and positive action bold and courageously carried out.

Once again there was no response to that warning.

I urged the administration to adopt a four-point program, including the creation of a long-range trade policy between the United States and Latin America, assurance that Latin America would receive its proportionate share from the Development Loan Fund, restoration of a Latin American special economic assistance fund to promote health, education, and sanitation projects, and institution of an adequate and effective student exchange program.

These proposals went unheeded.

On June 25, 1958, in Miami, I called for creation of a Latin American regional bank and warned that "we must help Latin America to develop a native strength of its own, the sort of strength that allows the people of Britain and Canada and the United States to listen and laugh at the divisive nonsense broadcast by the Communists."

I am happy to be able to say that the Inter-American Bank proposal was accepted at long last by the administration, and the Bank will begin operation shortly.

Continually during 1959, as the Cuban crisis began to take shape, I warned that the failure to pay close attention to the needs of Latin America would lead to the multiplication of discontent and would build for us a crisis in Latin America unlike anything we had known before.

I warned the State Department to go slow on Castro, and for that I was abused by them and by the press. On my return from a 10-nation tour of South America and the Caribbean earlier this year, I warned again of the dangers and recommended a program encompassing 17 points in the area of trade and general foreign policy to repair the damage which had been done.

These same 17 points were reiterated in the 55-page report which I made to the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee under date of April 7, 1960.

The record is not alone one of prophecies unheeded and recommendations ignored. There were programs enacted which the administration failed to use to sufficient advantage.

In 1956, in 1957, and in 1960 the Congress acted favorably on bills which I introduced to assert the interest of the United States in promoting the economic and social welfare of the underdeveloped areas of Latin America, the very heart of the present proposal.

During the 2d session of the 84th Congress, I sponsored an amendment to the foreign aid appropriation bill to set aside $15 million for regional projects to promote health, education, sanitation, and land resettlement. It was passed. It worked, and was greatly appreciated.

In the 1st session of the 85th Congress I sponsored an amendment which was adopted by the Senate to provide on a loan basis a $25 million authorization for essentially the same purposes.

Some extremely useful projects were undertaken as a result of these efforts, but no sooner was the first year's work done than the administration argued persuasively that such work should more properly be done through the instrumentality of the Development Loan Fund. In effect, the Smathers' amendment program, as such, ceased to be. But as a matter of fact, since the Development Loan Fund did little or nothing to further its objectives, the program itself ceased to be.

The fact of the matter is that the program was "scuttled" by the administration and has not been reenacted to date. Despite that, the Secretary now comes before the Committee on Foreign Relations to say, "This is the kind of program we now should have." We had it once, and they took it away from us.

The Development Loan Fund at that time was so narrowly preoccupied with economic development that it did not regard its mission as including the promotion of the balanced economic, political, and social development which is needed.

Earlier this year the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and I were successful in getting an amendment adopted to support housing programs in Latin America through the encouragement of savings and loan type institutions under existing moneys available to the Development Loan Fund.

Until the very eve of the President's announcement on July 11 in Newport of a "new" program for Latin America, the Development Loan Fund had shown little disposition to accept the clear mandate of Congress to become active in the savings and loan and housing fields.

I believe every Member of the Congress voted for that particular proposal. The Development Loan Fund refused to act on the recommendation of the Congress.

The chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee was not in the least extravagant when he characterized the administration's "new" program as a kind of "deathbed confession." It is not merely a confession but a conversion done, I fear, with bad grace and near fatal timing.

I cannot, of course, criticize the objectives of the President's program. They are my own objectives. In the end, I must say, therefore, that I will support the administration's request.

But I would not have it thought in Latin America that the administration's timing is the timing of any of those who have criticized the administration for its laggard and fumbling Latin American policy.

We must be harsh with ourselves. We must recognize that all over Latin America this "new" program may appear to be a kind of last-ditch effort to purchase the friendship of those whom we have so long ignored. In the eyes of many Latins, it is not their need which moves us now but our own need to patch up the situation in the Caribbean.

For this reason, it should be said here and now that this program is not the administration's program. It is the program of the administration's critics. And, so it may be clear that I am not seeking to secure advantage for my own party's cause, let me add that the critics whose policy is now being adopted by the administration include such distinguished Republicans as Governor Rockefeller of New York, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and I believe in many instances the able Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER].

I think I may speak for all the critics in saying that we welcome the administration's conversion, however late it comes.

Nonetheless, I must warn the Senate and the country at large that $500 million or even $500 billion will purchase no friends for us in Latin America.

The Latins are a proud people, with a tradition as long and as distinguished as our own. They do not seek charity of us, and we should not demean them by appearing to give it.

We will fail if we write out a blank check for an amount, no matter how large, and make as if to drop it into a beggar's hat. Rather, we must take the path of hemispheric cooperation, a path which draws essentially upon the experience and the success of the Marshall plan during the immediate postwar period.

We can repair the breach which now exists between the United States and the people of Latin America—if not their leaders—only if we admit, candidly, the mistakes of our former course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for an additional 4 minutes without the time being charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, it must be clear that we are now prepared as a government to act with vigor and dispatch in support of a cooperative hemispheric effort to improve the economic and social position of all the member countries of the Organization of American States.

Accordingly, I believe it to be essential that the Congress indicate its general support, in whatever form the Foreign Relations Committee may deem appropriate, for "assistance in such fields as land settlement and land utilization, housing, vocational, technical, and scientific training, and basic public facilities such as potable water systems and sewage systems."

These were the means mentioned before the committee Monday by Under Secretary Dillon. They should have the support of all Members of the Senate.

The exact details of the program should be worked out by means of cooperative consultation of the peoples of the hemisphere through their governments.

So that, in addition, it may be clear this program will be carried forward by whichever administration succeeds to the reins of government in January, I respectfully urge the nominees of the two major parties to bury their political differences long enough to agree upon a joint statement of support for the ideal of hemispheric economic, social, and political development.

I would hope that the candidates could also agree to designate, each on his own behalf, a person or group of persons to represent him informally as unofficial observers at the OAS economic conference in Bogotá beginning September 5.

Finally, I would hope that the Congress can agree to send a delegation from both parties and both Houses to attend the Bogotá conference and to report back to their respective bodies in January.

We cannot afford to permit the requirements of our political system to paralyze effective performance in the realm of foreign affairs.

I regard the dangers in Latin America as among the most serious we have faced anywhere in the world in the postwar era. If we fail to take united and effective action between now and the 20th of January, the incoming administration, Democratic or Republican, may find itself with a crisis situation, already irreparable. Even if we act now with bipartisan resolve, we cannot count on recovering the easy relationship of the good neighbor era, certainly not overnight.

It will take years to restore the reputation of the United States as a nation which cares. However, we cannot begin unless we begin—and the sooner the better.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SMATHERS. I am happy to yield to the able Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Without intending to take exception to the statement made by the Senator from Florida about the need for providing increased help for economic development in the South American countries, I should like to query the Senator as to whether there are some facts lacking in his presentation. The Senator has said that we have done nothing for these people of South America. Is it not a fact that through the World Bank and also through the Export-Import Bank much money has been loaned, and through the operations of Public Law 480 much aid has been given?

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I am not saying that it is adequate, but there have been loans made in huge amounts to the South American countries.

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator is correct in his assumption. However, the loans which have been made from the Development Loan Fund and the World Bank and other funds are not effective in the fields in which the administration now proposes to act. Otherwise there would be no need for such a "new" program.

I did not say that nothing has been done. Something has been done, but not enough and, where we have acted, we have even so failed to give the people of Latin America the recognition that we should have given them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, may I ask unanimous consent that we may have 3 more minutes to pursue this thought?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator mean that the time is to be charged to neither side?

Mr. LAUSCHE. To neither side. That is correct.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield 3 minutes from this side, since a time certain is set.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Does the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] agree with me that it is wrong for our country to have delivered to the South American people, who number 135 million, the message that we have done nothing, when in fact under Public Law 480, under the World Bank and under the Export-Import Bank, even recognizing the limitations in the program, we have done much, although perhaps not enough?

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator is correct in that assertion. We have made the facilities of governmental agencies available to those countries, just as we have made them available to every other country in the world—countries in Asia, Europe, the Middle East, and so on.

The Senator is correct. My point, however, is that for 10 or 12 years I have urged that we initiate a comprehensive program to eliminate the conditions which enable the Communists to come in and turn the people of these countries against us.

It is that program and those warnings which have gone unheeded.

In the closing days of this administration, administration officials come to us and say, "Now let us have this big program," when it is almost too late to repair the damage which has resulted from the neglect of 7 years and 7 months.

Mr. LAUSCHE subsequently said: Mr. President, this morning I engaged with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] in debate about the volume of aid given to the nations of Latin America. Some question in regard to the exact facts arose.

Since that time, I have procured a tabulation in regard to the aid given to the countries of Latin America through the mutual security program, the Export-Import Bank, and other agencies. I wish to have that tabulation printed at this point in the RECORD. The tabulation shows that from 1947 we have provided aggregate aid in the amount of $3,791 million, or in the amount of approximately $300 million a year, in the form of loans under Public Law 480 and otherwise. In addition to the above the net loan commitments by the World Bank since its beginning, total slightly over $1 billion in Latin America.

I ask that this tabulation be printed in the RECORD immediately following my debate with the Senator from Florida.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMATHERS. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Montana, who himself knows a great deal about this particular area of the world.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The junior Senator from Florida flatters me too much, because compared to what he knows on the basis of personal surveys all over the hemisphere and his firsthand knowledge, I am still a neophyte.

I think the junior Senator from Florida will be pleased with the consideration given by the Foreign Relations Committee to the proposal of this administration, late though it is, with respect to the very things that I assume he has in mind—ways and means of getting to the people of Latin America so that they can be helped, and ways and means of coming forth with specific proposals, with which the nations of the Americas can work together cooperatively to the end that the difficulties which are inherent and real can be met before it is too late.

I know that the Senator will pay close attention to the legislation which will be before the Senate shortly. I think he will find that that proposal, which seeks to give an authorization of $500 million for general hemispheric cooperation in economic affairs, and an additional, noteworthy, and necessary $100 million for rehabilitation relief to Chile will meet many of the objectives which he perhaps more than any other Member of this body has been advocating, over a long period of time, in an effort to bring about an alleviation of conditions in the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. SMATHERS. I thank the able Senator from Montana. As I said earlier before he came to the floor, I certainly will support the recommendation to the Senate by the Foreign Relations Committee with respect to those objectives. I have congratulated them for making the proposals, even though belatedly. Certainly I would support them, because every recommendation now made by the Secretary of State for this area was a recommendation that had been made over the past 10 years by the junior Senator from Florida in the Senate. So naturally I must be for it. I hope it will do a great deal of good, and I thank the Senator from Montana.

I yield the floor.

PROBLEMS OF THE SOVIET UNION

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the majority leader yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield to my friend from Minnesota 15 minutes for a nongermane, but I am sure brilliant, address in connection with the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

I trust my remarks will be worthy of the attention of my colleague from Pennsylvania and of my other colleagues.

It is somewhat reassuring, in these days when one crisis after another in the Western World erupts into the headlines, to know that the Communist bloc is not without its grave problems.

Reports in this morning's papers indicate dramatically mounting tensions between the Soviet Union and Red China. A story in this morning's Washington Post says the following:

> The Soviet Union, in an unprecedentedly pointed move against its Communist Chinese ally, has within the past 2 weeks halted publication and distribution inside Russia of both a Peking weekly and a monthly magazine.
> This according to reliable information reaching here, is the latest in a momentous train of events that, in Washington's view, has brought the downward spiral of Peking-Moscow relations to the most significant low in postwar history.

A UPI report in yesterday's Washington Post, quoting Yugoslav and French sources, said:

> Relations between the Soviet Union and Communist China have deteriorated to such a point that Soviet technicians and advisers are leaving China by the trainload.

These are not just idle rumors, Mr. President. The Yugoslavs gave too many details for the incident to be dismissed. Further, it is significant that the strict Chinese censorship allowed these reports to leave Peking.

There is speculation that the withdrawal has been quite sudden and unexpected and that there is a strong link between the departure of the Russian technicians and of the present Chinese campaign to increase productivity by putting high-ranking officials and bureaucrats to work in the factories and mines part time.

All of this reminds me, Mr. President, of a statement that Napoleon Bonaparte once made: "Let China sleep. When she awakes, the world will be sorry."

The news item I have just referred to indicates that not only is the Western World sorry about the burgeoning menace of Red China, but, in all likelihood, the Soviet Union itself is sorry. And perhaps sorry is too mild a word.

It would be wrong to underestimate the strength of the Sino-Soviet alliance, but, nevertheless, deep-seated frictions have developed in the last few years, and it is a fair assumption that those cleavages will increase rather than lessen. It might be fruitful to examine some of the divergences between the two great Communist powers:

There are three general, but interdependent, sources of tension: First, population pressure; second, prestige rivalry; and, third, policy disagreements. I shall consider them one by one.

POPULATION PRESSURE

It is estimated that by 1975, Red China will have approximately 1 billion human beings. Although parts of western China are still sparsely populated, by 1975 there are going to be grave population pressures. It is no secret that Soviet officials develop a nervous twitch every time they look at that 3,500-mile border between the Soviet Union and China.

It is a reasonable assumption that one of the main reasons that Premier Khrushchev has begun his settle-the-virgin land policy is that he wants to greatly accelerate the population growth near the border.

I recall that during my visit with the Premier of the Soviet Union, speaking about the number of people that were going into the so-called virgin lands of the Siberian area or the Asian section of the Soviet Union, he said to me something to the effect that when people live in a place, they defend it. I could not help but ponder the question: Against whom they would defend it? The only nation that presses on that border, which is 3,500 miles long, is Red China, and many of my colleagues have not given adequate attention to the large establishment of military forces on the part of the Soviet Union to be found in that part of the Soviet Union which is in the Asian mainland. There is good reason to believe that the leaders of the Kremlin do not accept in full faith the assurances of leaders of Communist China as to peaceful coexistence.

It has been estimated that the Chinese population increases between 15 and 25 million a year, as compared to the 3 or 4 million annual increase in the Soviet Union which now has 200 million. The men in the Kremlin are not unmindful of those statistics.

PRESTIGE RIVALRY

The Communist empire used to have one center—Moscow. Now, it clearly has two centers—Moscow and Peking. Moscow cannot be happy that its former unquestioned direction of the Communist movement has been challenged.

China has begun operating its own foreign propaganda and economic aid program in competition with both the United States and the U.S.S.R. In short, it is operating in sales territory that the Russians used to think was their own.

Red China has made a dramatic propaganda bid in Latin America and Africa, as well as Asia, and in several instances, the Chinese announce positions which are divergent from that of the Russians.

The Red Chinese have made a dramatic propaganda bid in Latin America. I documented these facts in the Senate prior to the congressional recess. And I regret to say that little attention has been paid to the tremendous increase in Chinese propaganda efforts in Latin America, which has been as much as a fivefold increase. Red China has been spending more on propaganda in Latin America than the United States is spending throughout the whole world. This has all happened within the last 5 years.

The new area of competition between the two countries—and this is an area which we cannot be comfortable about—is in Cuba. Red China is already starting to send troops of propagandists and technicians to Cuba, and the Soviet Union will send its main contingents when the Soviet Embassy opens in August.

The evidence at hand indicates that Red China would like to make Cuba to the United States what Formosa is to Communist China. She would like the island of Cuba to be as embarrassing to us as possible, both in a propaganda and a military sense. With respect to the latter, the Soviet Union will probably toe a softer line. We will have a considerable stake in the way that that policy difference is resolved.

I repeat that Congress and the administration would be derelict in its responsibility if it did not make clear to the American people that the greatest propaganda effort in the Western Hemisphere is not made by the Soviet Union, but by Red China. I was rather surprised, after having documented this material with statistical information which I was able to gain from several months of inquiry, that not a word of it ever came to the attention of the public, except through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It seems to me that this is the kind of information that the average American citizen ought to have, so that he can properly judge what is going on in the Western Hemisphere.

The focal point of friction is in Outer Mongolia, an allegedly independent country upon which the Soviet Union has had a firm control. Outer Mongolia, a country which is half as large as Europe, has a population of only 1 million, and the Chinese have already begun to make a dent. Ten thousand Chinese workers have moved into Outer Mongolia, and the majority intends to remain there. And more will probably be coming.

There has been an historic friction between pre-Communist Russia and China for the control of Outer Mongolia, and it does not appear to have subsided. In 1936, Mao declared that Outer Mongolia will be China's. The Russians know about that statement.

Mao has never retracted it. To the contrary, thousands of Chinese are being sent to Outer Mongolia, as so-called technicians and experts, but to remain there as colonists. The Chinese are famous for their colonization. They are doing a very good job in terms of Communist China right now in Outer Mongolia. Further, the Chinese maps draw the entire frontier between Outer Mongolia and China with a dotted line; there are solid lines for all other frontiers.

Another specter which worries the Russians is Red China's increasing attempt to influence the Eastern European satellites. The Stalinist leaders of some of the satellites—such as Walter Ulbricht of East Germany—are actually ideologically closer to Communist China than to Soviet Russia, a fact which Mao Tse-tung and Chou En-lai are not overlooking.

I would remind Senators who are deeply interested in foreign policy that the Chinese Communist leaders have made many trips into eastern satellite states of the Soviet Union, visiting with the leaders of Communist governments and at times being in opposition in their statements with the policies being pursued by Mr. Khrushchev.

The Kremlin cannot feel very comfortable that Chou En-lai had to step in to help resolve the Polish-Russian dispute in 1956 or that he prodded his nose into the anti-Communist revolution by Hungary. We can rest assured that the men in the Kremlin have not forgotten it.

POLICY DISAGREEMENTS

There has been a wide range of policy disagreements in the few years. There have been attempts to mute them through the use of soothing Kremlinese jargon, but they are there, nevertheless.

The most serious policy disagreement of all is one about the inevitability of war. Khrushchev appears to think that the Communists can win the world through propaganda subversion, and economic means—that is, through means of political and economic penetration—short of all-out war. On the other hand, we have on record this disturbing quote by Chairman Mao:

> If the imperialists insist on unleashing another war, we should not be afraid of it. The First World War was followed by the birth of the Soviet Union with a population of 200 million. The Second World War was followed by the emergence of the Socialist camp with a combined population of 900 million.

If the imperialists should insist on launching a third World War, it is certain that several hundred million more will turn to socialism. Then there will not be much room left in the world for the imperialists. While it is quite likely that the whole structure of imperialism will collapse.

This is a statement that neither we—nor the Soviets—can take lightly.

The relatively low level of economic development in China, together with the large population, appears to make the consequences of miscalculation and of general war less disruptive than for the Soviet Union.

To put it another way, the Soviet Union today is a "have" nation. So is the United States. Communist China is a "have not" nation. Therefore, she feels willing to undertake all kinds of venturesome pursuits.

Comparatively speaking, Soviet Russia is now a "have" nation. The Soviet Union has begun to taste the fruits of bourgeois luxury and can afford to be patient.

The Chinese, however, face grave domestic difficulties. They are also confronted with what they consider a serious national insult in what they call the American occupation of Taiwan. Thus, because of internal pressures and external affronts, Peking finds the policy of peaceful coexistence less attractive than do the Russians.

There are other disagreements about policies. When I spoke with Premier Khrushchev, he expressed doubts and concern about the Chinese commune system—or as being, as Khrushchev put it, too reactionary, although he later claimed that he said no such thing.

It is no secret that Russia has looked down on the commune experiment as being too radical. This is a severe affront to Communist China, which considers the commune idea as their own, and one of the proudest accomplishments of the Chinese Communist revolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, may I ask for an additional 5 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator intend that the time not be charged to either side?

Mr. HUMPHREY. To neither side.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have no objection.

Mr. CLARK. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, Senators may recall that Khrushchev spent considerable time at the 21st Party Congress of the Communist Party denouncing the senior Senator from Minnesota for my report of his statement relating to the Chinese communes. I repeated what I had said, because what I had said was the truth.

Then, it is interesting to note that the Yugoslav information agency has never let the Kremlin off the hook, so to speak, on that point. Even today, the Yugoslav information agency reports throughout the world what the Soviets think of the Chinese commune system.

When the First Deputy Minister of the Soviet Union, Mr. Mikoyan, was visiting Washington, he, too, spoke in rather derogatory terms of the Chinese communes. So this is a great area of tension between the two countries.

Another area of tension is the aggressive policy of China toward India, Nepal, and some of her other neighbors. The first time that the Soviet Union publicly disagreed with Peiping was on the occasion of the Chinese border invasion of India. Russia refused to side with China, but rather made a conciliatory statement that "here are two great countries, and we hope that they settle their differences peacefully."

As we know, Communist Russia is beginning to make a play for India, so as to extend Russia's influence into India. It surely is not to the advantage of the Soviet Union to have Communist China engage in military operations against the legitimate borders and territory of India.

There are other differences. No doubt China is perturbed because the Soviet Union will not give it nuclear weapons, and because China does not receive more economic aid from the Soviet Union.

There is tension caused by the fact that Chinese regard Mao as the ranking Communist theoretician, whereas Khrushchev considers himself to be the first and foremost interpreter of Marxism-Leninism.

In other words, the two high priests, so to speak, or high philosophies, of communism, are in conflict.

Russia has so long thought itself to be the prophet of communism that the Kremlin leaders resent being challenged in the ideological realm.

The recent meeting of 12 ruling Communist Parties in Bucharest, Rumania, showed a rift, although the final communique was couched in soothing terms. The very fact that the meeting lasted over a week indicated that it took a considerable amount of time to iron out divergent views of the Soviet Union and Red China.

The result was a compromise. Apparently, Red China agreed to soft-pedal—at least temporarily—its views that peaceful coexistence was impossible. In return, Premier Khrushchev, to quote the New York Times' able analyst, Harry Schwartz, "agreed to a modification of the Communist declaration signed in Moscow in November 1957. The change put armed Communist revolution on an equal ideological plane of respectability with the idea of peaceful capture of power in non-Communist countries."

Further, there are inbuilt historical differences between the two countries which have nothing to do with communism. The Chinese—whether Communist or not—are antiforeign, anti-Western, and anti-imperialist; and to the Chinese, Soviet Russia is foreign, Western, and imperialist. The Chinese have long felt that Russia had designs on her territory. To reverse the coin, the many successful invasions of Russia have come from the east, and the Russians have a longstanding fear of attack from her eastern borders.

I remind Senators that Russia—the Soviet Union—has never been successfully invaded from the west. Russia has been invaded only from the east, in terms of any successful invasion such as a military victory.

I wish to make clear my conviction that the bonds which presently hold Red China and the Soviet Union together are much stronger than the differences which divide them. The first decade of their relationship has been an amicable one. It would be wishful thinking to conclude that the two Communist giants are going to split any day.

Nevertheless, it would also be foolish to ignore the fact that tensions do exist and that they seem to be increasing rather than diminishing.

I wish to quote one paragraph from an article by the noted Soviet expert of the New York Times, Harrison Salisbury:

If one could postulate—and this did not seem to be an exaggeration—a China of close to 1 billion by 1975; if one could postulate that the China of 1975 would have an industrial potential approximating that of the Soviet Union on the eve of World War II—or better; if one could postulate that this China would be armed with nuclear weapons and long-range means for their delivery; and if one could postulate a continuance of the present Chinese tendency to supernationalism, jingoism and aggression—where then would the Soviet Union be?

All of this is within the realm of possibility.

Here is food for thought. Without exaggerating the differences between the two countries, there is no doubt that deep-seated cleavages do exist—and will probably increase. It is incumbent upon us to watch the relationship very closely and with a great deal of sophistication. No effective American foreign policy can be formulated without taking into account the complex and delicate relationship between the two Communist giants.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following articles on Sino-Soviet relations be printed at this point in the RECORD: "Red China Against Russia?" by Harrison Salisbury in the March 19, 1960, issue of the Saturday Evening Post; "Khrushchev Visits Peiping," by Boris Nicolaevsky in the October 26, 1959, issue of the New Leader; "Hotbox on the Sino-Soviet Express," by William H. Stringer in the April 9, 1960, issue of the Christian Science Monitor; "Communist Affirmation of Unity Held Soviet-Chinese Compromise," by Harry Schwartz in the June 29, 1960, issue of the New York Times; "Inevitable Conflict," an editorial in the February 27, 1960, issue of the Washington Star; "The East Wind," from the February 20, 1960, issue of the Economist; "Soviet Experts Leaving China," in the August 16 issue of the Washington Post; "Soviet Said To End Help to Red China," in the August 15 issue of the New York Times; "Moscow Bars Two Peiping Magazines From Circulation in Soviet Union," in the August 17 issue of the Washington Post; and "China-Soviet Differences Likely To Grow," by Murray Marder, in the Washington Post of July 1, 1960.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post, Mar. 19, 1960]

RED CHINA AGAINST RUSSIA?

(By Harrison E. Salisbury)

A Soviet general in civilian dress raised his glass to an American one evening last summer in the Government palace in Ulan Bator, less than 300 miles from the China border.

"Really, now," said the general, "standing here in Mongolia tonight can you think of any reason why we Russians and your Americans should fight? Is there anyone here to whom you feel more close?"

The American cast his eyes about. In one corner of the room, aloof and superior, clustered a group of Chinese. Some distance away stood a dozen Russians. There was no communication between the two groups. Little Mongol officials, nervous and ill at ease, flitted back and forth. Ambassador Molotov and his colleague, the Chinese Ambassador, exuding false joviality, strolled about, pausing here and there to drink a toast.

The American turned back to the Soviet general. He did feel closer to the Russians than to the Mongols or the Chinese—much closer.

"To peace," he said, raising his glass.

"To peace," said the general, adding with a nod toward the Chinese. "To peace—and the closest friendship of Russia and America. That is what we both need and what we are going to have."

There are specialists in the sphere of Chinese affairs—including many in our State Department—who have long contended that the possibility of a split between the Soviet Union and China is visionary. The two countries, they insist, are part of the unitary world system of communism. They are bound by a firm military alliance. They share the aim of Communist world conquest. If, as it sometimes appears, Moscow is blowing hot and Peiping is blowing cold, this is part of a calculated plan. The countries carefully coordinate every policy. Moscow calls the tune and China dances.

This thesis may be correct. But there is a rapidly growing body of evidence which suggests that Soviet-Chinese relations may not be so firmly based nor so immutable as many have long presumed. There are hints—and more than hints—of deep quarrels in the past, of present incompatibilities and conflicts which will grow—rather than lessen—in the future.

It is obviously too soon to say for certain that this means the great Communist alliance some day will split asunder. But it is equally obvious that the time has come for a fresh, cold look at the reality of Soviet-Chinese relations, stripped of wishful thinking, sentiment, and prejudice.

In many years behind the Iron Curtain I grew to feel that much more lay behind the bland facade of Soviet-Chinese friendship than the West imagined. But it was not until I had approached the Chinese-Soviet frontier by the back door and had spent considerable time in Outer Mongolia watching the antagonisms which neither Chinese nor Russians sought to conceal in this isolated land that I became convinced that my suspicions of smoldering conflict between the two Communist empires had a firm basis.

It was not merely the competitive and often hostile attitude of the Chinese toward the Russians and the Russians toward the Chinese. It was the reactions of the Mongols toward the two countries. Outer Mongolia, of course, had been virtually a Russian principality for nearly 40 years. But now the Mongols, particularly young educated Mongols, present living evidence of the deepening dichotomy of Soviet and Chinese ideology. To them the light of the world shone from the East. And "West" in Ulan Bator meant the Soviet Union as well as America. It was curious, indeed, to hear young Mongols refer to "Western countries like Russia and America."

Many of these young people had been in China. They returned with eyes glowing. The Chinese way was the way for Mongolia. Not the way of the Soviet oppressors, the conservative and backward West. Mongolia must look east.

I flew back from Mongolia uncertain what form the ultimate conflict between the Soviet Union and China would take and how long it would be in maturing. But the outlines of it were already visible in microcosm to anyone who could penetrate the Mongol fastness.

Nor could I believe that this conflict was of recent origin. I remembered too vividly a scene which I watched 5 years earlier. Premier Chou En-lai had arrived in Moscow after negotiation of the Korean truce in Geneva. The Russians tendered him a great diplomatic reception in Spiridonovka Palace. All the Soviet higher-ups were there—Malenkov, Molotov, Khrushchev, Mikoyan, Kaganovich—the whole "collective leadership." Chou En-lai was seated for dinner in an inner room. The honored guests were the Chinese and those Western ambassadors whose countries had diplomatic relations with China—the British, the French, the Swedish, and so on.

From the door of this room I watched and listened. Chou was the life of the party. He was constantly up and out of his chair, moving around, raising his glass, offering toasts. But I noticed a strange thing. Chou is fluent in Russian but he was speaking English—a language which none of the Soviet leaders knew. The only persons who could understand him were the Western ambassadors. Not only was Chou speaking English; he was needling his hosts. One exchange stood out vividly. He raised his glass to Mikoyan: "I drink to your learning Chinese." Chou spoke in English and his remarks had to be translated. But, replied Mikoyan, "Chinese is a very difficult language." "It is not that difficult, Mikoyan," Chou said sharply. "Remember we all have learned Russian. Now the time has come for you to learn Chinese. Come around to the embassy in the morning. We will be glad to give you a teacher." For once Mikoyan had no retort. A very odd performance. It smelled of old arguments and harsh differences.

But only in very recent times has enough evidence become available to piece together a working hypothesis which would explain many cryptic events in the Soviet-Chinese calendar. The evidence lies in many fields. One of the most dramatic sequences relates to the Korean war. It suggests that the motivations behind this conflict were entirely different from those which we Americans supposed. We assumed that this was a blow directed at the United States, a Communist move to undermine our position in the Far East. Instead, it may well have been primarily intended by Stalin as a blow against Mao Tse-tung.

It is still not possible to prove this theory. But there has been a striking accumulation of evidence pointing in this direction. In fact, in some Communist circles this possibility has been discussed for several years.

To go back to the start it may be recalled that after the debacle of the Communist Canton revolution—when Chiang Kai-shek broke with the Communists in 1927—Stalin turned his back on China. Canton was a catastrophe for international communism. From this time onward Stalin more and more devoted himself to building communism in one country. For all practical purposes he wrote off China. Even after the success of the famous "Long March" of the 1920's from South to North China, and the gradual build-up of Chinese Communist power, Stalin showed little interest in Mao Tse-tung. He told the U.S. Ambassador, Patrick Hurley, and others during World War II that the Chinese were "margarine Communists"—not real Communists.

In later years it was suggested that Stalin cleverly misled us; that actually he was supporting Mao while publicly disparaging him. This does not seem to fit the evidence. During this period Stalin was dealing with the Chiang Kai-shek government. He wrecked the industry of North China and Manchuria in 1945. He shipped industrial plants to Siberia rather than leave them for his Chinese Communist friends. If you examine Pravda for the years 1948–49 when the Chinese Communists were coming to power you will see a strange and curious thing: Although they were winning triumph after triumph Pravda hardly mentioned them.

The year 1948 was a critical year in Moscow. A year of deep suspicion and dark plots in the Soviet capital—the year of the break with Tito, the start of the offensive against the Jews, of the still obscure but terrible "Leningrad affair" in which many leading Communists lost their lives.

In January of 1949 Stalin arrested Mikhail Borodin, Anna Louise Strong, and a number of Borodin's associates. Police closed down the Moscow Daily News, which Borodin edited. Borodin was the man who had masterminded the Canton revolution for the Soviet Union. Miss Strong, an American, was one of his oldest associates. Both were deeply interested in China and the Chinese Communists. Miss Strong was a close personal friend of Mao and Chou. She had been in Belgrade and she had come to Moscow on her way to China. Borodin died in a Siberian concentration camp in 1953, Miss Strong was expelled from Russia as an American spy.

There has never been a satisfactory explanation for the arrests. Miss Strong was finally rehabilitated in 1958 and since then has taken up residence in Peking.

But if Stalin was disturbed by the rise of Mao, if, in fact, there was deep conflict between Mao and Stalin, an interpretation of these strange events becomes possible. It was hinted in Moscow in 1949 that Miss Strong was suspected of being a go-between from Tito to Mao. Stalin may have felt that his enemies in the Communist world were coming together and that Borodin and Miss Strong represented a possible link between Tito and Mao.

Mr. Khrushchev—who seems to have no reason for fabricating history on this point—has, in fact, revealed that there was a serious split between Stalin and Mao at this time. He has told foreign Communists that relations between Stalin and Mao were so strained that had it not been for the international situation and pressure by the United States there might have been an open break. Stalin, he said, insisted on treating Mao as a dependent. Stalin was overbearing. He wanted to exploit China as a colony.

The situation between the Soviet Union and China, Khrushchev contends, remained critical until Mao finally came to Moscow in December 1949. Mao stayed for 2 months and left on February 14, 1950, after signing the draft of the Soviet-Chinese alliance, agreeing to terms for a small Soviet loan (since repaid with interest) and permitting the Soviet to maintain for an indefinite period her strategic bases in the Far East—Port Arthur, Dairen, and the Changchun railroad.

The press treatment of the negotiations was curious. For weeks at a time there was no reference to Mao in the papers, until we began to wonder if he had gone back to China. Ordinarily a guest like Mao was swamped in publicity. All the evidence suggests that the Mao-Stalin talks were difficult and arduous.

At this moment a completely unexpected event occurred. Secretary of State Dean Acheson made his famous address in which he failed to specify Korea as a point in the American defense chain in the Pacific.

This may well have touched off a fateful sequence of events in Moscow. Stalin was well aware that when Japan launched her drive from the islands to the China mainland she moved by stages. First she seized Korea. Then, after defeating Russia she went into North China. Finally, she seized Manchuria and set it up as a puppet state. Once Korea and Manchuria had been secured, the Japanese had no difficulty in moving down on Peking at the time of the famous incident at the Marco Polo Bridge.

In the spring of 1950 the Soviet position was not unlike that which Japan had held. She had the North China treaty ports and the railroad. She had North Korea. Her troops were on the Amur River, just north of Manchuria. She lacked South Korea and Manchuria. If she held both of them she could, of course, put Mao into a nutcracker. Peking would be almost surrounded. Mao would be at Stalin's mercy. If Stalin wished he could detach Manchuria. It already had semiautonomous status, and there is good reason to believe Stalin had made secret arrangements about Manchuria. But he lacked the Korean piece on the chessboard. If, by a lightning stroke, the puppet army of North Korea could seize South Korea—and in Moscow the Acheson statement seemed to suggest that the United States would not resist—then Stalin could dictate his own terms to Mao.

Of course, when the United States and the United Nations opposed the rape of South Korea, the whole plan fell apart. Stalin found himself involved in a long, bloody war. Eventually the Chinese Communists came in, gradually shifting the whole power base in the Far East away from the Soviet Union and toward China.

Stalin's motivation in ordering the attack on Korea is still unproved hypothesis. But one important missing piece has since fallen into place. In 1956 subscribers to the Soviet Bolshoi Encyclopedia received a notice from the publishers. They were instructed to slit out the page containing the biography of a Chinese Communist official named Kao Kang and paste in a page containing no reference to him. The only other occasion on which this had been done was after the execution of Beria. Thus, the inference was that the case of Kao Kang was of the same magnitude as Beria's. Or that, perhaps, they might be in some way connected. And who was Kao Kang? He was the boss of Manchuria, the special administrator of the quasi-autonomous region.

Little ever was published about him by the Chinese press except to call him a traitor who had "expressed his ultimate betrayal of the party" by committing suicide before he could be punished for his crimes. What was the nature of his treachery? The official communique said that since 1949 he had engaged in a conspiracy aimed at seizing the leadership of the party and the state and that he hoped to set up Manchuria as the "independent Kingdom of Kao Kang."

The fact is that Kao Kang almost certainly was Beria's man, or Stalin's man or Russia's man—call him what you will. Even before Mao officially announced the establishment of his regime, Kao Kang independently had gone off to Moscow and signed a series of agreements for close economic and financial collaboration between Manchuria and the Soviet. He even had his own currency.

It very much looks as though Stalin in 1949 secretly made an alliance with the de facto ruler of Manchuria. If this is true he had the whole chessboard set up. Once he placed his puppet armies in South Korea the ring around Mao would close. There may have been even more to it. For years hints and rumors have circulated in the Far East that a plot to assassinate Mao in 1949 or 1950 miscarried.

An enormous heritage of ill will must have been bequeathed to both sides by such a sequence of events. But if the inner history of Soviet-Chinese relations followed a pattern so Machiavellian it was hardly accidental. Roots of Russian-Chinese conflict in the Far East go deep. And in the Soviet Union there is long history of popular fear of eastern peoples, stemming from the days of Mongol conquest. Ordinary Russians have always felt uneasy in alliance with China. The feeling appears to be mutual. It is easy to observe the incompatibility among Soviet and Chinese students in Moscow.

A Russian said, "Last summer I was in Sochi. It was a very hot day. A bunch of Chinese students, boys and girls, came out on the beach and did calisthenics in the sun. They exercised for an hour in dark blue sweatshirts. Then they made a circle on the beach, took out their textbooks and started to study Marxism-Leninism. It was a frightening thing to watch."

Or take the case of a Chinese student at Moscow University. The boy decided to save money from his state stipend of 300 rubles a month. He wanted to buy a Soviet 35-millimeter camera. By going without lunches he managed to put aside enough money to buy the camera. But his Chinese comrades found out what he was doing and he was summoned before a comradely court.

"You deprived your body and your brain of the food calories needed to study at your highest capability," the comradely prosecutor charged.

"Or," said another, "if you are able to work at full capacity on less food you should have given the extra money back to the state."

The student agreed to sell his camera, give the money back to the state, nourish his mind and body fully in the future and work harder than ever to deserve the solicitude that the state was showing.

"Imagine," said a Russian. "What can you do with people like that. They are not human."

These attitudes could be dismissed as reflecting cultural differences of two diverse people. What counts, of course, is the attitude of the people at the top. Here cold demographic, economic, and power factors seem to play the decisive role.

Khrushchev paid his first visit to Peiping in the autumn of 1954. He negotiated a revision of the unequal treaty of 1950. The Soviet relinquished her special rights, special bases, special privileges. It was the first time the two nations had ever dealt as equals. On his way back Khrushchev stopped over in eastern Siberia.

A few weeks later Khrushchev made what history may record as the most significant speech of his career. He called on the young people of the Communist Youth League to launch a crusade to open up the virgin lands of Siberia. He summoned the young people to go east, to fill up the vacant spaces that lay across the frontier from China. He put it almost but not quite that bluntly. He asked them to settle down and raise families. The Soviet Union needed people on those vacant lands. "If about 100 million people were added to our 200 million even that would not be enough," he said.

Several hundred thousand young people have gone to Siberia, but most of them settled in its western reaches and in Kazakhstan. The Amur vastness is still wilderness. Of the 250 million acres of arable land in Khabarovsk Krai, for instance, only about 500,000 are under cultivation. Population movement has been only a comparative trickle.

But on the other side of the frontier the pressure increases inexorably. In 3 years 1,400,000 Chinese moved into Inner Mongolia and China's northeast and northwest provinces adjacent to Russia and Mongolia.

Already Chinese pressure is evident in Outer Mongolia. That sparsely settled country has a population of only 1 million—a few less people than horses. In China-ruled Inner Mongolia there are 1,500,000 Mongols. Thousands of Chinese are moving into Outer Mongolia as labor force. They are working on roads, irrigation projects, factory sites, bridges, dams, mines. The labor is the gift of the Chinese Government. There is only one proviso which China asks in return—the privilege that the Chinese may assume Mongol citizenship and stay in the country.

"The momentum of the Chinese initiative is so great, the attractive force of Chinese dynamism is so overpowering," an Asian diplomat observed, "that it is hard to see how, over the long run, Russia can maintain her position in Mongolia. She is still the first power there. But 5 years from now this may well no longer be true."

And the drive into Mongolia is only the gentle lapping of the first waves of China's population tides. Chinese statistics may not be entirely reliable, but the figures which Russians cite are a current population in the neighborhood of 650 million with a growth factor of possibly 25 million a year. The Chinese census of 1953 gave a total of about 602 million but this included about 19 million overseas and in Formosa. The Soviet population is about 208 million, and the growth factor is about 3,600,000 a year.

China is not just growing in numbers. She is growing in economic weight. And no one knows this more intimately than the Soviets who are assisting this growth. Russians who have been recent visitors to China speak with awe and concern about the pace of Chinese industrial development.

"You cannot believe it," one highly placed Russian said, "until you see it with your own eyes. The speed, the discipline, the organizing ability. The Chinese have such enormous quantities of labor. And everyone is working so hard. Nothing we ever did in Russia was anything like it."

Another Russian strongly urged me to go to China—not realizing that the Chinese stubbornly refuse to admit American journalists or, indeed, Americans of any kind.

"It is another world," he said. "You must know what is happening there. To understand the world today you must see China."

And one said, "The speed of development in China is terrifying. When you think of the future—"

A neutral businessman, returning from China, said, "China is a terrible threat to the world. The Russians recognize this threat. They understand that it is a threat to Russia as much as to the rest of the world."

A Western diplomat who has watched the Russians carefully for a number of years said he felt the key factor in the timetable of world relations today is the date on which China obtains the atomic bomb. When that moment occurs, he pointed out, the world balance of power will change irrevocably. China henceforth will be a member of the atomic club with full rights and privileges.

And how will you and Russia like that? he asked. It was his conviction that this prospect was already affecting Khrushchev's policy. The world at large does not know when China will become a nuclear power, but Khrushchev probably does.

Not that the Soviet Union is helping China to arm herself with atoms. There is no evidence that the Soviet is assisting China with anything more than experimental nuclear-laboratory facilities. She is not even building the Chinese a nuclear power plant so far as is known. But China's possession of atomic weapons is only a matter of time. Chinese physicists study in the great Soviet physics centers. So far as China is concerned the atom bomb presumably is not a matter of know-how—it is just a matter of allocating facilities to make it.

There is never any public quarreling between the Soviet Union and China. But there are obvious differences of principle, most notably on the subject of Chinese communes. Mr. Khrushchev commented pointedly on the commune question during a trip to Poland last summer. Communes, he said, were organized in the Soviet shortly after the revolution. But the proper material and political conditions were lacking, and the result was a failure. The Communist Party abandoned them and went over to farm cooperatives, which provided the basis for the present collective-farm system. He repudiated the commune idea and also the idea of force or pressure to get peasants to give up individual farming. Thus, without publicly mentioning China, he put himself on record against the most publicized Chinese Communist achievement. One of his close associates said months before that the communes were old fashioned and would never work. "The only way you can get people to work," he said, "is to give them some kind of an incentive."

One aspect of the Chinese commune has gone quite without notice in the Soviet Union. This is the strategic implication of subdividing China into thousands of self-contained social and economic units.

"These are units for survival," an English traveler said on his return from Peiping. "The Chinese told me that if nuclear war came the rest of the world might be wiped out—but China would survive. Even if 200 million or 300 million Chinese were killed, the nation would endure. Whole provinces could be wiped out. But each commune would be independent, and some would be bound to survive."

Such thinking is alien to the Soviet philosophy that there would be no survival on either the Russian or American sides if nuclear war broke out.

The most notable contrast between Moscow and Peiping, of course, arises in the sphere of policy toward the United States. In contrast to Mr. Khrushchev's gestures of good will, the Chinese continue firm and unyielding. Although not a word of criticism of Moscow appears in the Peiping press, there are innumerable straws to indicate that the views of the two countries are not the same. Three days passed before the Soviet press was able to quote any Chinese reaction to the Eisenhower-Khrushchev exchange of visits. And Peiping's comment was merely a collection of cliches. When Mr. Khrushchev went to Peiping after his trip to the United States, further indications of coolness appeared. When President Eisenhower went to India, Pakistan, Iran, and other countries on his great pre-Christmas swing, the Moscow press reported his visit factually. The China press ignored it or hardly commented on his speeches.

There have been no signs of amelioration of artificial tensions. The Chinese press rails against the United States in terms more savage than were employed by the Soviet newspapers in the worst cold war days. Even on neutral ground Chinese refuse to shake hands with Americans.

There has been a succession of threats to peace from Peiping. First the threat to the offshore islands. Since then elsewhere in Asia. The Tibet rebels were brutally crushed. Fighting flared up in Laos. Then China menaced the Indian frontier. It was not accidental, surely, that the Moscow press repeatedly censored the Peiping communiques on the border dispute. Or that Moscow offered to mediate in the Indian-Chinese dispute.

Speaking of China's attitude of belligerence toward the outside world, a neutral diplomat stationed in Peiping said, "It is a fixation. Perhaps the leaders feel that there has to be an enemy to make the people work harder. Whatever the reason, you are the enemy."

Other diplomats from Asian countries spoke of growing hostility toward themselves and their countries, of an increasing tendency by Peiping to lump their governments all together as Western forces. India is not the only country with a border problem. Chinese have been quietly infiltrating north Burma for 2 years, and it remains to be seen how a new Chinese-Burmese border agreement will work out in practice.

"The Han people again think of themselves as a master race," a southeast Asian said. "They expect to dominate the world by sheer weight of numbers."

An observer in Peiping who is well acquainted with the Chinese Communist leaders said that so far as Chinese-American relations are concerned, "Definitions of normalization differ so sharply that real agreement cannot be approached for a decade or two. China sees normalization in the return of Taiwan, and I doubt if Peiping would exchange embassies until that occurs. So I think they have put off thoughts of the United States for the present.

"I think they believe not only as Communists but also as Chinese, who have seen empires come and go, that the days of Western capitalism are ending, that the United States with its bases all over the world is overextended and will have at last to pull in. I think they have waited a lot of centuries and can wait a decade or two without pain, especially when they have so many other countries to deal with."

This view was supported by Asian diplomats in Peiping. They said that China was pressing an active diplomatic and propaganda offensive, not only in Asia but beyond the frontiers of Asia into Africa and South America.

"These campaigns for international influence are being conducted quite independently of Russia," one diplomat said. "The Chinese want to build international prestige and international relations of their own which are not dependent on Moscow."

Should China win admission to the United Nations, this observer felt, she would seek to put herself at the head of an Asian-African bloc of states—the same bloc with which the Soviet Union is constantly flirting. In this circumstance are the Soviets really seeking to help China get into the United Nations? Many experienced diplomats for years have been skeptical of the sincerity of Soviet desires on this score.

One evening in Ulan Bator, I encountered a diplomat from Southeast Asia who had just come over from Peiping.

"It is curious," I said, "how warm I feel toward the Russians here, and I must say they are equally warm to me."

"I do not find that so strange," the diplomat said. "I think you are merely experiencing a sensation which will be far more common in the future. To those of us who watch the world from Peiping, there seem to be far more grounds for accord than for discord between America and Russia. What you and your Russian friends feel today in Mongolia will tomorrow be experienced in Gorky Street, Moscow, and Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington."

Putting all the evidence together, I did not find this too unlikely a statement.

If one could postulate—and this did not seem to be an exaggeration—a China of close to 1 billion population by 1975; if one could postulate that the China of 1975 would have an industrial potential approximating that of the Soviet Union on the eve of World War II—or better; if one could postulate that this China would be armed with nuclear weapons and long-range means for their delivery—rockets, for example; and if one could postulate a continuance of the present Chinese tendency to supernationalism, jingoism, and aggression—where then would the Soviet Union be?

Was it reasonable to suppose that the Soviets would find it any more comfortable to live with this colossus of the East than we did? Was she not already encountering formidable problems? Might not China in 1975 stand at the head of almost all of Asia's teeming hundreds of millions?

It was something to ponder. Out in Siberia the Soviet Union had mighty and magnificent plans for creating a new world. There were programs for joint development of the power of the Amur River, for friendship bridges to link the Soviet Union and China. But the statistics told another story. They told of the rapid northward march of the Han millions toward the empty Russian spaces. There seemed to be no possible plan whereby the Soviets could create more than a thin skirmish line of settlement in those eastern areas as contrasted with the surge of millions of Chinese.

Common sense and prudent statesmanship dictated that Russia would work as long as possible with China. But hours of decision must lie not too far ahead. The question of the atom weapon posed a thorny problem. It was reasonable to suppose that China had asked Moscow for atomic weapons and had been turned down. What did this mean? China would develop her own bomb. She would do it herself—as France had done. And once she had the bomb, who could say that she would not use it—as a threat against her neighbors? Against Formosa? Against South Korea? Where would she not use it?

If today the Soviet Union sought to play the middle role of mediator between aggressive China and neutralist India what would or could the Soviets do in the event of a new ultimatum from Peiping to Formosa?

These are questions on which the fate of the world is going to hinge in the next decade. It seems at least possible that the United States and the Soviet Union might reach a modus vivendi. The outlines of one could even be spelled out. But could we get along with China? To ask the question is to answer it. There seems to be every indication that we cannot get along. That we could not even establish diplomatic relations with her if we wanted to. For the minimum demand China would make against us would be the corpse of Formosa. And this we could never grant.

Balancing the evidence as it can be adduced up to now, one might conclude that the Soviet Union's problems with China are at least as great as our own. Both problems stem out of the fact that for the next century—or more—the shadow of the Han people is going to rise higher and higher over the world, looming once again as in the days of the Middle Kingdom which occupied the center of the earth. Not many years hence the Han people, equipped with modern technology, modern weapons, Marxist organization and nationalist spirit, almost certainly will stand at the head of the vast camp of Asia. Would the Soviets play a subaltern's role in a Communist legion led by Peiping? Not very likely. No one who knows Moscow can believe that the Soviets have invested nearly 50 years of excruciatingly painful work and sacrifice under Bolshevik leadership simply to play second fiddle to an even greater Chinese Communist power.

Another 10 years will certainly make the picture clearer. But already in Moscow you can find individuals who talk about the day when some balancing weight must be found against the new Goliath rising in Asia. And there are those who are frank enough to admit that the only power that would provide that balance lies on the other side of the Atlantic.

TALKS REVEAL BASIC CONFLICT OVER RELATIONS WITH WEST—KHRUSHCHEV VISITS PEIPING

(By Boris I. Nicolaevsky)

After Soviet Premier Nikita Krushchev's 4-day trip to Peiping, the significance of his United States visit can be more accurately gaged. To begin with, his experiences in Peiping were, in several respects, highly unusual. The peculiarities emerged from the outset, with the meeting of Communist chiefs at the airport. Outwardly, everything was as it should be by the standards of well-established Communist etiquette: All the Chinese party and Government leaders, headed by Mao Tse-tung, were there to meet the visitor's TU–114; pig-tailed schoolgirls with a huge bouquet; a ceremonial march past a guard of honor, etc. Then Mao and Khrushchev mounted a platform and the Soviet leader delivered a brief oration—not so much a congratulatory piece on the 10th anniversary of the Chinese regime (Khrushchev is well aware of the impasse into which the regime has pushed not only the Chinese people but their rulers as well), as a defense of his own policy, specifically, his trip to Washington.

Khrushchev's speech was addressed to "Dear Comrade Mao Tse-tung," and, as Pravda informs us, "was listened to with great attention" and "repeatedly interrupted by applause." However, nobody answered it. Mao stood near Khrushchev and smiled. Khrushchev himself was smiling too. And they were still wearing their smiles when a car carried them off along deserted streets. Nobody had been notified of Khrushchev's arrival and the "masses of the simple people" were not to be seen. In this respect, the usual procedure had been altered, no doubt deliberately.

This first meeting sounded the keynote to the 4-day reception: Khrushchev spoke, was listened to by the representatives of the ruling group, the "masses" were absent, and Mao stood by and smiled.

Khrushchev's main appearance was at the banquet meeting of the Chinese National People's Congress. This major address must be viewed against the background of recent statements made by leading Chinese officials in which they had vied with one another in attacks on the United States and promised to "liberate" Taiwan. The conventional sentences about the great achievements of the regime, interspersed with compliments to Mao, the "great son of the great Chinese people," were an oriental adornment to the main intent of the speech: to explain the motive behind Khrushchev's trip to America and to defend an agreement with the West.

Perhaps the most important aspect of the address was the way in which he defended his policy. Khrushchev set out to prove that there are many statesmen in the capitalist countries, especially in the United States who recognize the necessity of relaxing international tensions. And he tried to persuade Mao that President Eisenhower is one of these statesmen.

In the midst of the anti-American campaign that has been going on in China, these words sounded blatantly "revisionist." But even more important was what Khrushchev said about war in general and the Communist views of war. Although he reaffirmed the old Communist theory about "just wars of liberation," he declared himself opposed to it for the time being. He stated that "altogether, we do not need war. Nothing can be imposed by the strength of weapons if the people do not want it—not even a noble and progressive regime such as socialism." Mao, who again sat next to the speaker, again smiled and said nothing.

Khrushchev's leavetaking followed the earlier pattern of his appearances: He spoke, Mao smiled but remained silent. This was a flagrant breach of the generally accepted rules of courtesy: Both Khrushchev and Mao, of course, understood this very well. There was not even an official communique on the meeting. But Khrushchev kept drumming on the same themes to the very end. And when he got back to the U.S.S.R., he developed them again and again before Soviet audiences.

Khrushchev's speeches and Mao's silences attest to the tremendous importance of the argument they have now brought into the open.

The going has been very rough for Communist China. The 10 years of its existence have amounted to a nonstop crisis from which there may be no way out. Last summer, after lengthy arguments among the Chinese themselves and with Moscow, the extremist militarist faction triumphed in China. This group favored an aggressive foreign policy combined with extreme radicalism at home. Some of the measures carried out under this policy are reminiscent of Stalin's measures during the collectivization period, of the "Genghis Khan style" of breaking up the villages, as Nikolai Bukharin put it at the time.

But the Russian Genghis Khan was only a mild foretaste of the Chinese one. The Chinese Communist Party is the most militaristic in the world. It was organized by Mao in the army in the thirties, built around the army political sections and frontline Cheka-type tribunals during the lulls between military engagements in the civil war. From the very beginning, the Chinese party was reared in an atmosphere of irreverence for the human being and of limitless faith in the creative power of coercion. Thus, within a single autumn, last year, this militarized political party succeeded in herding 500 million peasants into communes.

The main idea behind the breaking up of the villages and reshuffling of the rural population was the preparation of the country's rear in case of a period of protracted wars and campaigns in which, in any case, the total population would have to participate. And the very first steps in this communization of the country were organically tied in with the aggressive military moves against Quemoy and Matsu, i.e., against the United States.

Even then this policy of Mao, the permanent advocate of aggressive plans, met with resistance from Khrushchev. The Soviet leader's irritation can be gaged from certain statements he made during his talks with Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, last winter.

Now, having completed his American visit, Khrushchev has returned to his insistence on a summit meeting which the Chinese had forced him to retreat from last year. It is unthinkable that Mao's views could have changed too: His stubbornness would rather indicate that he has no intention whatever of yielding to Khrushchev on basic premises.

It was these premises that Khrushchev set out to combat on Mao's own territory. In his speech on September 30, Khrushchev appealed over Mao's head to the Chinese Communists. This was the first shot fired in the internecine struggle on foreign policy, an attack on the Chinese militaristic orientation.

But the importance of this struggle goes well beyond China. Khrushchev's Peking speeches cannot fail to affect greatly the atmosphere within the Soviet Union, especially since he has continued to develop the same ideas in his speeches before Soviet audiences. Although he has not lessened his emphasis on the existence of two competing systems, the central idea of his campaign for peaceful cooperation with the West is: "We do not need war."

It is easy to see that this idea is being sown in very fertile soil. The peoples of the U.S.S.R. have suffered terribly from war and long for peace, as perhaps no other people on earth. And it is to such people that Khrushchev comes with his slogan: "We do not need war." Who can doubt the result?

But why is he now doing this? There are certain indications that the Mao type of aggressiveness is not confined to Mao's immediate subordinates nor, for that matter, to China alone. There are many Chinese Communists in Moscow and China is the topic of the day. The Soviet press is full of articles about China and letters written from China, all of them couched in the most enthusiastic terms. This is in accordance with strict prescriptions from above. The Chinese Communists follow minutely every word that is published in the U.S.S.R. about their country. The least departure from unreserved praise brings an immediate protest from the Chinese Embassy. The extent of this interference can be gaged from a fact for the accuracy of which I can vouch.

In 1958 the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences decided to start publication of a scholarly periodical devoted especially to the study of China. The very first issue provoked a protest on the part of the Chinese Embassy and a suggestion that, in the future, the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences submit manuscripts for Peiping's approval before publication. Soviet academicians are, of course, quite accustomed to censorship and an additional censor is not something to put them off. However, since Stalin's death, they have become somewhat bolder. And then, the matter also touched on national pride. A long internal discussion began; Khrushchev himself participated in the controversy and did not conceal his unflattering views of the Chinese. But the beginning of 1958 marked the apex of Chinese influence, and the Academy was not given a chance to refuse to submit to Chinese censorship. Nor, however, did it have to comply with the demand. It was simply decided that publication of the scholarly review should be suspended.

Of course, the above incident goes quite a bit beyond the usual range of Chinese demands, which is why it became the subject of so much discussion in Soviet academic and literary circles. But even the usual routine Chinese watch over Moscow's intellectual life is irritating. Moreover, the Soviet intelligentsia is by now quite well informed about the shape of things within the new China through sources other than the official reports. Many Soviet citizens have traveled all over China, and they are not afraid to report that the conditions at Chinese construction sites are no better, and at times worse, than those prevailing in Soviet labor camps.

Thus, Khrushchev's present assault on Mao's policy cannot fail to find support in the Soviet intelligentsia, among whom a pro-Western mood has been growing in recent years, while the Eastern attraction has changed to revulsion.

Of course, the antagonism between Khrushchev and Mao can easily be exaggerated. Mao has vital stakes in the Soviet Union, and the U.S.S.R. is determined to have the closest possible relations with China. Although China is often a nuisance to the Kremlin, it nevertheless enormously increases the latter's weight in international affairs. The two countries will never break with each other, although they struggle within the existing framework. Now the struggle has been brought out into the open and has been, as it were, made legal within that framework.

HOTBOX ON THE SINO-SOVIET EXPRESS

(By William H. Stringer)

WASHINGTON.—There is much speculation these days concerning relations between the Soviet Union and its elephantine ally, Communist China. Do tensions and strains exist? Or is the Moscow-Peiping express on the rails, and running smoothly?

Occasionally one encounters a rare slice of expert opinion, perchance from a Western diplomat and student of affairs who has seen service recently in Peiping. Such an expert's view is available today concerning the condition of the Sino-Soviet alliance. How run the relations?

In the first place, one must report that Peiping's rulers are just about as misinformed concerning conditions in the "outside world" as the West is poorly informed about conditions within the "hidden kingdom." In Peiping's severe interpretation of recent history, the Soviet successes in sputniks and luniks and ICBM's has shifted the world balance "all the way" to the Communist side. In the Communist rulers' view, the capitalist world will collapse now, with a very slight push.

Moscow, whatever the pretensions of its propaganda, has a different view. Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev finds considerable stability in the West, and certainly no pushovers.

Again, the romanticist Peiping estimate is that any alleviation in world tensions has come about solely because the West has been frightened into talking peace—but its intentions still are strictly dishonorable and abominable. Moscow's view is that the "forces of peace" are gaining in the Western countries, although some men still are advocating "wicked" policies—some of the advisers of President Eisenhower, for instance.

These differing assessments of how the world wags are the source of some of the tensions between Moscow and Peiping, in the expert view.

The Sino-Soviet alliance is not about to become unstuck, by any means. But there are sharp strains in foreign policy, to name one area. The Communist Chinese, motivated by their quixotic confidence in the imminent world triumph of the Soviet bloc went on a veritable foreign policy spree beginning in 1958. They broke off trade relations with Japan, to their own great disadvantage. They denounced Yugoslavia. They wrecked their own image in India. They absurdly mistreated and humiliated Asian diplomats in Peiping—among them some very influential citizens of free Asia—thereby building a harsh name for Communist China among a wide section of Asia's intelligentsia.

Finally Premier Khrushchev had to step in, in September 1959 and warn against adventurist foreign policies. He did not single out Communist China, but his admonitions were intended directly for Peiping.

So foreign policy strains do exist. Peiping was sulky throughout Mr. Khrushchev's Southeast Asia trip; Communist China is a sulky ally of the Soviet Union.

Then there are economic tensions. Peiping prates often of its "gratitude" for Soviet economic assistance. With Soviet aid, 300 factories are in course of construction. But Peiping's Moscow credits are exhausted, it has to repay its loans, and it is openly complaining about the grain it must export to the Soviet Union in a time of poor harvests. Moscow still will help its ally to achieve industrialization, but there are no "giveaways" in Soviet economic aid to Communist China.

There is also the ideological tension, which is mentioned frequently. Moscow, of course, resented Peiping's assertion that the barrackslike communes system represented a swift advance into pure communism. Soviet officials have scoffed occasionally in public at Peiping's assertion to be the fountainhead of Communist dogma. Since 1958, Peiping has shown greater public deference to Moscow's ideological role, but the competition is still there.

Finally, there are the nuclear stresses. It is difficult to verify dispatches saying that Moscow has refused to accord Peiping anything like maximum nuclear assistance. But the impression is that the Soviet Union has not given Peiping even a major power reactor yet, and certainly is not prepared to provide nuclear weapons for Communist China's army—because of the "irresponsibility" Peiping has displayed in foreign policy.

We can make too much of these stresses and tensions. The West may have oversold itself already on the population pressures allegedly forcing Communist China to look hungrily at the waste spaces of Siberia; there are still waste spaces available in western China.

But there is no doubt, according to expert opinion, that differing points of view, ideological disputes, economic pressures, and Moscow's concern not to overarm the Communist Chinese giant, do exist and do affect the Eurasian partnership. There are several troublesome hotboxes on the Moscow-Peiping express.

COMMUNIST AFFIRMATION OF UNITY HELD SOVIET - CHINESE COMPROMISE — PEIPING BACKED KHRUSHCHEV COEXISTENCE LINE BUT MOSCOW ACCEPTED APPEAL FOR RED'S GREATER MILITARY

(By Harry Schwartz)

The Soviet Union and Communist China appear to have compromised some of their ideological differences in the conference held at Bucharest last week.

The declaration of 12 ruling Communist Parties published yesterday indicates that Premier Khrushchev paid a price for the Chinese agreement to bow on the points he has recently been stressing. The price seems to be a mandate permitting them to encourage greater militancy among Communist Parties of the Western World.

The fact that a declaration on the matter was issued would seem to underline the importance both sides attached to the cleavage on ideology.

The careful wording of the Bucharest declaration and its omission of one key topic suggest that hard bargaining went on in the sessions of the Communist leaders.

CHINESE ACCEPT SOVIET VIEW

The Chinese accepted Premier Khrushchev's theses about the peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems and the possibility of avoiding wars. Both ideas had been attacked in Chinese writings in recent months, especially just before and after the summit meeting in Paris. The Chinese also pledged themselves to try to prevent war.

In return, the Soviet leader agreed to a modification of the Communist declaration signed in Moscow in November 1957. The change put armed Communist revolution on an equal ideological plane of respectability with the idea of peaceful capture of power in non-Communist countries.

Apparently no agreement was reached on whether the rightwing "revisionist" or the leftwing "sectarian" danger was now the greatest for Communist Parties. The topic is not mentioned in the Bucharest declaration. In the Moscow declaration of 1957 the "revisionist" line, exemplified by Yugoslav "liberalism," was declared the main threat, but in recent weeks Soviet statements have assailed the "left sectarian," or orthodox view, widely interpreted as being that of China.

The nature of the Soviet concession becomes apparent if statements in the Moscow and Bucharest declarations are compared.

In the Moscow declaration of 1957 the emphasis was on the possibility of peaceful capture of power by parliamentary means, except when capitalists oppose such a move. The declaration said:

"In the event of the ruling classes' resorting to violence against people, the possibility of nonpeaceful transition to socialism should be borne in mind. Leninism teaches, and experience confirms, that the ruling classes never relinquish power voluntarily.

"In this case the degree of bitterness and the forms of the class struggle will depend not so much on the proletariat as on the resistance put up by the reactionary circles to the will of the overwhelming majority of the people, on these circles' using force at one or another stage of the struggle for socialism."

The Bucharest declaration does not attempt to limit armed revolution to cases where violent resistance is encountered and simply says, after a partial quotation from the Moscow declaration about the possibility of peaceful capture of power:

"At the same time it is also necessary to proceed from the possibility of the working class gaining a victory for the Socialist revolution by nonpeaceful means."

The significance of this change of line is heightened by these facts:

Premier Khrushchev has said the worldwide triumph of communism is inevitable because Soviet successes in economic and technological fields will make it plain that the Soviet system is the best form of society. This implies the notion that such superiority makes armed revolution unnecessary. The Bucharest declaration now allows Communist leaders to conduct armed revolution without waiting for people to be convinced by Soviet successes.

Earlier this month an article in the Soviet newspaper Sovetskaya Rossiya castigated as past "leftist" attempts by the Spanish and Iraqi Communist Parties to conduct armed revolutions.

A key element in the Chinese propaganda has been the need for intensified struggle against the imperialists throughout the world, particularly in Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

INEVITABLE CONFLICT?

Former Under Secretary of State Robert D. Murphy has directed public attention toward one of the more intriguing questions of our generation. Addressing a meeting of the American Bar Foundation in Chicago, the retired career diplomat said "there is reason to believe that a certain cleavage may exist" between the two foremost Communist powers, Soviet Russia and the People's Republic of China, and that differences between them will inevitably grow.

It is not the first time that this view has been expressed in the Western World, but Mr. Murphy's unusually high qualifications and his careful discussion of the matter carry great weight. He points out, for example, that there is fundamental ground for such a conflict in the "historical and cultural differences" between Eurasian Russia and Asian China. To these may be added the practical problem of maintaining peace and tranquility along a 3,500-mile common frontier, particularly in the light of Peiping's policy of aggressive provocations along comparably long and difficult-to-defend borders with India and Pakistan. And, finally, he points to an issue of political disagreement, namely, Peiping's brutal application of the communal system in China after its failure and withdrawal in Russia and Yugoslavia.

Significantly, however, Mr. Murphy indicated his approval of State Department policy that we should do little or nothing to exploit these differences, that we should instead let them develop out of their natural causes. This is the wise course—if for no other reason than the danger that overt intervention might force the two Red powers into firmer alliance against what they obviously consider a common foe. Relatively undistracted on other fronts, they may find more time and reason for destructive competition within the Communist empire itself.

THE EAST WIND—THE CHINESE ARE OPENLY OPPOSING MR. KHRUSHCHEV'S POLICY TOWARD THE UNITED STATES

From Moscow and Peiping this past week have come the expected strains acclaiming "the everlasting, indestructible and fraternal alliance" of Russia and China on its 10th anniversary. By all accounts, the official junketing has had its strains, too. This has not been altogether Mr. Khrushchev's fault. True, he happened to be in India on the festive day, last Sunday. True, he is on a diplomatic passage designed to repair, as far as the Soviet Union is concerned, some of the broken bridges that Chinese policy has left behind it in Southeast Asia in the last 2 years. True, the Peiping home service thinks so little of this performance of his that it has kept all news of it from its listeners. Mr. Khrushchev wired his greetings to Peiping, of course. But that was not enough to persuade Chairman Mao or Mr. Chou to put in an appearance at the Soviet Embassy's celebration, or their own. From where Mr. Khrushchev stands, the east wind is blowing decidedly chilly these days.

The Chinese have set their faces against the Russo-American détente; and they have constantly said so in the past weeks. On January 21st the Chinese foreign minister, Marshal Chen Yi, condemned the United States for using the talk of peace simply as a cover for its policies of aggression. He did not dissent from Mr. Khrushchev's disarmament proposals, but insisted that "any international disarmament agreement which is arrived at without the formal participation of the Chinese People's Republic and the signature of its delegate cannot, of course, have any binding force on China."

The Peiping People's Daily, on the same day attacked President Eisenhower's state of the Union and budget messages for employing the "vilest" cold war language. This denial of the spirit of Camp David was repeated in the remarks by Mr. Kang Sheng, the Chinese observer at the Warsaw Pact conference in Moscow on February 4, in which he openly dissented from Mr. Khrushchev's estimate of American intentions. Mr. Kang's warning to his allies was immediately broadcast by Peking radio, although its influence could not be detected in the declaration that Mr. Khrushchev dictated to his Warsaw Pact allies.

The debate has gone on through the treaty celebrations which have, indeed, provided the Chinese with an exceptional opportunity to make themselves heard. In Sunday's Pravda, a three-column message for anniversary day from Mrs. Soong Ching-ling, widow of Sun Yat-sen, set out the Peiping objections before the Russian public. The contrast between Mrs. Soong's strictures on President Eisenhower's "mask of an envoy of peace" and Mr. Khrushchev's mildly favorable impression of the President will not be lost on Pravda's readers. In its anniversary issue, the Peiping People's Daily, claiming that "the aggressive nature of U.S. imperialism has not changed at all," indulged in an outburst of righteous orthodoxy:

"The people of our country will resolutely struggle to the end against all attempts by the imperialist and international reactionary cliques to split the solidarity of the socialist camp and the solidarity of the international Communist movement, as well as against modern revisionism—the main danger to the current international Communist movement."

While Peiping was revolving these thoughts, Mr. Khrushchev was making encouraging remarks on Indian industrial progress under the shadow of the Bhilai steel plant, the "symbol of Soviet-Indian friendship." Mr. Khrushchev is probably not a modern revisionist (within the ordinary meaning of that flexible term) and no one of his allies has dared to call him one; not yet. But to Peiping it is a galling experience to see Soviet aid providing one of the economic showplaces of its chief Asian rival. Indian applause for Mr. Khrushchev's assertion of the panch shila principles has a pointed ring. To the Chinese there is very little in his tour that can possibly go right for them. Even President Sukarno, of Indonesia, playing happy host to Mr. Khrushchev, has just arranged a visit to Yugoslavia.

After 10 years of diplomatic dependence on the Soviet Union the Chinese seem fully determined to show that they have a mind and will of their own. They do not share Russian sensitivity to the feelings of the uncommitted countries, nor do they appreciate the subtleties of Mr. Khrushchev's diplomacy. They are for the extremists everywhere: In the Caribbean, in Algeria, in black Africa. Inside the Soviet bloc they are for Herr Ulbricht and his kind (even to the People's Daily claiming that rocket weapons for East Germany are not only "fully justified but also necessary"), and it may be assumed that there are advocates of the hard line in more influential places than east Berlin who stand up, in turn, for the Chinese. To Peiping the U.S. position in Europe is directly analogous to the U.S. position in Formosa and, despite the limitations put on American action by the revised security treaty, in Japan as well. Any distraction from this basic conflict with the West, even those distractions prompted by Mr. Khrushchev's desire to avert mutual annihilation in a nuclear war, are severely distrusted in Peiping—as they may be in certain circles in Moscow.

The Chinese consider that their own policy toward India is the one best designed to hasten what they believe to be the inevitable triumph of the east wind over the west wind. They have seen no cause to repent of their actions in Tibet (which the Soviet Union has found considerable difficulty in supporting) or along the Himalayan border with India. It is difficult to suppose that, whatever else they expect of Mr. Khrushchev, they would have welcomed any open attempt to mediate between them and Mr. Nehru. This knowledge, and the knowledge that Southeast Asia was watching for any sign that he meant to overrule Chinese policy, seems to have tied Mr. Khrushchev's hands in India. He may have been able to encourage Mr. Nehru to invite Mr. Chou to Delhi (for which Mr. Nehru has now been accused of weakness by his opponents), but for the rest he had to keep to the tightrope, and his performance did not unduly impress the Indians.

Even so, the dialogue between Moscow and Peiping has not been altogether without effect on either side. Mr. Khrushchev's latest image of the western opponents of coexistence hoisting "the cold war ass" on to the roof of their house (meaning that it would fall through) may be considered a gesture to the anti-American critics. But it is very homely fun if it is. Fulfilling the letter of the Sino-Soviet alliance, the Soviet ambassador in Peiping, Mr. S. V. Chervonenko, has at last been able to get his tongue round the admission that the Chinese farm communes have "developed a momentous large-scale mass movement for increasing production." (Since the Chinese now claim to be engaging in socialist construction only, more open diplomatic recognition for the communes has become possible.) Mr. Chervonenko did, however, go on to improve the shining hour on February 14 by reminding his hosts that the Chinese People's Republic, which conducts a peaceful foreign policy, is one of the active initiators and organizers of the Bandung conference.

Was it the spirit of Bandung, or the imminent arrival of Mr. Khrushchev in person at Rangoon and Jakarta, that has just caused Peiping to settle its chief differences with Burma and Indonesia? It is a nice point. Chairman Mao and Mr. Chou, in their official message celebrating the treaty anniversary, sent to President Voroshilov and Mr. Khrushchev on February 13, seemed more conciliatory than their underlings. They had approving words for the Warsaw Pact declaration and believed that the cause of peace would score further successes—although still with the proviso that "the enemy of peace may work to obstruct and sabotage."

What is most significant about these rifts in the alliance is not that they exist, but that they should be made so apparent. China, for all its ambition and pretension, is not yet a great power. The pace of its economic development, even allowing for the frequent and judicious revision of statistics, is great, but still not great enough to let China stand by itself. The Chinese, on their own admission, have no more than 50,000 tractors in agricultural production; in the five chief industrial cities more than half the workers are still engaged in manual labor. The most heartfelt thanks by Peiping in the past week have been for Russian economic aid, particularly in the 290 major projects that are "the core and sinew of China's industrial construction."

It is still unquestioned in Peiping that Russia and China have to live together; there is meaning in the assertions that the alliance of 850 million is unbreakable and inseparable. But that is not to suppose that the Chinese do not mean to have an increasing say in deciding the diplomatic orientation of the alliance, or that they do not count on finding fresh support in Moscow if Mr. Khrushchev returns empty-handed from the summit.

SOVIET EXPERTS LEAVING CHINA

(By K. C. Thaler)

LONDON, August 15.—Relations between the Soviet Union and Communist China have deteriorated to such a point that Soviet technicians and advisers are leaving China "by the trainload," it was reported today.

The reports came from Yugoslav correspondents in Peiping and obviously were passed by the strict Chinese Communist censorship. There were similar reports in French circles of wholesale moves of Russian technicians.

There was no official confirmation in Western capitals, which have only scanty sources in China, but the Yugoslavs gave too many details to be ignored. The Yugoslavs have been among the closest observers and critics of China.

FALL PARLEY EXPECTED

It generally has been known that severe ideological differences have erupted between Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev and China's Mao Tse-tung over interpretation of the ideological teachings of V. I. Lenin and Karl Marx, but the Yugoslav reports indicated they were deeper than believed.

Communist diplomats in London reported last week that Khrushchev is expected to confer with top Chinese Communist leaders in the fall when he goes to the North Korean capital of Pyongyang for his first visit. They called it a fence-mending trip.

The chief difference between the two is that Khrushchev believes modern events and weapons have done away with Lenin's teaching that war between the Communist and capitalistic nations is inevitable. Khrushchev says there must be "peaceful coexistence."

The Chinese Communists follow the Lenin teachings to the letter and are said to believe that a nuclear war even might aid the Communists because there are so many of them they would survive—that such a war might even be desirable.

FRENCH PRESS HAS REPORT

The Peiping correspondent of the official Yugoslav newspaper Borba and of the official new agency Tanjug reported that Soviet experts were leaving daily from Peiping by special "long trainloads." He said the official reason given was that their contracts had expired.

A French press report from Peiping mentioned large-scale departures of Soviet technicians from Peiping, central and south China, and Shanghai.

Chinese technicians have been training in Moscow and there have been reports some of them have been returning to Peiping.

SOVIETS SAID TO END HELP TO RED CHINA—BELGRADE HEARS EXPERTS ARE BEING WITHDRAWN—SIGNS OF WIDE BREACH SEEN

BELGRADE, YUGOSLAVIA, August 14.—Soviet experts working in Communist China are returning home, according to the Yugoslav newspaper Borba.

In an article from its correspondent in Peiping, published over the weekend, Borba said special trains with Soviet experts and advisers were departing daily from the Chinese capital.

The conclusion drawn from the carefully worded article is that Yugoslav observers in Peiping consider the exodus indicative that Chinese-Soviet relations are troubled by more than an ideological controversy. It is clear the Yugoslavs think that the Soviet Union may be contemplating a complete withdrawal of its experts and advisers.

Peiping's explanation of the Russians' departure was that their terms of service had expired, but Borba's correspondent noted that "different versions" were circulating in Peiping, throwing a more serious light on the situation.

Observers in President Tito's capital see a direct connection between the mass departure of Soviet experts and the current Chinese Communist campaign to increase production by sending high-ranking officials and other highly qualified white-collar workers to labor in the pits and factories.

Borba's correspondent wrote that this drive was aimed at easing the difficult situation in which many factories and mines were placed by the departure of Soviet advisers—an indication that perhaps the exodus carried out without much preparation.

So far the brief reports received here have been limited to descriptions of "long trainloads" of Soviet specialists leaving the Chinese capital and to hints that the official explanation could not be entirely accepted.

For the Yugoslavs the mass departure of Soviet experts must ring a familiar bell, and it is perhaps for that reason that they are casting doubt on the official version.

In 1948, before the outside world became aware of the differences between Moscow and Belgrade and while the controversy was moving toward its climax, the Soviet Government ordered the withdrawal of its technical advisers from Yugoslavia. Yugoslavia later was expelled from the Soviet bloc.

SINO-RUSSIAN RIFT GROWS—MOSCOW BARS TWO PEIPING MAGAZINES FROM CIRCULATION IN SOVIET UNION

(By Marguerite Higgins)

The Soviet Union, in an unprecedentedly pointed action against its Communist Chinese ally, has within the past 2 weeks halted publication and distribution inside Russia of both a Peiping weekly and a monthly magazine.

This, according to reliable information reaching here, is the latest in a momentous train of events that, in Washington's view, has brought the downward spiral of Peiping-Moscow relations to the most significant low in postwar history.

Although officials stop short of predicting a Yugoslavia-like expulsion of Peiping from the Communist bloc, there is a consensus that the struggle for ideological and strategic power within the Communist bloc between Red Chinese Chief Mao Tse-tung and Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev has reached unforeseen proportions.

Of special significance is the exodus from Peiping of Soviet economic technicians which according to preliminary diplomatic advices, appears to have been ordered by Moscow in reprisal for repeated Communist Chinese defiance of Russian leadership.

As of yesterday, there have also been independent confirmations reaching here of reports telling of "trainloads" of Soviet experts leaving for Moscow.

It is pointed out that the Soviet economic technicians were in the process of helping the Red Chinese construct and learn to run some 290 industrial complexes and that any sudden exodus might, therefore, gravely interrupt the pace of Peiping economic development.

Among the quarrels between Moscow and Peiping have been the question of how far to go along the path of peaceful coexistence. It seemed that at the spring Bucharest meeting of the Soviet bloc Peiping had been brought around to public acceptance of the Soviet thesis that "war is no longer inevitable," but since that time various Peiping personalities have not been able to resist taking potshots at the Khrushchev version of the need to avoid nuclear war.

In the past Moscow and Peiping have often smothered their quarrels with blankets of obscure ideological language. But the Russian act of halting the distribution of two Communist Chinese periodicals inside the U.S.S.R. holds meaning that cannot be camouflaged.

CHINA-SOVIET DIFFERENCES LIKELY TO GROW

(By Murray Marder)

Communist China and the Soviet Union for the foreseeable future will continue close cooperation, adjusting to growing differences between them, the Central Intelligence Agency has concluded.

This intelligence assessment was drafted before last week's Communist bloc harmony meeting in Bucharest, which would appear to add support to the CIA's findings.

In the Bucharest meeting, Moscow and Peiping patched together an accord-of-sorts on their ideological differences over peaceful coexistence of communism and capitalism. Many Western experts regard the Soviet killing off on Monday of the Geneva disarmament talks as the first price of the internal Communist bargaining at Bucharest, turning at least a temporarily colder shoulder to the West.

A CIA study of Western and Communist strengths, made public yesterday by the Senate-House Subcommittee on Economic Statistics, said:

Peiping's emergence with the the Communist bloc as a second ideological center "cannot but affect Moscow's hegemony in a system which claims to be based upon a universal scientific truth and thus demands a single source of leadership and direction."

PROBLEMS WILL GROW

But the prospects are that the dominant characteristic of the Sino-Soviet alliance in the foreseeable future, said the CIA "will be continued close cooperation of the two powers in what they conceive of as their vital struggle against the non-Communist world."

"Difficulties and problems" between Moscow and Peiping will probably grow, said the report, as Communist China's rapidly increasing power reduces Moscow's leverage upon it.

The mutual advantage of their ties, nevertheless, said CIA, apparently will oblige them to make adjustments between the revolutionary fervor of Red China and the Soviet Union's overall objectives.

In releasing the CIA report, in a 50-page pamphlet, Representative RICHARD BOLLING, Democrat, of Missouri, subcommittee chairman, said it was submitted by CIA Director Allen W. Dulles in response to a request by Senator JACOB K. JAVITS, Republican, of New York, in a hearing last November.

EASTERN EUROPE SITUATION

In Eastern Europe, CIA reported, "the future outlook is for the maintenance of Soviet control" and "Soviet hegemony in the area will continue to constitute a positive benefit for the political interests of the U.S.S.R."

But maintaining Soviet influence there also "will be beset with continuing difficulties."

"Even though the U.S.S.R. has largely succeeded in repairing the damage caused by the Hungarian revolt and Polish riots of 1956 and the short-term outlook is for less instability, it appears likely that, over a period of time, there will be a gradual attenuation of the more overt forms of Soviet control in Eastern Europe."

The Soviet Union "may feel obliged to grant the satellite regimes a large degree of autonomy in the hope that this will allay popular hostility and avoid acts of defiance."

Especially timely in the report is a section on the growth and status of Communist Chinese power.

The report stated:

Red China's industrial production has been expanding at "an annual average rate of about 23 percent." Its gross national product "nearly doubled" between 1950 and 1958.

FROM GLOBAL STANDPOINT

Industrial production in Red China, "less than 7 percent of that of the U.S.S.R. in 1950, may have grown to about 16 percent by 1958 and, by 1965, could increase to about 25 percent."

From a global standpoint, the report found:

"On balance * * * the Western Powers gain more from their alliances than the Soviet bloc does from its bloc and pact systems."

However: "With an annual average rate of growth projected for the 1959–65 period of about 1½ times that of the aggregated Western alliance, the growing economic strength of the Communist bloc is a formidable challenge to the West. In addition, due weight should be given to the relatively greater power of Communist governments to direct the expenditure of national resources."

In military terms, the armed forces of the Soviet satellites and Red China provide "over 50 percent of the total active strength of the armed forces of the Sino-Soviet bloc * * *" but bloc members "are far more dependent on the U.S.S.R. for advanced weapons than our allies are upon the United States." The U.S. allies provide almost three-quarters of total armed forces in the Western alliance, about two-fifths of the aircraft and about three-fifths of the total allied naval strength.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield me 1 minute of his time?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Ohio be allowed 1 minute, the time to be charged to neither side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Ohio is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Minnesota for the presentation of this information this morning. I think it is extremely vital. I concur in the reasoning and the analysis which the Senator from Minnesota has made of the subject. I am especially grateful because it is one of the rare instances in which we hear pointed out the difficulties of the Soviets.

I do not want to become overoptimistic to the point of abandoning our responsibilities, but the fact is that the Soviet Union has numerous difficulties, and the Senator from Minnesota has pointed out one of the very grave ones today. I commend him for doing so.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Ohio. I am doubly appreciative because of his very careful and intense study of the whole subject matter of the Soviet Union and the advances of international communism throughout the world.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from Minnesota.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage of employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I desire to join with the distinguished Senator from Florida in his struggle to establish certain principles as represented by his amendment, and to resist what I believe to be certain ominous implications and complications in the bill now before the Senate.

In the first place, as I read it, the bill now before us, which was reported by the committee, contains an astounding innovation in the field of Federal control over private enterprise. It has been pointed out heretofore by the Senator from Florida and other Senators—but I should like to refer to the point again—that the very phrase in section 4, on page 5 of the bill, now includes for the first time, I believe, in any serious, substantial piece of legislation, an attempt on the part of the Federal Government to take jurisdiction in any field of enterprise engaged in an activity affecting commerce.

I do not believe it can be overemphasized that that includes, as has been admitted on the floor by proponents of the bill, almost any conceivable business activity in which anyone can engage in this country. It is the most all-inclusive blanketing under Federal control of private enterprise and private local activities which I think has ever been proposed. Perhaps I should not say "proposed," but it is one of the most all-encompassing efforts to include all business activities under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

It is no excuse and it is no safeguard, in the long run, to say that the activities which the Federal Government proposes to take under control in the new wage-hour proposal are limited by dollar volume. The dollar volume has nothing whatsoever to do with the principle involved in the bill. The principle is the concentration of power and of authority over American enterprise, clear down to its lowest echelon in the bureaucracy in Washington.

Again I say that to place a dollar limitation on this does nothing to protect against the principle which is sought to be established in the bill. For that reason, I think the bill is ominous and threatening; and if the bill were enacted in its present form, I believe it would constitute one of the longest steps toward statism that could be taken in this country in peacetime.

For that reason, among others, I oppose the bill in the form in which it came from the committee; and I support the Holland amendment.

Mr. President, we talk a great deal about the protections of the Constitution and the safeguards it affords the people of the United States. When the Constitution was first ratified, and for a good many years thereafter, it was considered that it contained some rather rigid safeguards which protected the rights of the individual against encroachment by the Government or by bureaucracy. But as the years have passed, and especially in recent years, I believe we have seen the courts from time to time interpret the provisions of the Constitution in such a way as to put on the Constitution a totally different concept from that which I believe the Founding Fathers and the authors of the Constitution had of it.

The 10th amendment of the Constitution has repeatedly been referred to in this debate. I shall not go into detail at this time, because of the time limitation which is in effect. But I submit that the safeguards intended to be established by the 10th amendment to the Constitution certainly have been circumvented in many, many ways in the last few years, under the guise of economic, social, or political expediency. The 10th amendment originally stated, and still states, in express words that the Federal Government possesses no powers except those specifically given to the Federal Government by the Constitution, and that all other powers are reserved to the States or to the people, respectively. But I submit that little by little, through "emergency legislation," through legislative fiat, through court interpretations, the safeguarding provisions of the Constitution are being chipped away, until I believe that today it is apparent that those safeguards are at a dangerously low ebb, insofar as concerns protecting the people of the country against the encroachments of government.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield when I conclude, if sufficient time is then available; or, if not, perhaps a little additional time may be made available for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK. Very well.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Constitution of the United States was not set up to protect the people against the people or to protect the government against the people. Instead, the Constitution was set up to safeguard the rights of the people against the possibility of an overbearing or a rapacious government or government officials. But in the pending measure it is proposed that Congress take away a privilege and a right which has always been considered to be that of local responsibility—that is to say, the right to conduct business within a State, in accordance with State laws, and without interference by the Federal Government.

In this measure it is proposed to take away that right, and to bring under the blanket of bureaucracy, under the blanket of Federal Government authority, every economic activity in the country. In fact, I believe it was pointed out on the floor of the Senate only a few days ago that even the major sponsor of the bill could not point out even one economic activity in the country that would not be under the basic purview of this measure, despite the fact that the bill contains a dollar limitation as regards the sales of the products of a particular business. Nevertheless, the principle to which I have referred is set forth in the bill; and it is destructive and it is ominous and I think it should be stopped.

In conclusion, let me say that I am not necessarily opposing a minimum wage; but whenever we set a minimum wage, it has an effect all through the economy. Whether the individuals it affects in every case are completely subject to the law makes no difference, for it has that interrelated affect throughout our economy; and every time we raise the minimum wage, in the affected areas its effect goes right down to the little businessman and to the little enterpriser, to the man who has to begin at the bottom and struggle to rise, and in many cases it places on him a burden which he cannot meet or sustain, and which makes it impossible for him to develop successfully under our system.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I thank the Senator from Florida. I had hoped to complete these remarks before now.

Mr. President, if anyone thinks this bill will not affect the cost of the production of crops in the Middle West, if anyone thinks this bill will not affect the price of everything the farmer buys, because of increased labor costs, increased machinery costs, and increased costs of supplies, all one will need to do will be to wait a very short time after the bill becomes effective, and then he will find that out.

Today, we hear a great deal about the cost-price squeeze to which the farmer is subjected, and under which he is suffering. He suffers under it because escalation in labor costs has been so great that it has increased the cost of everything the farmer has to buy, to the point where in many cases his profits are being squeezed down to virtually nothing or to actually nothing; and this measure will only compound that felony.

So, Mr. President, let no one who is interested in the farmer or in agriculture fail to realize that this bill will be a body blow to agriculture and will further reduce the farmer's opportunities for profits and prosperity.

Mr. President, what is true of the effect of the bill on the farmer is also true of the effect of the bill on all small businesses. But in our Nation, we hope to preserve the opportunity of the small enterpriser to develop his own business and to grow, without control by bureaucracy or by the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional time yielded to the Senator from Iowa has expired.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator from Iowa, in order that the Senator from Ohio may ask his question and in order that the Senator from Iowa may respond to it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is recognized for 1 additional minute.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Without subscribing to the implication contained in my question, if we thus pump up the cost of living and also decrease the value of the dollar and the value of the thrift savings, and thus weaken the position of the entire economy, including the position of the farmer, would it not be possible to help the farmer, on a subsequent day, by giving him more subsidy?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Well, Mr. President, I do not think handouts, bounties, and subsidies help anyone in the long run.

Mr. LAUSCHE. But the cycle could go on, and we could do it, could we not?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The cycle could go on and on; and it will go on if provisions of this kind are continued. In that event, it will go on and on and on, until all the economy of the American people will eventually be at the mercy of Government bureaucracy. And at that point our Nation will become a static one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNAMARA in the chair). The Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I yield 20 minutes to myself.

Mr. President, it is just too bad that Senators who are intending to vote for this measure will not subject themselves either to the responsibility of hearing the opposition or to the opportunity to speak in support of their own proposal. I cannot help but think of an old saying: "None are so blind as they that won't see; none are so deaf as those who won't hear."

Mr. President, this is a revolutionary proposal, and it is a proposal which, just as surely as we are here in this Chamber today, involves inflation in greater degree than we already have, involves destruction of opportunity and savings, involves destruction of the purchasing power of the savings of millions of our people, strikes a blow at the elderly people of the Nation, strikes a blow at the very people who are sought to be aided and benefited, because of the fact that their real wages will not go up; and strikes a blow at all the people in the country, because the price increases which are going to have to be passed on will hurt us all. There just is not any other conclusion to be reached if anyone will look at the facts.

The truest thing that has been said on the floor today by one or two Senators who have spoken in support of the measure was the statement by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], who said that, in his opinion, those who support this measure are going to be hurt politically rather than helped. I join very strongly in that expression, Mr. President. I realize that the political implications do not apply to many Senators, and they do not care about it, but it is going to affect some, and we are all going to be affected by it. I saw the application of that first hand in 1949, when we went through the same debate here, and my then distinguished colleague from Florida supported the great increase in the wage and hour bill which is involved here. He had to run for reelection the next year, and he was very soundly beaten. From my personal observation, I know the position which he took upon this bill, affecting great masses of our people, was in part responsible for the result in that rather historic race.

And why not? Here is a bill which reaches over State lines into fields which have never before been preempted or even approached by the Federal Government. Here is a bill which will surely increase the cost of living for every person, and therefore will destroy, in large measure, the independence of many elderly people who thought they had adequately prepared and safeguarded themselves for their old age by living frugal lives up to this time.

Mr. President, I said that this approach is revolutionary, and it is. It not only slaps down the reservations and exemptions suggested by the original sponsors, President Roosevelt and Senator Black and Representative Celler in 1938; it slaps down those same reservations made by an overwhelming vote of the Senate and the House in 1949, when the matter was again reexamined, upon debate much more adequate than is possible under the conditions obtaining in this short extended session, when everybody is wanting to get home, and when a great many wish to spend as much time as they can on political discussions rather than discussions of this bill.

Mr. President, the bill proposes to put in the scrap can the precautions of all the early sponsors of this measure and, instead, extend it into a field which has heretofore been safeguarded as the intrastate field of business. The proponents say it is safe to break down the exemption of retail and service establishments within the States because, as they say, we are only jumping on big businesses, businesses that gross $1 million a year or more.

There are several observations I want to make on that point. First, when we look at the original bill, S. 1046, introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts, which was converted into the bill which is now before us, the measure of the amount which a retail business could carry on and still be under the wage and hour bill was fixed at $500,000, instead of $1 million, and the measure for laundering and that type of business, instead of being $1 million, was $250,000. The coverage of that bill was sizably larger, encompassing some seven and a half million new workers. The subcommittee reported this bill to the full committee with an even larger coverage of 11 million workers. The full committee, after working its will on the measure, and adopting some degree of conservatism to their approach, reported it as the committee bill with a coverage of some 5 million new workers.

We are told by both introducers of the bill, the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Oregon, in their opening statements, and the idea has been made clear ever since, that it is their wish to extend this measure at the earliest possible time to cover some more of the workers of the country and to invade to a greater and greater degree the field heretofore protected and preserved as intrastate business.

Now to come to this $1 million figure: May I remind the Senate, first, that the measure of small business as announced by the Small Business Administration, which is an arm of this Government, is a business which does no more than $2 million a year. So, every business that does below $2 million worth of business a year is included—embracing a variety of businesses—and every business that is included in this proposed bill under $2 million is a small business, within the classification of that arm of our Government which deals specifically with the protection of small business.

Aside from that, let me remind the Senate that a $1 million gross a year business is applicable to many small businesses, because of the nature of their businesses. For instance, in the case of automobile dealers, it does not take too many sales, even without regard to their service departments, to bring the automobile dealer to a point where his total gross for the year is $1 million. The same thing is true of agricultural equipment dealers. The same thing is true with respect to supermarkets throughout this Nation which are owned by one person and which operate as independent supermarkets. Some of the finest supermarkets in my State are independent organizations. Some of the finest supermarkets everywhere one may go are independent organizations.

They of course do a volume of business of a million dollars or more, or they could not do business on the basis on which they operate.

Mr. President, that is the first point I wish to make in this matter, for it illustrates the fact that the bill would not deal exclusively with big business, but would also deal with many businesses which we would all regard as small businesses.

There are other provisions of the bill which would result in the long arm of the Federal Government reaching further and further. For instance, there is a definition in the bill which imposes the minimum wage provision against enterprises rather than establishments. Senators will find in the bill the definitions of "establishment" and "enterprise." To put it briefly, the establishment is a single unit. The enterprise is a group of establishments or units which are doing business together. They do not have to be under the same ownership, Mr. President. The bill makes it very clear that if they conduct joint operations in various fields they may constitute a single enterprise.

Mr. President, I know there are many businesses in this Nation composed of small units. For instance, the variety store in our part of the country generally is a small business doing $60,000 or $80,000 worth of business a year in each unit, scattered throughout the countryside, in the county seat towns and small towns throughout our area.

Mr. President, in addition to such organizations as that, we have within our State of Florida—and I am sure they can be found in other States—two organizations of independent grocery stores which not only do their buying jointly—and the bill contains a provision that joint buying will not of itself make of them a single enterprise—but also have joint advertising, joint accounting, and other joint activities which I think would make of them, and they fear would make of them, an enterprise under the provisions of this bill. Those organizations are small grocery stores which have united in these associations which are doing jointly the various things which will help them.

They have united in an effort to successfully compete with big business, yet the bill would impose the threat against them, "You will either be included within 'big business' and be made subject to the minimum wage provisions, or else you must abandon the effort you have made to enable you, as very small businessmen, to compete successfully and to stay in business permanently against the competition from bigger businesses with which you are confronted."

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If we accept the principle in the bill that the retail stores, which are strictly local in character, now should come within the jurisdiction of Congress in this respect, will it not hasten very substantially the move toward concentration of all business into fewer and fewer larger and larger corporations?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is correct. Not only would many of these small businesses come immediately under the provisions of the law, because of the provisions of the bill, but also, under the general definitions which are used, Congress would be invited—the Senator knows how it would be urged from year to year—to go further, so that more and more small local businesses would be brought under the law. The aim of some is to go all the way down to the end of the line in bringing local business under the act.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is that not inevitable under the competitive system which we have? If we adopt this principle, with only the dollar amount making the distinction, those which are slightly above the amount, in competition with those slightly below, will demand that the limit be lowered and lowered and lowered, or else they will be put out of business. There is no doubt who would win in such a contest.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is of course correct. We would find that some of the people now objecting to the bill with all of their strength would come back to Congress, because of new and unfair competition which would be forced on them by the provisions of the bill, to insist that we go further than is sought at the present time.

I wish to read at this time a colloquy between the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT] and Mr. Meany, the president of the AFL–CIO, at the hearings in the 85th Congress upon this bill, or one like it, which had in it the same definition affecting business which is found in this bill, which causes so much trouble.

Senator ALLOTT asked Mr. Meany:

Can you conceive of any business that is not within that definition?

Mr. Meany answered:

Well, of course, if you are to take the position that we were going by this clause without anything else in the bill, of course the answer is "No, there is no business that wouldn't come under it," but naturally the other portions of this bill do place limitation—

And so forth, referring to the money and other items.

In other words, Mr. Meany's idea, as shown clearly in the record, is to get everyone in under the definition in the bill, and then we will decide from time to time who should be specifically exempted, not as a matter of right but as a matter of grace and generosity of an all-powerful Government. I resent that approach with all the strength I have. I do not think it is proper. We should not hold the sword of Damocles over the head of smaller and smaller businesses, knowing perfectly well that they will be threatened by the new setup.

Mr. FULBRIGHT rose.

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield further to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I was thinking, a moment ago, when the Senator from Iowa was talking about the Constitution, that I used to study constitutional law. As a matter of fact, I used to teach it for a while. Since the new theories have been advanced by the Court, I am afraid that is becoming a rather weak reed to lean upon. We have to rely now upon the good judgment of the Congress in matters of policy.

Really the policy involved in connection with the bill is whether we are going to push the business of the country more and more into large corporations. When we look around the world we find that many of the people who advocate this bill at the same time protest about statism, about communism, about the State dominating the lives of its people. We even consider having a war over this matter. We do not wish to have a war, but we protest that we shall have one rather than submit to that kind of dictation under communism.

I do not wish to inject any inflammatory communistic ideas into the debate, but this represents a speeding up of the process by which all individual enterprises are gradually absorbed into such huge national enterprises that they become almost identified with the State itself. It seems to me the bill represents a rapid step toward that.

Mr. HOLLAND. I think the Senator is exactly correct. I approve of the Senator's philosophy. I am sorry he is not still teaching constitutional law, with people listening to his teaching.

Unfortunately, we are in the midst of this drifting away from private enterprise, away from individual responsibility, away from the rules of fair competition, getting more and more into statism.

The bill is supported by those who believe—I think they are wrong in their belief—that all we have to do to get a proper result is to lodge the Federal Government with responsibility in a certain field, and then the problem will be completely cured and corrected, and we need not worry any more.

To the contrary, making the Federal Government ever larger is one of the things which is contributing to our difficulties and making them more severe, because the Government is getting so big that no one man can begin to grasp its implications. With that bigness comes inefficiency, extravagance, confusion, and overspending, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Since the Senator mentions the difficulties and confusion, I will say that one of the outstanding characteristics of our Government now is that while we ought to be giving our attention to matters of security and international affairs, where we face the real threat to our whole system of the free way of life, we are occupying ourselves with trying to take over some activities which our States can more efficiently administer. The States are much closer to them and ought to administer them. The States cannot become involved in foreign relations, for there is no authority for the State governments in that field. The States, however, have the right and the authority under the Constitution, I think, to deal with matters such as we are discussing. The Congress is talking day after day now—and undoubtedly will next spring, because there will undoubtedly be a further demand—about this problem.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It strikes me that this is a good example of how we are diverting our attention from our main concern.

Mr. HOLLAND. I certainly appreciate those words of caution from the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. I wish more Senators were present to hear them.

I remind the Senate that earlier today time was taken by my distinguished colleague the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] to speak of some of the vital difficulties in Latin America, and by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] to speak of difficulties which confront us in the Orient, difficulties to which we ought to be giving our best thought, effort, and consideration. This we are not permitted to do because we are speaking largely to empty seats in our effort to support and sustain sound principles of constitutional government, and economical principles of government organization, which will be abandoned if the bill is passed.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. The Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] made a statement a few moments ago of which I did not get the full import. He referred to the time when the minimum wage law was enacted in the 1930's.

Mr. HOLLAND. 1938.

Mr. BUSH. I believe the Senator from Florida said that at that time the sponsors of the bill were particularly anxious to foreclose any possibility that intrastate commerce would be invaded by this type of legislation.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is correct. The message of President Roosevelt made that point very clear. I quoted the message in my earlier remarks.

Mr. BUSH. Did the Senator quote the message from the then President?

Mr. HOLLAND. I did. I also quoted from the opening speech of Senator Black, who is now a Justice of the Supreme Court, and who handled the bill, which speech was even more clearly to that point.

I also quoted from a colloquy in the House, both in 1938 and 1949, when the renewed action was taken, in which the distinguished Representative from New York, Mr. CELLER, now the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, expressed the same sentiment. He did not merely advocate exclusion of intrastate business. He specifically identified retail stores and service establishments as such intrastate business which should be protected, and which could be handled effectively only by State action.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I am glad that the Senator from Florida has made that point very clear in the RECORD, which I shall consult to find out what he did say, because I think it is important that we realize that the invasion of intrastate commerce, as outlined in the bill of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], is a modern phenomenon and was not a part of the original conception of the Federal minimum wage law.

Mr. HOLLAND. Not only was it not a part of the original concept, but it was warned against, guarded against, and guaranteed against.

Mr. BUSH. And forbidden.

Mr. HOLLAND. That warning was given in 1938 with the passage of the law. When those administering the law began to whittle it down by regulations, and the courts did likewise by strained interpretations, the Wage and Hour Administrator himself reported in the 1949 Congress that congressional action was required.

We did not follow his recommendations, because he wanted extended coverage. But we did renew in exactly the same form as was originally intended the exemption which again is sought to be renewed in this act.

Unfortunately, then, in 1949, as now in 1960, the committee handling this subject had come forward with recommendations for greatly increased coverage of the act, and for striking down intrastate business in these two fields, which has always been regarded as intrastate business. The reasons for regarding them as such still exist, because they serve a local market. They handle local problems. They follow local customs as to wages, local customs as to hours, and local customs as to type of service, which are not alike in the various States, and which are so unlike that 28 or 29 States have passed widely varying legislation in this field, as they have the right to do. They passed legislation which varies to accord with the philosophy of the people of those several States. There are no two alike.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator is offering the amendment. I like it because it attempts to keep the Federal Government out of the interstate regulation of purely intrastate business. I do not want to give the Senate the impression that I am opposed to a Federal minimum wage, which I am not, provided that it is in interstate commerce, in which two or more States are involved, or involves bona fide interstate commerce companies operating within two or more States.

I think the Senator is performing a real service in offering an amendment that will eliminate the possibility of the long arm of Federal control reaching into matters that are strictly intrastate in character.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank my distinguished friend. I wish to say, as I have stated heretofore, but perhaps not in these remarks today, that our amendment seeks to accomplish those objectives. I say "our" amendment, because several Senators have joined with me, including the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER]. Many others would have been glad to join also. Those were the ones whom I did request to join, and not one of them declined.

We are all trying to preserve the exemption in exactly the same form in which it has existed since 1949, when it was restated to cover exactly the same purpose which was intended in 1938. We have added no single item of change in the exemption except that under our proposal we are making the Administrative Procedure Act applicable to this field. We did so because the committee itself had recommended it, and we felt that the reasons assigned by the committee were sound, because they said that if the bill passed, new regulations were to be issued, of a much more sweeping character than any we had had before, and that the industries affected ought to have an opportunity to be heard on any proposed regulations under the Administrative Procedure Act before they became effective.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. I should like to ask the Senator if he construes the Constitution of the United States in the way that I do, namely, that under the 10th amendment, the National Government has the power to enter certain fields only in areas which are specified in the Constitution?

Mr. HOLLAND. That has always been my understanding. That understanding has been rudely shaken by some of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court, but I wish to say to my distinguished friend that none of those decisions apply to situations such as those created by the bill, and that until the facts related to any particular business would go to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court entered its ruling, no business in many classifications could be certain whether or not it would be included within the provisions of the bill. There is no doubt about that. That is admitted by the sponsors of the measure.

Mr. THURMOND. Is it not true that the basis for the bill is the interpretation of the commerce clause of the Constitution?

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes. The Supreme Court in decisions on bills affecting other fields has used the words "affecting commerce" as a proper interpretation of the commerce clause in those fields.

Mr. THURMOND. Article I, section 8, of the Constitution of the United States sets forth the powers of Congress:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;
> To borrow money on the credit of the United States.

Now we come to the phraseology which is pertinent to the pending question:

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

Is not that the clause in the Constitution under which the proponents of the bill pretend to have the right to enter this field?

Mr. HOLLAND. It is the clause under which they attempt to enter the field. I cannot say that they pretend to do so, because I believe they have the conviction that they have that right. So far as I am concerned, I do not join them in that conviction. Nobody knows whether the Court will join them in that conviction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. I yielded myself 10 additional minutes only a minute ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That time has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. The first 10 minutes or the second 10 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty minutes have expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. I do not believe the Chair heard me when I yielded myself 10 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. HOLLAND. On the interstate commerce subject, I believe there is some doubt as to what the Court would do. I stick to my feeling, as announced already on the floor, that I believe the Senate has as much duty to stand by what it regards as a sound interpretation of the Constitution as has any other Federal agency.

In addition to that, the question of constitutionality, which will not be decided for years as to any one of these businesses, falls into the field of the wisdom or unwisdom of the act. It is in that field that I believe it would be unwise for us to act along the lines proposed in the bill.

Mr. THURMOND. Is it not clear that Congress, a branch of the National Government, has the power to enter into interstate commerce matters but not intrastate matters, or matters within a State?

Mr. HOLLAND. That is my concept of the meaning of that clause.

Mr. THURMOND. Is there any provision in the Constitution which gives any authority for the Government to act otherwise?

Mr. HOLLAND. There is not.

Mr. THURMOND. In addition to the proposed act being in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, there being no authority for it, would it not also be a serious threat to the economy of the States of this Nation?

Mr. HOLLAND. I would.

Mr. THURMOND. Would it not create the threat of unemployment in the Nation among a great many young students who are employed on jobs during the summertime and in the afternoons?

Mr. HOLLAND. And among married women and widows, also.

Mr. THURMOND. Yes, among a great many widows, and among a great many people who are not capable of holding full-time jobs, or who are employed only part time, because industries will employ only those who are the strongest physically and the most able mentally, and therefore the enactment of the bill will drive the others out of work. Would it not cause great unemployment among various categories of personnel, and create great hardships among the people in the States of the Nation?

Mr. HOLLAND. It not only would, but it does. In the period following the original enactment, and the enactment of the increase in the amount of the minimum wage, as shown by reports of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and as shown by the survey made and published by the University of Michigan, and by every other approach to this matter, unemployment was caused by the act and by the increased coverage from time to time.

Mr. THURMOND. If the Senator will permit me to do so, I should like to give an illustration in my home city of Aiken, S.C. There is a small drugstore there which is operated by a young man. He gives employment to 20 people. He has a great many high school girls and boys working in the store. He gives them employment in trying to find something for them to do and to help them. He also has some college boys and girls, as well as some old people, helping him.

He has informed me that if the bill passes he will be forced—not that he wants to—to reduce the number of employees in that little drugstore in Aiken, S.C., from 20 people to 8 people. That means that 12 people will be out of employment.

Does not the Senator believe that this would be a hardship on the little drugstore manager who is striving to give employment in a little city like Aiken, S.C.?

Mr. HOLLAND. Of course, the question answers itself. It is a hardship. It is a hardship which would be created in almost every community in the United States.

Mr. THURMOND. Would not the bill, if passed, by its very nature cause little enterprises to go out of business, and therefore only big businesses would be able to compete, in the end, thus resulting in the destruction and closing of those businesses and the development of big business, the very thing that we are trying to avoid in this country? Does not the Senator feel that that will be the ultimate result if we keep projecting and raising the wage scale to a point where little businesses cannot meet competition, and only big business can, and that it will be only a matter of time when the little businesses will see their doom?

Mr. HOLLAND. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator for his helpful comments.

Mr. THURMOND. I compliment the Senator on the fight he is making. The bill goes to the very foundation of the economy of this country. If we keep injecting the long arm of the Federal Government into the people's business, and telling them how to run their business, I fear for the future of the country. It will be only a matter of time until we will destroy the incentive to go into business. The Federal Government will be giving orders as to whom we can employ, whom we can discharge, and what we must pay. We are destroying what has made this country great. I congratulate the able and distinguished Senator from Florida for his fight. He deserves the commendation of the citizens of the United States.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank my distinguished friend.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I should like to say to my esteemed friend from Florida and my good colleague from South Carolina, with respect to the little drugstore which has been mentioned, that it will not be covered under the provisions of the pending bill. That is important to remember and it has been so stated again and again on the floor of the Senate. The constant reference to small business being driven to the wall by the passage of this bill is not a valid argument.

Mr. HOLLAND. If I may interrupt the Senator at that point, the Senator from West Virginia was not on the floor a few moments ago when I mentioned the fact that the bill covers not only establishments doing a million dollars gross business, but also enterprises with respect to all kinds of trade associations and other joint arrangements between stores, so as to reach down to cover very small organizations. I am just about to get to section 3(t)(4), which covers retailers handling between $250,000 and $1 million of business, if there is anyone in that business who is in interstate commerce. Therefore, the observation of the Senator from West Virginia, while true in part, by no means covers the full field in which the bill operates.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The Senator from West Virginia offered a realistic amendment in committee which was accepted and which is included in the proposed legislation. That provides for a $1 million cutoff. I believed there was a need for a sensible and practicable approach to the problem, just as I thought there was a need in 1938 when Congress passed the original bill.

I know there are hardship cases. I know of many instances of small business enterprises which, very frankly, need to be encouraged. So I am in the position of having recognized the need for a continuance of certain exemptions, I also recognize that we hear expressions of unwarranted alarm. I further believe the coverage of the bill does not warrant such an assertion as that made by the distinguished Senator from Florida, to the effect that our economic strength would be weakened if this measure becomes law.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I will yield in a moment. I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, does the Senator from Florida desire that such time as may be desired by the Senator from West Virginia be taken from the time of the opponents?

Mr. HOLLAND. I appreciate the Senator's offer, because I wish to go as far in the colloquy as the Senator from West Virginia wishes to go.

I may say, before we go any further, that not only does the bill through its definition of "enterprise" make certain that many small businesses will be included when they are cooperating in trade associations, grocery groups, variety store groups, and various other kinds of organizations with which the Senator is familiar. It also would bring under coverage businesses under section 3(t)(4). I have never been allowed to make the statement about what that does. Section 3(t)(4) deliberately carries the field of coverage down to establishments grossing $250,000. The only difference between the conditions which apply to that section and the million-dollar figure is that if one employee is in an interstate commerce activity—for instance, if a person is doing the ordering from out of State, or if a person is handling the unloading of goods received from out of State, or if a person is doing anything which the courts have held to be interstate commerce, as the courts have held as to so many things, then the whole business and all of its employees will be covered. I call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to something he may have overlooked, namely, that in the very report of his committee it is stated that section 3(t)(4) would bring in 1 million new employees of businesses having gross annual incomes of $250,000 or more.

I commend the distinguished Senator from West Virginia for having asserted himself in raising the required limitation from $500,000, as it was originally in the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] to $1 million. I wish his kindly inclinations in that regard had gone even further; nevertheless, I commend him.

Mr. President, I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I wonder if the distinguished Senator from West Virginia will give us his interpretation of the amount of gross business which would have to be done by a drugstore before it would come under the coverage of the bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH. If the drugstore were a part of a chain enterprise——

Mr. THURMOND. It is not a part of a chain.

Mr. RANDOLPH. If it is a business separate and distinct unto itself, it would have to do a business of over $1 million a year to come within the coverage of the bill.

Mr. THURMOND. Does not the Senator realize, if he knows very much about the drug business, that a business of $1 million a year can be achieved in a reasonably small drugstore? The little drugstore I am speaking of, in Aiken, S.C., which is not more than 20 or 25 feet wide, and possibly 40 or 50 feet deep, would be covered if it did business of $1 million a year.

Mr. RANDOLPH. With due deference to the Senator from South Carolina, I believe that if he will check the drugstore in question, which he has used as an example, he will find that that store is doing a gross business of under $300,000 a year.

Mr. THURMOND. In reply to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, I may say that I have already checked with that drugstore and have been told that it has a tremendous turnover of goods and does a little over $1 million of business a year in very small quarters. It is able to do this because it handles so much goods by employing so many persons that its business is tremendous. But this results in a narrow profit margin; and if a sufficient profit cannot be made, it will be necessary to lay off some of the employees.

Based on the position taken by the distinguished Senator from Florida, the proprietor of that drugstore will find it necessary to lay off 12 employees, and even perhaps close his business.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Florida.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I promised to yield first to the Senator from West Virginia, in order to pursue the discussion. I understood the time would not be charged to me. I shall yield first to the Senator from West Virginia; then I shall yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I respect the viewpoint of the Senator from South Carolina. I am sure the statement he has made is one which he believes is factual in every degree. I realize he is against this measure, regardless of the outcome of the vote on the Holland amendment. But I trust and believe his viewpoint will not prevail, on this amendment or on the bill itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I understand that the time for this discussion is coming out of the time of the opponents of the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, there seems to be some confusion on the part of the Parliamentarian as to whose time is being used. I think it has been noted that 5 minutes was yielded. I am willing to yield 5 minutes of our time now in order to have the colloquy continued.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Pennsylvania is generous. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I cannot embrace a philosophy, although I listened most carefully, which holds that a business grossing $1 million-plus a year is not a substantial business. The cutoff point placed in the bill as reported, and offered by the Senator from West Virginia, was a very sincere attempt on his part and subsequently on the part of the committee to recognize that small business deserves protection and encouragement. Yes, there are hardship cases—yes, even emergency cases—which I certainly recognize.

So far as the Senator from West Virginia is concerned, he will say that in the Subcommittee on Labor and in the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare he supported amendments to provide the exemptions which he felt were so necessary.

I did that in 1938, when we were beginning to write this principle of better working conditions into the Federal statutes; at a time when overlong working hours, and much too low pay were, to say the least, injurious to our economy. They were detrimental, not only to laboring men and women in business and industry, but also to our system of free enterprise.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I appreciate the comments of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia. I only wish his attitude, which was effective in 1938 in placing adequate exemptions in the law then, had been extended now. But I congratulate him upon raising the exemption from $500,000, in the original bill, to $1 million. I assume he played some part in raising the figure of $250,000 for laundries, which was in the original bill, to $1 million. I think that was a step in the right direction.

However, I may say to the Senator from West Virginia, with a twinkle in my eye, I think a great injustice still remains in the bill, in that it proposes, unwisely, in my opinion, to write a standard which has not been applied to this field heretofore, in the use of the words "affecting commerce"; and it proposes to exercise a new, hitherto nonexistent Federal jurisdiction, which may or may not be upheld by the courts as to any particular business. This injects uncertainty into the lives of many businesses and business people, which may not be determined for many years to come.

I think the committee probably did not realize—and I say this, again, without criticism—the tremendous importance of these two additional provisions in the bill, which I have mentioned, the one which brings in many new enterprises.

Does the Senator know whether, for instance, the Rexall Drug Stores would come under the amendment? If he does not know, I hope he will look into the question. Does the Senator know whether a group of retail grocery stores in Florida—the FROG Stores, which follow the practice of common buying, common bookkeeping, common advertising, and other common acts, would come under the amendment? I have studied the bill very carefully. It provides that buying alone will not bring a store within the bill; but the bill does not say what will bring stores under its provisions.

Until the courts rule, a number of small, fine independent grocery stores in that organization in my State—and there is one other such organization which I could mention which is in my State—will not know how to safeguard themselves.

I regret that any move is sought to be made in a direction which will add further uncertainty, further difficulty, and further expense to small, independent merchants.

I have mentioned, also, section 3(t)(4) which applies to enough businesses to warrant the report's statement that a million new employees will come under the law, and they would be any businesses doing a business of between $250,000 and $1 million annually.

Mr. President, I yield, with the understanding that the time of the opposition will still be employed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield 2 more minutes for the completion of the colloquy.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I shall be frank with my earnest and energetic colleague from Florida, as I wish to be with all my colleagues. But I wish to be especially so at this point, because I know of no Member of this body who is more intensely interested in ascertaining the possible effect of this legislative proposal.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The Senator from Florida wishes to know the details and/or implications in that connection; that is very helpful, indeed.

In the committee we had some discussion concerning the word "enterprise." We became satisfied that, in trying to draw lines so as to protect small business, the $1 million enterprise test would be satisfactory in most instances.

I say to the Senator from Florida that the committee felt that it should come to the Senate with a bill which, in principle, was sound. It was our position, of course, that if, in the process of taking final action on the bill, amendments which seemed to be valid were submitted, we would give to them most painstaking consideration. That is my attitude now, as well as my attitude then.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia is always fair.

In conclusion, I wish to read the definition of the word "enterprise" which is set forth in the bill. In that connection, let me say that if any chief justice of any court anywhere in the United States could tell us what it means, without making a great deal of study of it, I would be very much surprised.

That part of the bill now reads as follows:

(r) "Enterprise" means the related activities performed (either through unified operation or common control) by any person or persons for a common business purpose, and includes all such activities whether performed in one or more establishments or by one or more corporate or other organizational units but shall not include the related activities performed for such enterprise by an independent contractor: Provided, That within the meaning of this subsection a locally owned and controlled retail or service establishment shall not be deemed to be other than a separate and distinct enterprise by reason of any arrangement, which includes, but is not limited, to an agreement (1) that it will sell, or sell only, certain goods specified by a particular manufacturer, distributor, or advertiser, or (2) that it will join with other locally owned and controlled concerns in the same industry for the purpose of collective purchasing—

I spoke of that a moment ago, Mr. President—or (3) that it will have the exclusive right to sell the goods or use the brand name of a manufacturer, distributor, or advertiser within a specified area, or by reason of the fact that it occupies premises leased to it by a person who also leases premises to other retail or service establishments.

Mr. President, I have practiced law a good many years. I do not claim any distinction in that field; but I have worried quite a while over that definition, and I have read with interest—but without obtaining any real answer—the parts of the report which comment on this part of the bill.

I wish to say now that I do not know what that part of the bill means. Furthermore, unfortunately, some of the Florida business people who think their businesses would be held to be "enterprises" within the meaning of this bill, do not know what that part of the bill means, either. In fact, they cannot know what it means until the Court passes upon it. When the Court does so, it then will act—unfortunately—upon a set of facts or circumstances which will apply to one particular organization, but very likely will not apply to any other organization. So, Mr. President, there is real difficulty in this field.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, this is a rather futile colloquy. A moment ago the Senator from Florida spoke of the twinkle in his eye. He is always in good humor as he is always in good conscience. I have a high regard for a certain lawyer; but when one asks him about a legal matter, he will say, "The law is very clear on that point. You come back tomorrow, and we will discuss it." That situation often occurs because he wishes to study the statutes before really committing himself.

Certainly, in this area of legislation, we are attempting to find the answers. I would not want to appear in the role of a teacher. I stand here as a member of the committee committed to confer and to counsel with the Senator from Florida and all Senators. The language the Senator from Florida has read to the Senate, I believe to be fair, insofar as the meaning of words is capable of certainty. The bill makes a clear distinction between the truly independent store and that which is one link of a chainstore system.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I yield myself such additional time as may be required.

I believe that I promised, first, to yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am sorry if I have interrupted.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I was going to say—in line with the comments of the Senator—that the evil of the bill would be to make a change from the present standard or definition of "interstate commerce"—vague though that has been under the court interpretations—to a new standard, namely, $1 million of business. Furthermore, in the future there may be a tendency to change from that standard to a lower one, depending on the locations and circumstances involved. Perhaps in a few years' time there will be a desire to lower the $1 million standard to $400,000 or $500,000. That indicates the evil of acting in this way in changing the present interpretation of "interstate business," vague though it now is.

Furthermore, a man in a southern town who does a business of $125,000 a year would be in an extremely difficult position, as a result of the enactment of this bill. In such small stores there are only two or three employees, and some stores of that sort have daily sales of only $50. But under the provisions of this bill, those stores would have to pay $12 a day, which would be the highest salary paid in many little towns. Those problems would arise in connection with the local operations.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I notice that in the report two illustrations are given as to just what the term "enterprise", as used in the bill, means, when it is applied to certain sets of facts. I now read that part of the report:

Thus, where a single company owns 10 retail stores and is also engaged in the construction of houses, the "enterprise" for purpose of the bill will consist of the 10 stores and any activities related to them. The sales of the construction business would not be included in the annual dollar volume in determining whether the $1 million test has been met, and the construction employees would not be covered by this provision even if the $1 million test were met since they are not engaged in the "related activities" of the retail stores.

Assume in the same case, the company also owned and operated a wholesale business. In that case the wholesale business would be related to the retail stores only if it served the company's stores. The wholesale sales would be counted and the employees in the wholesale operations would be covered if the tests were met. But if the wholesale operations did not serve the retail stores, they would not be "related activities"; their sales would not be included in measuring the $1 million, and their employees would not be covered merely because they worked for the same company even if the "enterprise" consisting of the retail stores and the activities related to them met the $1 million test.

Mr. President, from reading into the RECORD those two illustrations, I think it quite apparent how innumerable would be the different sorts of relationships, how close would be the distinctions, and how simply impossible it would be, in many, many instances, until the court of last resort had spoken, to determine whether the activities were such as to come within the purview of the bill.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I was absent from the floor for a little while; and I do not know whether the Senator from Florida used, in the course of his debate with the Senator from West Virginia, an illustration which I have in mind. However, in order to give the Senator from West Virginia some idea of what the small stores in his State will be faced with, let me say that many small stores band together in maintaining buying offices in manufacturing centers such as Chicago, St. Louis, San Francisco, and Los Angeles. It is impossible for a small store to afford the cost of maintaining, entirely by itself, such a buying office in a large center; and, therefore, some of the buying offices represent as many as 500 small stores.

A buying office in Chicago, St. Louis, or any other large center would be a means whereby the stores which belong to that organization would come under the purview of this act, even if the store concerned did not do $1 million of business.

I could recite hundreds and thousands of cases throughout America, in my knowledge of retailing, where that is true. In my own case, we are well over the $1 million mark. We belong to a buying organization that does over $1 billion a year in its buying for stores. It is directly related to retail operation. That is a situation which businesses all across this Nation are going to find themselves up against. It is one of the "sleepers" in this bill. I know the language reads well, until one gets to reading what is meant.

There are other things that can happen. Sometimes several stores will band together for advertising purposes, so they can acquire mats, for example, or parts or service. I mention it as another field where a store doing under $1 million worth of business can come under this act by virtue of the fact that it belongs to an organization whose total business would be over $1 million.

I am not sure of this example, but I have a feeling it would apply: If a small men's store in Wheeling, W. Va., handled a brand make shirt and he made an agreement with the manufacturer as to price and methods of promotion, and an agreement was made to keep the stock at a required level, in return for giving him advertising and sales assistance, while I cannot say for certain, I have thought that these small shops would come under the act through that relationship.

I think the enterprise part of the bill, together with the change my friend from Arkansas has indicated in the definition "affecting commerce," are the two most dangerous parts of the bill. In fact, I feel they are the two that have to be changed if we are going to come up with any minimum wage bill.

Mr. HOLLAND. I appreciate the able and effective colloquies of my distinguished colleagues. I desire to close for this occasion by simply saying that anybody who thought the $1 million limitation applied here and was effective just has not read or analyzed the bill, because it is so very clear that, both under the enterprise feature and under the section 3(t)(4) feature, many businesses having operations under that figure will be brought into the field of operation of this act.

The report shows that 1 million new employees would come in under 3(t)(4). While I realize that is a good-faith estimate, in order to give us an estimate or figure, I do not see how anybody can make any such estimate with any degree of certainty. Until many decisions have been made and many cases have been submitted, nobody will know for certain what is the field of possible, or even probable, coverage of this measure. But the committee majority itself, with frankness and candor—and I appreciate that frankness and candor—has stated that, in their judgment, 1 million workers would be included, and not one of them would come from a business which does $1 million gross, because they will all come between the $250,000 floor and the $1 million top.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. With respect to the $1 million figure which the Senator from Florida has just mentioned, I am informed by the Senator from Massachusetts that that figure comes from a report of the Department of Labor, headed by Mr. Mitchell, present Secretary of Labor.

Mr. HOLLAND. May I say to my distinguished friend the Small Business Administration, which is an agency of government specially created to serve small business, fixed $2 million as the limitation, rather than $1 million.

Mr. CLARK. May I say to the Senator from Florida that the inconsistencies of the various administrative agencies of the Eisenhower administration are well known to all Members of the Senate on this side of the aisle.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield the floor at this time and suggest the absence of a quorum, to be charged to neither side——

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator withhold his request?

Mr. HOLLAND. I am glad to.

Mr. CLARK. May we understand that this colloquy is to be charged to neither side? I will ask the Senator if it was not agreed with Members of the Senate that we would not vote until 2 o'clock.

Mr. HOLLAND. That is right. I expect to speak later, but I wanted those in opposition to speak, and I did not want to preempt the remainder of my time.

Mr. CLARK. That is the reason why I put the question. So far as I know, there are only two or three Members of the Senate who wish to speak in opposition.

I will ask the Parliamentarian how much time remains in opposition to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine minutes remain in opposition.

Mr. CLARK. I would consider it unlikely that we would use all that time. How much time does the Senator from Florida think he will need?

Mr. HOLLAND. I expect to use all my time. I think I have 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. President, how much time do I have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, since we are not permitted to vote until 2 o'clock under the unanimous-consent agreement, I wonder if we could find some other Members of the Senate who would like to talk about something else for 10 or 15 minutes. We operate under unique and strange rules in this body. Would my friend prefer to have the time taken up with a live quorum? I imagine it would take up a lot of time.

Mr. HOLLAND. I was told by the majority leader he expected to suggest the absence of a quorum, chargeable to neither side, when all time had elapsed. If the Senator had something else to offer, he could introduce it into the RECORD.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I call for volunteers. [Laughter.] Hearing none, I can think of nothing else to do except to join my friend in suggesting the absence of a quorum, which I suppose after a while we will call off.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, to be charged to neither side——

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his suggestion?

Mr. HOLLAND. I withhold it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I am a little confused about the time situation. If I remember correctly, the Parliamentarian said the Senators in opposition have 49 minutes left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. GOLDWATER. And the Senator from Florida has 20 minutes left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is correct.

Mr. GOLDWATER. We do not have that much time until 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time was extended by unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. CLARK. It was also said the opponents of the amendment would not use the full time.

Mr. HOLLAND. As one of the offerers of the amendment, the Senator from Florida would feel that, under the rules of parliamentary discussion, he would be entitled to close the discussion, and had expected to do so.

Mr. CLARK. I quite agree.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Florida therefore reserved the 20 minutes, with the hope that the Senator from Pennsylvania would use the intervening time either on this subject or on such other matters as may be of concern to the Senator from Pennsylvania or any other Senator.

Mr. CLARK. I wonder if the Senator from Florida would agree that we should call for a quorum.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for 1 minute, to make a short statement and an insertion in the RECORD?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent I may yield with the understanding the time will be charged to neither side.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thought the Senator desired to use up his time.

Mr. CLARK. Not that badly.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I can make my statement at any time. I thought the Senator was seeking volunteers.

Mr. CLARK. I encourage my friend to speak now, and I assure him the Senator from Florida will not require that the time be charged to either side.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not wish to delay the proceedings.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will not delay the proceedings, because we are not allowed to vote until 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania or the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CLARK. It is my understanding that the Senator from Florida and I are agreed that the Senator from Arkansas may speak without the time being charged to either side.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the Senate would have to agree to that.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Arkansas may proceed for not in excess of 15 minutes——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I need only 1 minute.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Arkansas may proceed for 1 minute, and I am only too glad to yield the time from the time of the opponents to the amendment, of whom I know the Senator from Arkansas is not one.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

DAVID L. COHN'S COMMENTS ON WORLD EVENTS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, there are many among us who can consider historical events and, with generous applications of hindsight, pinpoint errors of the past. Too few among us have the ability to assess history, view present conditions, and apply foresight in the attempt to chart our course for the future. Mr. David L. Cohn, author, lecturer, correspondent, and long a sage commentator on world events, is endowed with this ability.

I wish to invite to the attention of my colleagues a series of articles written by Mr. Cohn. The first, entitled "The Road Not Taken," was printed in the March 1940 issue of the Atlantic Monthly. The second, entitled "First in War—Last in Peace," was printed in the Northern Virginia Sun on Wednesday, July 27, 1960. The third, entitled "You Can't Eat Democracy," was printed in the June 1946 issue of the Atlantic Monthly. As the editor of the Northern Virginia Sun stated, "Rare is the commentary on world affairs that is as fresh and pertinent after 14 years as on the day it was written."

These articles, the first written over 20 years ago, are as timely today as they were then, and I commend them to the reading of my colleagues. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Atlantic Monthly, March 1940]

THE ROAD NOT TAKEN

(By David L. Cohn)

"I have heard that hysterical women say
They are sick of the palette and the fiddle-bow,
Of poets that are always gay,
For everybody knows or else should know
That if nothing drastic can be done
Aeroplane and Zeppelin will come out,
Pitch like King Billy bomb-balls in Until the town lie beaten flat."

—W. B. Yeats, 1938.

One afternoon in November 1937, I walked into the gallery of a London art dealer with Edward Wolfe, the well-known South African painter. A droopingly tall man stood there looking at Wolfe's paintings. My friend introduced me to his friend, and without further ado I asked him: "When do you think war will begin in Europe?" This naive query enraged the tall man, and he shouted at me with the exquisite modulation of tone achieved only by public-school Englishmen when, on rare occasion, they are moved to shout: "Only Americans think there will be war in Europe." In the sudden silence, amid the genteel hush that seems perpetually to brood in dealers' galleries and funeral homes, I could hear the parenthetical phrase my new-found acquaintance had politely omitted from his reply—"and fools."

That man was Mr. J. M. Keynes. He, perhaps more clearly than any other person, had foreseen the consequences of the treaties that concluded the World War. His vision was buttressed by an incomparable knowledge of world economics; he had been for years economic adviser to Britain, and latterly, it was rumored, to Washington. I felt, therefore, that the man whose foresight had been so prophetic in 1919 could not fail after 20 years' experience of postwar Europe to note that the forces were heading toward war, and my confusion was the greater because I had just come from America, where freshmen as well as veteran observers had long predicted a new European war. I retired to bind up my wounds before a portrait of a Russian lady, and reflect upon my two-sentence conversation with Mr. Keynes.

If, I said to myself, Mr. Keynes should prove a poor prophet, that is of no importance to anyone save perhaps himself. But what if his point of view should be the expression not of private prophecy but of British opinion? Then it might have consequences tragic for the world. In July 1937, he had written: 'Our capacity for cunctation is one of our most powerful and characteristic weapons' (New Statesman and Nation). So it is, I told myself, and the little gallery seemed suddenly filled with ghostly "Amens" from the throats of the World War dead. Britain had employed this capacity—formerly called 'muddling through'—throughout the dangerous summer of 1914, until half the world was at war and sad-eyed Sir Edward Grey, looking down into the street from his chancellery windows, noted that the lights were going out all over Europe and concluded they would not come on again in his time. Yet there are those—and they do not speak entirely without authority, although they address themselves to one of the maddening 'ifs' of history—who say that if Britain had plainly told Germany she would fight if Belgium or France were invaded there might have been no war.

I remembered that Britain, under George III, had used her weapon of cunctation until His Majesty's North American Colonies were lost to the Empire. And more than a century later—such are the ribald vagaries of history—the Lost Colonies (by now no strangers themselves to cunctation) fought victoriously in a European war which, if it did nothing else, preserved the British Empire. But what if America had continued to debate beyond that desperate April of 1917 when England was within 2 weeks of starvation? Would Mr. Keynes have then in 1937 been looking at pictures in London, a free subject of his King? Or might he have become a vassal of Kaiser Wilhelm II?

Where has cunctation led Britain during the past decade? From the Japanese invasion of Manchuria in 1931 until September 1939, when she was again at war with Germany, it has led her from diplomatic humiliation to diplomatic humiliation, from loss of prestige to greater loss of prestige, and finally into conflict on a gigantic scale. The time came when Japanese could machinegun a British Ambassador with the impunity of an Iowa farm boy potting a robin; when British guarantees to little countries ("An Englishman's word is his bond") were not only valueless but actually the seal of death; when the Prime Minister who had been bullied in Munich as applauded in London; when "peace in our time" was briefly enjoyed along with the strange concomitants of colossal arms budgets and an unparalleled conscription in the absence of war. At the rainbow's end of 10 years of evasion, hesitation, and concession there is the pot of dynamite in the North Sea.

II

All this belongs to history. But merely to parade the diplomatic mistakes of Britain—mistakes for which men are dying and women are weeping—would be cheap and without point unless the errors that have been made can be employed to prevent greater errors. Americans must remember—we who send up barrages of words behind our remote battlements—that for several years we have sneered at Britain's refusal to fight under circumstances of extreme provocation, or to say firmly under what conditions she would fight. Some of us have even descended to the abysmal vulgarity of calling the European struggle a "phony war." We have recently been reminded, however, by Jean Giraudoux in Paris, that the Allies, even though we may cry for madder music and stronger wine at their expense, have no intention of shedding their blood merely for the amusement of an audience 3,000 miles away.

But while we have been busy pointing out what we take to be the mistakes and stupidities of British foreign policy, every American has now become a volunteer Paul Revere galloping up and down the countryside warning his neighbors against the dangerous subtleties of British propaganda. Thus the British are at once far more stupid than we and far more intelligent. Deriving from our rustic suspicion of the international city slicker is the legend that, whenever an American diplomat sits at the council table with a British diplomat, the American rises without his shirt. In our theology a Past Grand Commander of the Knights of Pythias, representing the United States at the Court of St. James, is inevitably of a lower mental order than a British diplomat whose boiled shirt is emblazoned with the Garter. But since we have for several years also believed that the Briton lost his shirt whenever he sat down with a German, Italian, or Japanese, we can only conclude by our own definition that we rank at the bottom of the list in intelligence. It would seem to follow, therefore, that we ought to retire our entire diplomatic corps to a home for the feeble-minded or concentrate them in Haiti among a people given to both fantasy and tolerance.

What meaning has the European war for us in 1940? Compare 1914–17 with the period 1939–40. Now, as then, most of the world is at war. Again we are neutral; again our neutrality is tilted to favor one side; again we contemplate the consequences to ourselves if that side should lose. What are some of those consequences? President Roosevelt pointed them out to the Nation in his recent annual message to Congress:

"We must look ahead and see the possibilities for our children if the rest of the world comes to be dominated by concentrated force alone—even though today we are a very great and a very powerful Nation.

"We must look ahead and see the effect on our own future if all the small nations throughout the world have their independence snatched from them or become mere appendages to relatively vast and powerful military systems.

"We must look ahead and see the kind of lives our children would have to lead if a large part of the rest of the world were compelled to worship the god imposed by a military ruler, or were forbidden to worship God at all; if the rest of the world were forbidden to read and hear facts—the daily news of their own and other nations—if they were deprived of the truth which makes men free.

"We must look ahead and see the effect on our future generations if world trade is controlled by any nation or group of nations which sets up that control through military force."

In other words, we must look ahead to the time when Britain and France may be crushed, and a large part of the world may fall under the dominance of Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia. Looking ahead, we conclude that no matter what may happen in Europe, and eventually perhaps to ourselves, we will not raise effective hands to affect our destiny. Ninety-six percent of the American people, according to a recent Gallup poll, are opposed to our entrance into the European struggle.

Note how closely both in attitude and in unanimity we are following the demonstrably bankrupt British policy of cunctation. We will not, we say, fight unless our vital interests are attacked. It follows, therefore, that the possible disappearance of Britain and France, along with their empires, is not a vital interest of America. Remember how Britain acted from 1931 to the end of 1939. Manchuria was no vital interest of hers. It was in distant Asia, and Japan would be reasonable. Ethiopia, Spain, Austria, Czechoslovakia, were not vital interests of Britain. The destruction by Hitler of the treaties of Locarno and Versailles, and the march into the Rhineland, were merely the whimsies of an unpredictable and dangerous man who might do unpredictable and dangerous things if he were asked—or compelled—to conform to the canons of Western civilization, one of which is a decent respect for the opinion of mankind. Such a policy—or lack of it—is, as we now know, suicidal. In a close knit, interdependent world it is the equivalent of saying that if my neighbor is being murdered I must refrain both from helping him and from calling the police. After all, the homicide is private to the murderer and the dead man's family, and any intervention on my part means the abandonment of an "objective attitude" whose preservation is more important than the preservation of life or the law or even, eventually, my own safety.

Transfer the argument to the larger sphere of American foreign policy, and the results become passing strange. Deeply embedded in that policy is the doctrine of nonrecognition of territories acquired by force. Asserted by Hoover in Asia, it has been reaffirmed by Roosevelt in Asia and in Europe. Thus we do not recognize Manchukuo. The dead sovereignties of Poland and Czechoslovakia are still accredited to Washington, where flesh-and-blood ministers represent ghostly countries and continue to live in the legations of nations which exist only as memories of the past, symbols of the present, or hopes for the future. But what is at the bottom of the doctrine of nonrecognition? Evangelistic though we may be, is our objection to the acquisition of territories by force merely moral? Not at all. It is because we believe that seizures of territories by force bring war; that war, wherever it begins, may spread until it finally threatens the peace and welfare of the United States. The doctrine is therefore an aspect of self-interest, and as such it makes sense.

The Manchurian invasion by Japan in 1931 which Britain—but not the United States—looked upon as a "localized war" has become the years-long Sino-Japanese War whose ramifications face us in 1940 with grave issues vis-a-vis Japan, not excluding the possibility of war. And the conquest of Manchuria, which signalized the death of the League of Nations and gave notice to bold dictators that they might seize whatever they pleased without fear of the so-called strong nations, led to Ethiopia ("Just a lot of niggers"); to Austria ("Well, they oughta belong to Germany"); to Czechoslovakia ("Yeh, that was Wilson's boner"); to Poland ("Those guys don't know nothing about fighting"); to the present European war ("It's none of our business").

III

Let's watch the American mind and diplomacy at work in Asia. There we pursue our own policy of cunctation and hamstring our own doctrine of nonrecognition. For 40 years we have been telling Japan she must not close the Open Door in China; for 40 years she has been closing it. Oh, we have protested often enough. We send notes. Japan hisses politely through her teeth; files away the notes; gives us more promises which she breaks, or returns an enigmatic reply to our protests. (These notes, let those remember who regard our letter-writing propensity as harmless, are not altogether innocuous. They constitute a diplomatic background for war.) Occasionally we do more. We frustrated Japan's notorious 21 demands upon China during the World War. We provided the world with the spectacle of a strange anabasis during that same war when Kansas and Nebraska boys floundered through the snows of Siberian winter, ostensibly to assist Czechs retreating out of Russia, but actually to prevent Japan from seizing large areas of Siberia. In general, we do just enough to irritate Japan without deterring her from her larger purposes. Is it likely that a people who performed the unparalleled miracle of transforming a hermit kingdom into a world power within 85 years, and who only 30 years after their emergence had already embarked upon a career of conquest and empire, are to be deterred by verbal slaps on the wrist? A people, moreover, whose philosophy is such that it was held up by General Ludendorff to the Germans as an admirable model to follow?

Since the start of the Sino-Japanese War and our refusal to recognize its first fruits in the form of Manchukuo, we have been denouncing Japan and at the same time supplying her with indispensable war materials. An efficient, time-saving people, we have worked out a system whereby a note of diplomatic protest accompanies each cargo of scrap iron to Japan, so that when the iron is hurled at the Chinese our protest automatically pops up. This does not hamper Japan, and it keeps the Associated Junk Dealers of America happy. In fact, no one is harmed but the Chinese, and they understand us, since we are their friends. Have not our missionaries long taught them, "Better are the wounds of a friend than the kisses of an enemy"?

"It is important that we understand the implications of our actions in Asia because they affect our position not only on that continent but throughout the world. Thus, while the American people approve of the relatively unimportant surface aspect of the nonrecognition doctrine—after all, Japan has managed to struggle along without our formal approval of her Manchurian conquest—the same people reject the essential basis on which the doctrine rests. For to approve of it would be to do precisely what we do not wish to do; that is, face the stark reality of the world in which we live and recognize without blinking that war anywhere on earth and by whomever waged is a potential danger to our own peace. (That this is true is not only the lesson of history, but is attested by our present novel—even revolutionary—methods to escape participation in the European war.) If we go this far, we must go further and assume the burden, in company with other nations, not of winning wars in which we engage or helping others to win wars in which we do not engage, but of that effort which is at once an expression of self-preservation and the highest, noblest use of diplomacy and power—preventing wars from starting.

"The fact is, however, that we will not face the music of our own logic, and we therefore content ourselves with the iteration of a doctrine whose reason for being we reject by our failure to pursue that doctrine to its inexorable conclusion. We find ourselves, consequently, in the uncomfortable (not to say absurd) position of applying nonrecognition to our own policy of nonrecognition. But now at long last, logic or no logic, policy or no policy, half-hearted action or dilatory cunctation, we face a showdown with Japan.

At home we note a strange phenomenon. While we protest that the European war is no business of ours, it seems to be our sole business. Our emotional and intellectual capacities appear to be almost absorbed by it. Domestic issues over which we fought bitterly a year ago seem trivial today. Yet we still have a grave agricultural and unemployment problem; debts mount and taxes rise; the business structure sways in the winds; even the anticipated war boom that was to save us has not materialized. (It is a measure of our appalling lack of faith and direction that we, the world's richest country, should expect to be saved by the death throes of Europe.) But who, save Senator Taft, loses sleep now over the unbalanced Federal budget? We are building costly battleships, and if they must float in seas of red ink, where is the man to say that the hand of the naval architect shall be stayed? We are filling our skies with airplanes; the midnight meditations of cattle on the Western ranges are disturbed by the thunderings of our military machines overhead. Who desires to singe their wings? What has become of the WPA jokes? What has dissipated our once passionate interest in sharecroppers? A nation hard pressed at home is absorbed in the struggle overseas. It is evidently, therefore, of vital interest to us. But while it may be a struggle between two diametrically opposed conceptions of life and international order, and while we devoutly desire the victory of one side, seeing something of our own case and security in the victory of that side, we extend it only our good wishes and our willingness to sell goods for cash.

IV

Consider specific events of the European war. Finland is invaded by Russia. We are struck with horror. Individuals give cash. Planes are diverted from our military services for Finland. Washington lends money to the beleaguered country. Its minister to the United States is greeted with acclaim wherever he appears. Why? Is it merely that this Nation's individuals, who live largely on the installment plan, are filled with sporting admiration for a nation that meets its installments to us so promptly? Or do we aid the Finns because we believe they are a people much like ourselves and respond to the same impulses that move us? Is it that they personify values we cherish and are being attacked by a brutish giant whom we abhor? Beyond Finland lie the Scandinavian states—truly democratic, admirably governed, the objects of our esteem and affection. Are they doomed to disappearance if Finland should disappear, we ask ourselves uncertainly.

Consider the British-German naval action off Uruguay in which the Graf Spee was scuttled. Our newspapers played it up exultantly as if it were an American victory. But when H.M.S. Royal Oak was torpedoed at Scapa Flow, men in little southern villages discussed it sadly with lowered voices as if this were a personal tragedy that had happened in their midst, or an important American defeat. Why? The French Army is behind the Maginot line, Gibraltar's guns brood over Africa and Mediterranean Europe,

French colonials keep watch over Syria, Scottish Highlanders patrol where once the doleful procession marched up Calvary Hill, merchant ships of the Allies dot the seas, gold lies in yellow mounds in the banks of England and France. But these forces are impotent in the absence of the one value that gives them life. That value is the British Navy, and we all know it.

Reversing the process of physical evolution moving from simplicity to complexity, we see how the intricacies of the modern political-industrial world, functioning in war, have brought about a situation in which the movement is from complexity to simplicity. The whole vast structure of the British and French empires, and with them a certain concept of life and living, rest ultimately upon 70 or 80 shining cylinders of metal called naval rifles, installed upon 14 floating platforms called capital ships of the British Navy. ("Admiral Jellicoe," said Winston Churchill, speaking of the World War, "was the only man on either side who could lose the war in an afternoon.") Destroy those platforms, put those rifles out of action, and a cataclysmic crash of empires will convulse the earth for generations. Hitler knows this too, and in order to destroy his enemies he must first destroy the handful of long-nosed cylinders on which they rest. We know it also, and the vortices that marked the sinkings of Royal Oak and Courageous carried down not only their hulks but also a portion of our hopes. The war in which they disappeared is not, however, any of our business.

But, strangely enough, as British ships go down in European waters we plan to lay down more war vessels in American yards. The chairman of the House Naval Committee talks of building monster battleships of 60,000 or even 80,000 tons at a cost of $130 million apiece. Are they too big to go through the Panama Canal? Then widen the canal; build more locks; construct another ditch at Nicaragua. We must have the ships, and the ships must have mobility. Why? If Britain and France win the war, are we to fear them? If they emerge victorious are we to fear Japan, whose course in Asia runs counter to the interests of France, Britain, the Netherlands, and ourselves? Or is it that, while the present war is no business of ours, we fear that a German victory might convert it into a postwar business for us to face? In our arithmetic, however, it is cheaper to build ships to face a possible German victor than to give money to Germany's enemies to make her victory impossible; in our reasoning it is wiser to confront a possibly hostile world alone than in the company of others.

This by no means exhausts the devices of our ingenuity. We are already looking forward to the peace which must ultimately come, and President Roosevelt, as part of our effort, has sent a personal representative to the Vatican. Who believes that if Germany wins the war we shall be allowed to say anything about the peace? Our peace efforts must be founded, therefore, upon a victory of the Allies. If the war goes on for years, or results in total war and the destruction of British-French cities and civilian populations, who believes that the Allies, if victorious, will permit us to arbitrate the peace when our contribution to their victory will have been merely our helpful but profitable willingness to sell them goods for cash? And, moreover, the next time we turn up in Europe to arrange a peace, is it likely that Europe will have forgotten that the American President responsible for the League of Nations was repudiated by his own country and sent to his grave a brokenhearted man?

If, however, we should be unable to arbitrate the peace, we can take such action at home as will make any peace that Europe arbitrates a peace impossible or difficult to keep. The lobbyists are already gathering in Washington expecting to dance around the remains of Secretaray Hull's Trade Agreements. Again we pursue the policy we followed after the World War. Again we seek legislation that will close the world's greatest market to a postwar impoverished Europe precisely at the moment when Europe shall be in greatest need of that market; again we embark upon a course that will force Europe into barter agreements, debased currencies, retaliatory tariffs, fanatic nationalism, and so, in time, to more wars. (And when they come we may say they are none of our business.) This upon the theory that by keeping most of the world in poverty we shall promote peace abroad and prosperity at home.

In the spring of 1828, a stage rolled along the road from Providence, R.I., to Hartford, Conn. Among the passengers was the English traveler, James Stuart. Somewhere en route an American got on the stage, and Stuart reports the following:

"On our way to Hartford, Mr. Lad, a gentleman who lives in the northern part of New England joined the stage. We found him a very agreeable companion, and possessed of a great deal of information. He was confident that, at no distant period, Britain, America, and France, would form an association to prevent future wars over the earth."

If time has proved Mr. Lad to be wrong in his vision of the future, he had at least an opinion about the world in which he lived and a conviction about how its peace might be kept. Let us listen to a young American speaking to us 112 years after the conversation in the Hartford stage. He spoke for the benefit of the youth forum now being conducted by McCall's magazine. This is what he said:

"Well, I've been thinking right here. I've been sitting here racking my brains to see whether there's anything at all I thought about, definitely and positively, and really, I've no faith in anything. I'm getting afraid to think, because I fear I may get emotional about it."

Is this the credo of a nation in the fourth decade of the 20th century, or its obituary?

THE 1946 WARNING HOLDS TRUE TODAY—FIRST IN WAR—LAST IN PEACE

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—Rare is the commentary on world affairs that is as fresh and pertinent after 14 years as on the day it was written. Just such a commentary appeared in the Atlantic Monthly in January 1946. It could have been written yesterday. This remarkably prophetic article is reprinted herewith with the permission of its author, David L. Cohn, author of numerous books and articles.)

We are losing the peace. We are losing the respect of the world. If we should look honestly at ourselves it might be difficult to keep our self-respect. Physically the world's most powerful nation, we are hysterically divesting ourselves of our physical power even before the formal peace has been made. Much given to lecturing others on their moral shortcomings, we are drifting toward moral bankruptcy.

Exalting our own prowess, we are nonetheless inclined to blame the troubles of the postwar world on others: The British are too shrewd, the Russians too ruthless. Ferociously energetic, we are intellectually lazy. Brilliantly competent technically, we tend to be politically inept. Tough in war, we are soft in peace. Girdling the world with our living and our dead, we do not yet know our place in the world. Creating such miracles of military engineering around the earth that other peoples regard us with awe, we have behaved as if we were in a political vacuum, not knowing how to relate cause and effect. Outwardly internationalist, we are yet inwardly isolationist.

PRICE OF PEACE IS HIGH

Having won a war which we entered not out of conviction, but out of compulsion, neither during the war nor since have we acquired enduring convictions about the peace. It is not that we do not want peace. It is that, being intellectually adolescent, we do not realize that if we want peace we can have it, but only at the price, however high, that it demands.

If we are, as we say, the world's mightiest people, we should not shrink from ruthless self-analysis; the more so since self-knowledge is the beginning of wisdom. If we are, as we say, a hardheaded people, then we are given to the maxim that while a man is permitted to make one mistake, only a fool makes the same mistake twice. I do not know what you would call a man or a nation that makes the same error three times. But far from using our mistakes of the past as evidences of what to avoid in the future, we seem bent upon making bigger mistakes than before, as though we were deliberately courting the risks of a third world war, although the nature of that war, if it should come, is known to all of us.

NO MORE "LUXURY" WARS

It is clear in retrospect that the two world wars in which we have fought were, however great our losses in lives and treasure, luxury wars. They were luxury wars because we were able to send our young men to fight on the soil of other nations, leaving the life of the homeland to function, if not normally, in great security. That day is gone forever.

Testifying before a Senate subcommittee, Dr. J. Robert Oppenheimer, who has been credited by the War Department with achieving the implementation of atomic energy for military purposes, flatly told the Nation of the perils it faces. "There are," he said, "no specific countermeasures against the atomic bomb and there never will be." "A new war," he continued, "might begin with 40 million Americans dead in the first few hours, because of this country's high degree of urbanization. The atomic bomb has actually weakened the military position of the United States."

Professor Oppenheimer scoffed at the illusion that the bomb will remain our secret, and made this all-important point to a nation which smugly believes that it incontestably leads the world in scientific research—namely, that in fundamental research, the basis of any new weapon, we made no advances whatsoever during the war. "For the most part," he said, "what happened during the war was not in any sense scientific work. It was the exploitation of skill, techniques, fundamental knowledge, and even, to some extent, of the human relations between scientists, all of which had been cultivated in the days of peace."

It is clear from Dr. Oppenheimer's testimony that we are basing our security upon a so-called secret which will soon become common property; that in the event of war we shall be fortunate to survive as a people.

There is, I submit, something terrifying and bewildering in the spectacle of a nation whose physical might is so great as ours, whose intentions are so good, but whose political blindness is so dense, whose political tenacity is so feeble, whose resolution is so wavering, that neither we nor the world can be certain at any given moment of the direction we shall go. Contrast our pretensions with our actions. During the war we vowed that we would remain the world's mightiest power; we would occupy enemy countries forever if necessary; we would organize a system of collective security in terms of the Atlantic Charter. Never again would we repeat the mistakes of the First World War.

As against these pretensions, we are demobilizing our Armed Forces in a rush which is little short of hysterical. Our greatest effort is to forget the troubles of the rest of the world and retire into normalcy here—with nylon stockings, new cars, platinum lipsticks, and perfumes at $75 an ounce. We are running true to form.

RUSSIA MOVING IN

When other peoples see that we talk big but act little, how are they affected? Russia, well aware of what we are doing, is taking up where we leave off, moving into vacuums we have created. As she does so, we blame our troubles on her; we begin to fear her; and, fear breeding fear, we put ourselves on the road to the next war. Incomparably the world's mightiest people at this moment, enjoying a prestige and good will greater than that of any other power, if we moved in the world strong, magnanimous, and purposeful, force engendering respect, magnanimity breeding affection, and purposefulness inspiring the will to follow, many of our troubles which we attribute to others would soon vanish.

The antidote to all this—if it is not too late to apply it—is contained in words of Mr. Justice Holmes which, in the light of our dilemma, would seem to have the force of a maxim: "To fight out a war you must believe something and want something with all your might." This is just as true of keeping the peace, since the aggressive instinct among men is as great now as it was in the days of tooth and claw, while modern arms have made it infinitely more destructive, and since men are still fear-ridden, jealous, greedy, irrational, touched often with paranoia.

PEACE OR DESTRUCTION

Fate, by making us a mighty people, has decreed that we shall either lead the earth toward peace or face the penalty of destruction. For the role of leading the world toward peace we are magnificently equipped in everything but perhaps the one essential thing—the will to do it.

Morally we are equally well fitted for the task because of the enormous prestige and good will that we have everything on earth; because in general, the nations do not fear us or look upon our designs as suspect; because it is clear that we have no extracontinental ambitions. Yet even our physical might and moral authority—an authority which depends for its perpetuation upon its exercise—are not enough if they are merely attributes of a delightful companion and a good guy. The only way to lead is to lead. The pains of leadership are onerous, as the British discovered in the 19th century, but the penalties of failure to lead are greater and may even be catastrophic.

OUR HORIZONS LIMITLESS

It is sickening and shameful in a stricken, impoverished, fearfully blighted world to hear Americans, in this richest of countries, still blessed by geography as others are cursed by it, bewailing their fate, wondering what they are going to do and how they are going to do it. Our actions in this war demonstrate that there is little the United States cannot do if its people can imagine themselves wanting to do it enough to do it. Internally we have not yet even begun to grow. We have only brushed the fringes of our potentialities. The horizons of the American future are limitless.

But we shall never begin the endless march toward them until we settle the one question that we have never settled in our life as a nation: the question of our spiritual and material relations toward the rest of the world. Time does not wait. Destiny moves with the sun. We have been called to the hill of the Lord to lead the weary nations to peace, but if we do not heed the call we shall perish in the sands of the desert before reaching the promised land.

YOU CAN'T EAT DEMOCRACY

I

The drift of the world is such, it seems to me, that unless it is arrested, nearly a billion people in the Orient and the Middle East may fall under effective Russian domination within foreseeable time. Russia need use neither threats nor force to affect the course of the drift; but if half of the world's population and a huge fraction of its resources (including the greatest oil reserves on earth) should come within her orbit, the West will be faced with making one of two choices. The first is to accept the new order of things and eventually become part of it. The second is to fight. As between these alternatives, I believe the West would fight.

It is irrelevant to discuss whether or not Russia plans to rule the world, or entertains what Russophobes call "sinister designs" upon others. Only in time can her design unfold. In the absence of convincing evidence to the contrary, we must believe she does not seek world domination. Certainly it is absurd to suppose that Russia wants war any more than we want it. But although neither Russia nor the West wants war, and even if neither should do anything to provoke it, logic points toward the distinct possibility of eventual conflict.

The terrifying aspect of all this does not lie in Russia's intentions. The danger lies in the nature of the case itself, which is that the facts of life in Eastern lands propel their peoples toward Russia; the balance of power, therefore, might swing to her and bring on conflict with the West even if she were not at fault. There is yet time to prevent the tragedy, but we must move swiftly. The remedy lies in our hands. It is not anti-Russian or anti-anybody. It leads away from, rather than toward, war, and its application must inevitably benefit all humanity—including Russia.

I am not here concerned with applauding or deploring Russia; with the relative vices and virtues of democracy and totalitarianism. Such questions are endlessly debatable. I am concerned only with the hard facts of the case, and with suppositions that stem from them. Of these facts the chief is that the greater part of the world is, so to speak, conditioned for totalitarianism. If that should become its state, its alinement would be with the one great totalitarian state left on earth.

This, I believe, is the sense of President Truman's allusions to the Near East and the Middle East in his extremely important Army Day address. "Turning to the Near East and the Middle East," he said, "we find an area which presents grave problems. This area contains vast natural resources. It lies across the most convenient routes of land, air, and water communications. It is consequently an area of great economic and strategic importance, the nations of which are not strong enough * * * to withstand powerful aggression. It is easy to see, therefore, how the Near East and the Middle East might become an area of intense rivalry between outside powers, and how such rivalry might suddenly erupt into conflict."

How does the man from the Middle West propose to prevent conflict in the Middle East? First, there must be no interference, by force or penetration, with the sovereignties of that region. Second, the countries must be aided to develop their resources and raise their standard of living.

The problem and the President's policy may be put into perspective by stating certain theorems applicable to the peoples of Eastern lands. Men are guided by their minds; they are moved by their bellies. You can't eat democracy. Hunger is revolutionary. Bread is counterrevolutionary. A square meal is a rarity in the lives of hundreds of millions of people. If the brotherhood of man has not been a conspicuous success at the soul level, we might try it for a while at the stomach level.

The people to whom these theorems apply are close neighbors, or neighbors not far removed, of Russia. Enormous hordes of them pass their short lives in a twilight zone between sleep and hunger. Hungry, naked, diseased, illiterate, housed as miserably as beasts of the field, they darkly breed and darkly die. We offer them democracy. The Russians, implicity or explicitly, offer them bread, or at least the hope of it. The Russians have long been at some pains to let the peoples of the world know that they are interested in their social and economic betterment. As between democracy without bread or bread without democracy, it is not hard to guess which a hungry man will choose.

II

We approve of the efforts of peoples in Eastern lands to rid themselves of foreign domination. It is not for us to say whether their plight will be better or worse under their own rulers. But it is clear that their domestic governments in this vast area are, and nearly always have been, unimaginably corrupt, cruel, degenerate, and inefficient. Nowhere among these governments or their ruling classes is there the slightest concept of the public welfare. This is how the Baghdad newspaper Saut-el-Ahali (Voice of the People) described life in Iraq in 1944:

"Ninety percent of the entire population of Iraq live on a subhuman level. They are condemned to a life of starvation and exposed to the ravages of epidemics without benefit of any medical assistance. And these intolerable, primitive conditions exist in the 20th century among our own Iraqi people, who sweat and toil to make the soil yield riches which are then entirely consumed by others. The government has done nothing either to mitigate the distress or combat its causes."

During the past 20 years, however, foreign oil companies have paid into the Iraq treasury, in the form of royalties and non-interest-bearing loans, nearly $100 million. This sum, small in the scale of American affairs, is large in terms of Iraq's economy. Honestly employed, it might have done much to relieve the country's distress. But evidently little of these moneys, not to mention other sources of revenue, reached the people.

Similar conditions prevail in Egypt. There the narrow green ribbon of arable land along the Nile is held as follows: 3 million owners have 1,750,000 acres; 146,000 owners have 1,760,000 acres; 12,000 owners have 2,300,000 acres.

Thus the well to do, few in numbers, own most of the land in a country overwhelmingly agricultural; a country, moreover, where—owing to the region's dependence upon the Nile—little more land can be made arable. Many of these men are absentee landlords totally uninterested in the welfare of their tenants. But the Egyptian people, four-fifths of them peasants, are desperately poor. According to Maitre M. S. Ghannam, Egyptian Minister of Commerce and Industry, "Statistics estimating the national income per head of the population show that the majority (the peasants, who are reckoned as the backbone of agricultural wealth, and as the source of the country's welfare) have an average income of between E£3 and E£5 per annum." That is, between $12 and $20 a year. Maitre Ghannam scarcely overstates the case when he adds: "This is hardly, if at all, sufficient for his livelihood, and is to be regarded as an astonishing figure when compared with the individual income in other civilized countries." Yet Egypt is the most progressive and westernized country east of Suez, and it aspires to leadership of the Pan-Arab League.

In oil-rich Iran less than 2 percent of the people is represented in the ruling class from which the government is drawn. National revenues are largely expended upon administration—the upkeep of the governors. Government employees have to be grafters because they are so poorly paid. Here, as elsewhere in this part of the world, corruption in public office is the rule rather than the exception. Judicial decisions are bought and sold. Tax collectors are bribed. He must be poor and obscure who pays legitimate taxes at all. Hundreds of thousands of the people are opium addicts. Four out of five children die in infancy. Three out of four who survive never learn to read or write.

More than half of India's 400 million revel in an average income of 2 cents a day; the remainder rejoice in an average income of 5 cents a day. The life expectancy of the average Indian is 25 years. The poverty, disease, and degradation existing among these great masses of people is unspeakable. Conditions among China's millions are similar.

We will not, we say, permit other countries to be overrun by anybody. For "anybody," read "Russia." This puts us in an anomalous position. In the East it commits us to support debauched oriental governments while doing nothing to raise the standard of living of the people. They shall have full sovereignty but empty stomachs.

Russia, on the other hand, by the very existence of its massive system of the so-called classless society glorifying the worker and peasant, does offer hope to Eastern lands. Does anyone doubt, moreover, that the landless, poverty-stricken peasantry of these regions are not hearing how the Russians divided the great estates of Eastern Europe among the landless peasants of Germany, Poland, Rumania, and Hungary? Can anyone doubt the explosive potentialities, among the landless, of such a proceeding? May it not be that Eastern Europe will soon stand as a permanent exhibit of what Russia does, and can do, for the dispossessed?

In the Russo-democratic struggle for the Eastern lands, Russia has certain other advantages. The peoples of these countries find democracy an almost incomprehensible idea. They have had no preparation for it, because they have had some form of despotism or dictatorship for thousands of years. Far more than the 19th-century workers of Europe, they fall within the pronunciamento of the Communist Manifesto: "Workers of the world, unite." They have nothing to lose but their chains. What, indeed, from his point of view, can the average Egyptian, Indian, Iraqi, Saudi Arabian, lose by exchanging his present masters for Russian masters?

Russia is a neighbor to these peoples. Her mighty shadow falls upon them. Her prestige has been enormously enhanced by her magnificent struggle during the war. She is more Asiatic and oriental than European and Western, and as such is more natively understanding of orientals than we are. She has their capacity for infinite patience, their talent for circumlocution, their endurance and stoicism. Millions of her citizens are Moslems who have an affinity with the huge groups of their coreligionists outside Russia. Recently Mr. Jinnah, head of the Moslem League, was quoted as saying that he is a Moslem first and an Indian second. This feeling, as Sir Frederick Puckle has recently pointed out in Foreign Affairs, is of the essence of the separate Moslem state, Pakistan. It is not surprising, then, that Russia is sending to the Middle East, as diplomats and emissaries, Arabic-speaking Moslems of Russian citizenship.

Russia is not only spiritually closer to the Eastern peoples than we, but she enjoys the enormous advantage of being physically near them. She is on the borders of, or close to, China, India, Tibet, Burma, Afghanistan, Turkey, Iran, Iraq. We are in almost every way remote from the populations of these countries. In each of them, moreover, while there is no one to state our case, there is at work a tireless, devoted, intelligent, ruthless Communist group. Their heart is in the Kremlin. They have ready to hand a weapon of the greatest power: the facts of life in the lands where they operate.

There are, however, favorable factors on our side. We enjoy a great good will in the Eastern lands. Its increase or decrease depends upon what we shall do in the future. We are not feared by them. They do not regard our missionaries and businessmen as inevitable forerunners of soldiers. We have demonstrated on many occasions our abandonment of the old policy that the flag follows trade.

American schools, especially in the Near East, have turned out numbers of students, many of whom are men of influence in widely scattered communities. They admire us and would undoubtedly be partisans of our cause among their countrymen. Throughout the Eastern lands we have great prestige because of our technological achievements. The war was, from this point of view, a worldwide demonstration of American machines and methods.

Uncle Sam appeared before millions of people as a lean, tall, gum-chewing djinn performing feats as remarkable as those related by village storytellers about the wizards of old. They look upon us as makers of miracles, creators of the world's highest standard of living, electrically energetic and magically ingenious. They may deplore in us what strikes them as our excessive devotion to the material, and our childlike ways, but their needs are so great and their means so inadequate to the task, that they would welcome our aid.

III

Such a design poses the problem of our future relations with Russia. It is not likely that we shall come into conflict with her over ideology alone. It is possible that we may come into conflict with her in the matter of influence over others amounting to dominance. We are profoundly concerned with the balance of power, however much we may shrink from using that ominous phrase. No nation, no group of nations, must be permitted to become so powerful as to threaten our security. That, essentially, is why we have twice gone to war within a generation. And we shall continue to be concerned with the balance of power until the dream of world government becomes a reality. If, then, the greater part of the world's people should, through puppet government or openly, aline themselves with Russia, war between her and the West would become probable if not inevitable.

In the kind of struggle for equilibrium that is now going on in the world, armies and navies are of little use. Nothing can prevent, or ought to prevent, the dispossessed from trying to come into their fair share of the earth's goods and services. It does not matter whether men march toward this goal or crawl toward it; their destination is the same. Fortunately for us and for humanity, the remedy for preserving the equilibrium is one which our native genius has shaped us to apply.

It is that, as President Truman has stated, the United States shall do its part in helping the peoples of the Eastern lands to raise their standard of living. Since, however, this is a project designed to save the peace and to be beneficial to all men, while the size of the task is a challenge to all, it is understood that the administration will ask the United Nations to sponsor it. This is as it should be, for as a joint enterprise the burdens and benefits would be equally shared and no nation would get unfair advantages for itself. Russia may, if she will, join in the plan. If she does, the experience should remove her morbid suspicions of the West. She would occupy, in the great work to be done, the position to which her place in the world entitles her. If she refuses to join, we shall know the better where we stand in relation to her. But her nonparticipation, although it would immensely complicate the case, ought not to deter us.

There was a time when the democracies shivered as they waited to see what Hitler was going to do. Now they show a tendency to wait and see what Stalin is going to do. I suggest that we say what we propose to do, and proceed to do it. Let us in good will ask the Russians to join us in the Eastern task. But if they refuse, let us proceed without them. We are not belligerent or imperialist. Our motives are not evil. We want nothing for ourselves alone. But neither are we weaklings. We have a mighty strength. We shall move in this case not to harm but to help all men; it does not matter that our actions spring from enlightened selfishness. The world will move with us; and if Russia should stand aside, let her stand aside. All living is dangerous, but few things, as we ought to know by now, are so surely productive of disaster as weakness and irresolution.

The essence of the plan suggested is that it is not charity. It is not a temporary palliative. It is a plan to help others to help themselves and to pay their own way, so far as possible, while it is being put into operation.

There are endless tasks to be done in the East, but three must take precedence over all others. These concern transportation, agriculture, and light industry.

Throughout the Eastern lands there are few roads, railroads, or airplane services, and the available waterways are poorly developed. Without adequate transportation, trade languishes and nations stagnate. Without it there may a be a surplus of food in one place and famine in another; a hunger for goods on the one hand and surplus on the other. Moreover, costs of transportation by coolie's back, cart, or camel are inordinately high, no matter how low the coolie's wages or the camel's upkeep. It is unecessary to stress the point that we must develop transportation services in the East as a primary condition to the prosperity of the region.

Simultaneously, we must increase the farm output of these countries in order to banish the specter of starvation that always hangs over them. One of the direst needs is water. It is at hand, but it must be impounded by dams during the rains and released during the dry season through irrigation works. The plan must, therefore, envisage the building of dams and at the same time the use of the impounded waters to develop electrical power. Fertilizer plants are needed; reforestation; livestock programs; soil analysis; the use of good seed instead of inferior bazaar seed; and the employment of modern techniques to raise the low productivity of the soil.

Light industry must be built. This would include plants for making cotton cloth, shoes, sugar, cement, soap, household wares, wood products, simple pharmaceuticals, preserved foods, and hundreds of other items. Raw materials for making these things are to be found in the region, and workers could be easily trained; the industries would flow naturally out of the soil.

The money cost of such a program may be large. It need not be prohibitive. We are at present contributing 1 percent of our national income, as are other members of the United Nations, to UNRRA. This amounts, in our case, to a contribution of about $1,500 million. When UNRRA is able to curtail its activities, we could correspondingly reduce the moneys we supply it.

These sums could then be used in the East with no increase of our national budget.

It must be remembered, moreover, that the Eastern peoples themselves could make substantial contributions to such a program. They could supply all the labor and much of the raw materials needed, if we provide the plans and direction. They could pay for some part of the imports with exports, the fraction varying from country to country and the balance of the indebtedness being expressed by national loans.

While such a program is in no sense an act of charity, it must be considered not as a straight business deal but in the light of the desperate realities of our world. It will serve our national security. The brunt of the burden, because of our resources and skills and the fact that the war left us relatively untouched, must fall on us. But we are admirably equipped for the task. We could export not only goods but, more important, technicians in every field, who would teach others how to do for themselves. We could undertake, for the first time, a thorough survey of vast areas never explored, where perhaps lie untold riches.

The money costs of such a program must be calculated not in country-store terms but in terms of the broadest statesmanship. Yet they must be coldly calculated to produce the greatest good for the greatest number, including the American taxpayer. Any aspect of charity or almsgiving about it, any hint of sentimentality, would, in my opinion, be ruinous to the project. Let us render unto others what we are able, and let them in turn render unto us what they are able.

A plan of this kind is obviously not designed to save the British Empire, to provoke or harm Russia, or to benefit any particular nation. And although we have no selfish purpose to serve, nobody would be better served than we ourselves if the standard of living of 1 billion people should be raised. That accomplishment might go far toward preventing war. It would certainly be of incalculable benefit in preventing in the United States an economic depression whose effects upon this reeling earth would be catastrophic. Some British economists are already predicting that a severe depression will be upon us within 5 years. The Russians, as is well known, count upon the cyclical depression to bring about our democratic downfall. Here, perhaps, is the way of escape for us and for all men whose beliefs and faith are like our own.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage of employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employees engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from Florida?

What is the pleasure of the Senator from Florida with respect to what we should do now?

Mr. HOLLAND. I understood that there would be a request for a quorum call, the time to be charged equally to both sides.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator wish to have the time charged against his 20 minutes? I was going to suggest that the time be charged to neither side.

Mr. HOLLAND. That will be all right.

Mr. CLARK. Let us do that. Will the Senator make the request?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, for myself and the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, I make the request that the Senate permit a quorum call at this time, the time to be charged to neither side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call may be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] may be recognized to speak briefly, and that the time the Senator uses be charged to neither side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REVIVING THE ROAD SHOW

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I shall speak for only 2 minutes, and I shall not intrude upon the time of the Senate.

Much of our best artistic expression is to be found in the American theater, and I think it will be of interest to the Senate if I report on a successful effort to bring about a revival of legitimate theater on the road. This is being done by community theater groups, sponsoring both hometown and touring productions on a nonprofit basis; they are therefore exempt from the 10-percent Federal amusement tax. Without this exemption any forward strides taken by the theater in this area would have been impossible. The minuscule margin of profit which makes this valuable project feasible would be wiped out by the tax or else the ticket cost would be so high as to discourage attendance.

The elimination of this tax on all theater tickets could result in multiplied activity in theatrical work by lowering costs and attracting more investors. Extra funds could then be available not only for the legitimate theater but also for the experimental drama with all its promise of fresh avenues of development for the American people.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a letter from Mr. Herbert O. Fox, president of the Broadway Theatre Alliance, Inc., which shows the remarkable way in which artists are being sent to perform magnificent plays. The list includes many of the most exciting plays on Broadway during this and previous seasons throughout many of the cities of the country. A list of the cities is attached.

There being no objection, the letter and list were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BROADWAY THEATRE ALLIANCE, INC.,
July 8, 1960.

Senator JACOB K. JAVITS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR JAVITS: A year ago I had the pleasure of meeting you at the home of our mutual good friend George London and now presume upon this slight discourse to "write my Senator" on a subject very important to me and, I believe, to you.

I read with great interest, in the New York Times, a report of your joining with Representative LINDSAY in planning legislation to repeal the 10 percent amusement tax for legitimate theater. I would like to offer you my good offices, and those of my organization, in any way possible to aid you in this cause.

We are particularly interested in reviving live theater on the road. Our parent organization, with which I have been associated for over 20 years, is the leading concert management in America. We manage approximately 200 artists and groups and, in addition to the major city and university engagements, have organized over 800 local subscription courses through our affiliated organized audience movement Community Concerts. Several years ago (5 to be exact) it occurred to me that the theater could benefit from a similar type of highly specialized organization.

At that time, everyone familiar with the American legitimate theater was under the opinion that the "road" was hopelessly defunct, and that only a few crashing hits could tour with economic success. Being so familiar with the healthy aspect of the "road" insofar as concerts are concerned and, being convinced that this health is due chiefly to the businesslike organization of the concert world, we determined to take a crack at the same type of development in the theater.

Therefore, we founded a new subsidiary company called Broadway Theatre Alliance. Almost $500,000 has now been invested in developing organized subscription courses throughout parts of the country which, hitherto, have not had a subscription series.

As of 4 years ago, only 21 American cities had theatrical subscriptions. In our first season we organized subscription courses in only two cities; namely, Rochester, N.Y., and Charlotte, N.C. However, using our regular concert impresarios, we were able to take extended tours with the New York productions of "No Time for Sergeants" and "Damn Yankees." In our second season, we maintained a total of 17 subscription courses, touring "Auntie Mame," "Diary of Anne Frank," "Li'l Abner," and "Romanoff and Juliet." In our third season (just closing), we maintained 46 subscription courses touring "Look Homeward, Angel," "Two for the Seesaw," "Dark at the Top of the Stairs," and the pre-Broadway trial tour of "Odd Man In." For next season, we have at present organized a total of 78 subscription courses and by the end of the season anticipate that there will be 80. Next year we will tour "Fiorello," "Once Upon a Mattress," "The Andersonville Trial," "J. B.," and "The Pleasure of His Company."

I enclose with this letter two documents, which, I feel, demonstrate that that legitimate theater on the road has, in fact, been reborn through the techniques of organizing audiences borrowed from the concert field. One is the current issue of Variety which features as its lead story the development of legitimate theater on the road by Broadway Theatre Alliance. The other is a list of subscriber cities which speaks for itself.

After this long and rambling explanation I now go to one on the crucial points which has made this rebirth possible. Each local Broadway Theater League subscription course is sponsored by a nonprofit local committee dedicated to the mission of bringing fine legitimate theater to its community. In each city an average of 200 people join in dedicating several weeks of committee work to make the theatrical subscription course successful. Sometimes the sponsoring group is a nonprofit local group, the Lions Club, B'nai B'rith, or a business and professional women's group. More than likely, however, a special committee is set up for the purpose of constituting a league. This group then functions as an independent organization. As all of these leagues operate on a nonprofit basis, they are exempt from the 10-percent Federal tax. I can tell you absolutely and certainly that, without such exemption, this rebirth of legitimate theater on the road would have been totally impossible. The rising costs of presenting live theater are more onerous on the road than on Broadway. The margin of profit is minuscule and only made possible by this "forced draft" type of organizational work. Were our subscription courses not tax exempt, this margin would entirely disappear or the ticket prices would become so expensive as to be beyond the reach of the average American theatergoer.

However, I am delighted to say that our new organization is going into its fifth year and is apparently on the verge of recouping the majority of its investment and realizing some small return for all of its work. Likewise, the producers providing the shows for us look forward next season to the first year of reasonable financial return due to the expansion of the theatrical subscription route to include 80 cities. If all Broadway and touring presentors could enjoy similar tax exemption, the road would be given an additional spurt of life which would encourage us all to invest more and more money into its rebirth.

Were not these leagues already tax exempt, I could no doubt gather an impressive group of citizens to aid you in this cause. As they are, however, tax exempt, they might feel that this is of no immediate concern to them. I feel that anyone interested in the theater should be greatly concerned with this problem, and, therefore, ask you how I can be of help.

Best regards to you and Mrs. Javits.

Cordially,

HERBERT O. FOX.

Broadway Theater League cities as of May 17, 1960: Albany, N.Y., Allentown, Pa., Amarillo, Tex., Anderson, Ind., Asheville, N.C., Atlanta, Ga., Austin, Tex., Bakersfield, Calif., Beaumont, Tex., Binghamton, N.Y., Birmingham, Ala., Buffalo, N.Y., Canton, Ohio, Charlotte, N.C., Charleston, W. Va., Columbus, Ga., Corpus Christi, Tex., Dallas, Tex., Davenport, Iowa, Dayton, Ohio, El Paso, Tex,, Evansville, Ind., Fresno, Calif., Grand Junction, Colo., Grand Rapids, Mich., Greensboro, N.C., Harlingen, Tex., Houston, Tex., Huntington, W. Va., Huntsville, Ala., Lafayette, La., Lansing, Mich., Lincoln, Nebr., Little Rock, Ark., Lubbock, Tex., Mansfield, Ohio, Memphis, Tenn., Modesto, Calif., Montgomery, Ala., New Bedford, Mass., New Orleans, La., Norfolk, Va., Odessa, Tex., Oklahoma City, Okla., Pensacola, Fla., Peoria, Ill., Portland, Oreg., Providence, R.I., Pueblo, Colo., Reading, Pa., Roanoke, Va., Rochester, N.Y., Sacramento, Calif., San Antonio, Tex., San Bernardino, Calif., San Jose, Calif., Savannah, Ga., Scranton, Pa., Shreveport, La., Sioux City, Iowa, South Bend, Ind., Spokane, Wash., Springfield, Ill., Springfield, Mass., Springfield, Mo., Tacoma, Wash., Texarkana, Tex., Topeka, Kans., Tulsa, Okla., Tucson, Ariz., Utica, N.Y., Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada, Warterloo, Iowa, Wichita, Kans., Wichita Falls, Tex., Worcester, Mass., Yakima, Wash., Youngstown, Ohio.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I express the hope that the wide coverage from Texas to Iowa, from California to New England, may induce Senators from those States to give sympathetic consideration to the idea of removing the tax on all theater tickets, and also to the idea of some national theater establishment.

I close by pointing out that one of the greatest ways in which to encourage the strength and morale and vigor of the American people which are required by the towering challenges which they face in this very critical time is to build up the presentation of our finest cultural heritage, as reflected by the performing arts. The letter which I have inserted in the RECORD shows the way in which, if we would only give it a little Government backing, this fine result could be achieved.

I also ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in my remarks an article from Variety entitled "Legit's Big Comeback in Sticks," to use the vernacular of Variety, which sets forth the work of the Broadway Theatre Alliance.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEGIT'S BIG COMEBACK IN STICKS—SEVENTY-THREE-CITY CIRCUIT ON SUBSCRIPTION

(By Jesse Gross)

A small town booking revival, hinged on guaranteed subscription business, is putting touring legit back on the map. The steady decline in recent years of road show activity in major cities is being reversed by a mushrooming grassroots grab of bus-and-truck touring entries designed specifically for one-niters and partial-week stands.

Back of this bus-and-truck boom is Broadway Theater Alliance, a legit booking subsidiary of Columbia Artists Management. BTA, which began routing shows during the 1957–58 season, has been building an expansive subscription circuit. Last season the organization covered 46 cities. The circuit for the current semester has already been increased to 73 towns and the number is expected to climb to 80 before fall activity begins.

BTA figures the total number of subscribers organized by its Broadway Theater League subsidiaries in the towns set for this season will total around 150,000 as compared to 96,000 last semester. The organization sent out four shows last season and has six set for this semester. It's figured the combined guaranteed gross for the six offerings during their 1960–61 hikes is about $3,663,500.

This widening market for touring shows is restricted primarily to productions geared for rapid take-in and take-out, however. Heavy, full-dress productions, designed for prime time bookings of at least 1 week or longer, aren't likely to benefit from the small town resurgence even though a few of the cities on the BTA circuit are actually largely populated locales. Virtually all of the towns have not had regular touring shows in years, except for BTA offerings.

The six shows set for BTA tours this season are "Fiorello," "Once Upon a Mattress," "Andersonville Trial," "Pleasure of His Company," "J. B.," and a Marcel Marceau pantomime presentation. Two of the entries, "Fiorello" and "Mattress," are currently running on Broadway and will be duplicated for the road. In the case of "Mattress" there'll be another company touring the major cities.

"Andersonville" recently ended a Broadway run and will be new to the road, as will be "Fiorello" and "Mattress." However, both "Pleasure" and "J. B." toured successfully last season, playing major cities. The BTA circuit, naturally, will take in fresh territory. Marceau has toured before, but he'll also be hitting places he hasn't previously played.

The combined touring time for the six shows this season will be 179 weeks, including non-BTA subscription dates. "Fiorello," which is scheduled for a two-season tour, will be the first of the shows to begin traveling. It opens August 8 at the State Fair Music Hall, Dallas, for a 2-week run. The total playing time for the four shows booked by BTA last season was 117 weeks.

Most of the cities on the BTA circuit are committed to a four-play subscription series, while others are signed up for five plays. The Marceau presentation will be an extra offering in the BTA cities booked. A substantial part of the "J. B." tour will take in college dates on a flat guarantee. About 50 such bookings have been lined up for the show. BTA claims it began setting the college dates last year, when the production was still running on Broadway.

BTA asserts its weekly subscription guarantee for a show will be about $27,000, prior to the public sale of tickets. The estimated guaranteed gross for each of the six shows going out on BTA time this season, is as follows:

"Fiorello," $853,500 for 30 of the first 42 weeks of its tour.

"J. B.," $675,000 for 26 weeks of a 27-week tour.

"Andersonville Trial," $635,000 for 27 weeks of a 33-week tour.

"Once Upon a Mattress," $600,000 for 27 weeks of a 30-week tour.

"Pleasure of His Company," $500,000 for 24 weeks of a 27-week tour.

Marcel Marceau, $400,000 for 15 weeks of a 20-week tour.

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF SIGNING OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, 25 years ago on August 14 the Social Security Act was signed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt. At that time a new concept of Federal Government responsibility to individual citizens was established.

Since the enactment of this legislation more than $124 billion have been paid to individuals in benefits.

The original act provided for an old-age retirement system for certain employees in private enterprise. Later coverage was extended to other workers, including most self-employed, and to dependents and survivors and disabled workers and their dependents.

Also provided was a Federal-State unemployment insurance or compensation system.

Last Monday at the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare a splendid program was carried out commemorating the 25th anniversary of the Social Security Act.

Presiding on this occasion was William L. Mitchell present Commissioner of Social Security. The Honorable Arthur S. Flemming, Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, extended greetings and mentioned several individuals who had participated in the early writing and enactment of this legislation.

Among those present was Miss Frances Perkins, former Secretary of Labor during the time of the enactment of this legislation. Miss Perkins stressed the general acceptance of this program by major political parties, labor and cultural elements of our population.

The main address of the occasion was delivered by the Honorable Marion B. Folsom, former Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare who helped write the original act. Mr. Folsom's work in the field of social security started in 1921 when the began working on a program for covering the employees in his own business operations. It can be stated that as a result of his guidance and advice, we have in this Nation a program based on sound social security principles.

On the occasion of the 25th anniversary he delivered an outstanding address entitled "Goals of Governmental and Private Plans for Social Security," and I ask unanimous consent that it be made a part of these remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOALS OF GOVERNMENTAL AND PRIVATE PLANS FOR SOCIAL SECURITY

(By Marion B. Folsom)

I am greatly honored to be asked to speak at this celebration of the 25th anniversary of the signing of the Social Security Act.

My work in the field of social security, starting back in 1921 when I began work on a company plan for unemployment benefits, has been a most interesting and satisfying experience. It has brought me into contact with many people in government, academic, and welfare fields, whom I probably would not have otherwise known. For these friendships, I am very grateful. But my most rewarding experience was the 3 years I spent with this fine organization, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank all of you who are here from the Department for the splendid help and cooperation you gave me. I have been delighted to find that you are giving the same assistance to Secretary Flemming and that the Department is continuing to make fine progress in these three most important areas.

SITUATION IN EARLY 1930'S

We have come a long way since 1935 in providing better protection for the people against the major economic hazards of life, both in governmental and private plans. Before discussing the present situation and goals for the future, it might be well to take a brief look at the situation which existed in the early 1930's.

There were 6,700,000 people 65 and over in 1930—5.4 percent of the population. Although good progress toward the elimination of dependency in old age had been made prior to 1930 through the rise in individual incomes, little action had been taken by government to help those in need. The bulk of the aged in need were still dependent upon their families or charity.

A few States had old-age assistance laws is operation but the standard bill advocated at that time by the Association for Old-Age Assistance provided $1 a day at age 70 to those with less than $3,000 property. There were very few company pension plans and most of them were not on a sound actuarial basis. There were numerous pension plans for governmental employees but many of them also were not adequately financed.

There was only one State, Wisconsin, with an unemployment benefit law, and only a handful of companies had private plans. The 18 companies in Rochester which adopted an unemployment benefit plan in 1931 probably constituted half of these.

The depression pointed up the need for both Government and private action. Many of the family breadwinners became unemployed and many of the retired people had to go on relief. With heavy unemployment, the local and State welfare funds soon became exhausted and Federal action was necessary. At the same time that action was taken to meet the immediate relief problem, President Roosevelt appointed a Cabinet committee on economic security, with a competent staff, and an advisory council of 20-odd citizens (representatives of employers, labor, and the general public) to develop long-range plans.

At that time the chief interest was unemployment, and the unemployment benefit proposals commanded much more attention than the old-age insurance proposals. But, with the strong support throughout the country and in Congress for the Townsend plan, and with the existing situation among the retired people, it was obvious that something also had to be done for the aged.

It is interesting to note that in the consideration of the original social security bill, Congress was much more interested in the old-age assistance section than the insurance section because assistance benefits would be payable immediately while the insurance benefits would not be payable for several years.

Employer organizations and a large percentage of individual employers were against the social security proposals, but there were businessmen, including some from the insurance field, who felt the need for Federal action by legislation and were willing to help develop the system and set up the administrative mechanism.

MISGIVINGS ABOUT SOCIAL SECURITY PROPOSALS

Although the act passed the House by a vote of 372 to 33 and the Senate by a vote of 77 to 6, there were many misgivings and fears about this whole system, not only in the minds of employers but many others, including quite a few in Congress who voted for it.

Many people felt that a governmental system would interfere with the incentive of an individual to provide for himself and thus upset the foundation of our whole economic system. Experts familiar with the European systems predicted that a wage-related contributory system for millions of workers would prove to be too expensive to administer. Others felt that the benefits would get out of line.

None of these predictions has been borne out. Mistakes have been made and with the advantage of hindsight we probably would have done some things differently. Yet, on the whole, sound systems have been developed, with a strengthening rather than a weakening of our economic structure. All forms of savings have shown substantial increase and the old-age insurance system has greatly stimulated the rapid expansion of supplementary private pension plans.

PROGRESS IN ECONOMY SINCE 1930

I would like to cite a few figures to show the increase which has occurred in savings and the progress in other aspects of our economy since 1930. I feel that 1930 would be a fairer comparison than 1935, after several years of depression.

The percentage of nonfarm families owning their own homes increased from 46 percent in 1930 to 60 percent in 1959.

The individual holdings of currency, Government securities, and deposits in savings institutions, measured in terms of 1959 dollars, increased from $860 per capita to $1,930.

There has been a large increase in individual holdings of common stocks. It is estimated that 14 percent of American families now own stock.

The total of life insurance in force, including ordinary life, group life, and industrial policies, in 1930, amounted to $1,590 per capita, in terms of 1959 dollars, and $2,910 per capita in 1959.

The national income per capita in 1959 dollars doubled from $1,130 in 1930 to $2,260 in 1959.

There were less than 1 million persons covered in 1930 by private hospitalization plans; in 1959, 127 million individuals were covered. It is estimated that in 1930 only 20 percent of employees were covered under sickness benefit plans and in 1959 60 percent were covered.

There has been an increase in vacations and leisure time. The typical manufacturing employee in 1930 worked 6 days of 8 hours for 50 weeks of the year, or 2,400 hours. In 1959 he worked 5 days of 8 hours for 48¾ weeks, or a total of 1,950 hours.

Figures aren't available for private pension plans in 1930. A total of 1,500 plans had been approved by the Internal Revenue Service by 1940, with 700,000 employees covered. In 1959 there were 50,000 approved plans with 20 million people covered and with reserves amount to $46 billion.

Progress can also be measured in terms of better health and education.

Life expectancy at birth in 1930 was 59.7; in 1959, 69.7. The death rate per thousand for the whole population in 1930 was 11.3; in 1959, 9.4. The death rate per thousand for those under 1 year of age was 69 in 1930 and 29 in 1959.

The number of high school graduates has increased 2.5 times between 1930 and 1959, while the population has increased less than one-half. Although the population of the college-age group (18 to 21) increased only 3 percent from 1930 to 1959, the enrollment in higher education has more than tripled.

Much of the progress has been due to the increased productivity in all sections of the economy. This increased productivity has been caused by many technological advances, heavy capital investment in plant and research, better management, higher quality of the labor force due to better education and health, and wider diffusion of better education and health throughout the population.

It would seem that progress has not been hindered by the social security system, but in some respects this system has actually helped. It has reduced the fear of unemployment and dependent old age for millions in the population, while for the economy as a whole the payments under the system have served as a stabilizing factor. Practically all economists now agree that these steady monthly payments have prevented recessions from going as low as they might have otherwise. For instance, the total payments of the various governmental and social insurance and related programs amounted to $17.5 billion in 1958, compared with $11.2 billion in 1956. These monthly payments of $1.4 billion in 1958, entering into the trade channels almost immediately upon receipt, were bound to have a stabilizing effect upon the economy.

EXPERIENCE WITH OLD-AGE INSURANCE PLAN

The second fear in the early days was that the contributory old-age insurance system would prove to be too expensive to administer. The experience, however, has been favorable. It was originally estimated that the administrative expenses would be high in the early years, but would eventually be reduced to 5 percent. The results have been much better, due to good management over the years and the use of modern office methods and equipment. The expense ratio is now running around 2 percent of benefit payments, which would seem to be very good.

In order to obtain an objective appraisal of the operation of the Social Security Administration, I as Secretary in 1957 appointed a group of consultants with wide experience in large-scale operations in industry and insurance. The following is an excerpt from their report:

"The consultants believe that the bureau is carrying out its mission in a sound and vigorous manner. * * * The bureau has been a pioneer in the very difficult matter of introducing automatic machinery into the paperwork area with substantial savings to the trust funds.

"The consultants were impressed with the quality of the staff, which compares quite favorably with the staffs of corresponding business organizations.

"The subcommittee which studied the operations of the bureau in the field * * * was well impressed with the way the bureau personnel met and dealt with the public and with the impression of both efficiency and friendliness created by the typical OASI district office."

The impressions I obtained from my 3 years of close contact with the agency would certainly bear out these conclusions.

The principal fear was that the several systems would get out of hand by increases in benefits and lax financing. Sound financing of the old-age insurance system has been the chief concern from the start. Receipts exceeded expenditures each year from the beginning, with the exception of fiscal years 1958 and 1959, when deficits resulted largely from the changes in benefit structure and from new groups covered by the 1954 and 1956 amendments. With the current contribution schedule, the excess of outgo over income has been eliminated and it is estimated that from now on the fund will show a steady growth.

The record of Congress in the past 25 years in maintaining the system on a sound basis has been good. While benefits have been increased, mainly to keep them in line with current wage levels, the tax schedule has also been increased to keep the system on a self-supporting basis. The latest estimates indicate that the present system is, for all practical purposes, on a sound actuarial basis. That is to say, if the cost of benefits now provided is projected ahead over a long period of years and the contributions as presently scheduled are likewise projected, the two sums would be about in balance.

Congress in 1956 authorized the appointment of an Advisory Council on Social Security Financing to study and report on the present method of financing the program and the estimates of the cost. The following are excerpts from the unanimous report of this group of outstanding men from various fields:

"The Council finds that the present method of financing the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance program is sound, practical, and appropriate for this program. It is our judgment, based on the best available cost estimates, that the contribution schedule enacted into law in the last session of Congress makes adequate provision for financing the program on a sound actuarial basis.

"We believe that the 1959, 1960, and 1963 rate increases should go into effect as scheduled and that conditions will probably warrant the 1966 rate increase as well. The last increase—that scheduled for 1969—will need to be evaluated in the light of the conditions current at that time and in the light of the cost estimates then available."

It pointed out that by 1966 the full 8 percent rate would be in effect and it was estimated that income would continue to exceed outgo for a considerable period of time.

EXPERIENCE WITH OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE

The old-age assistance plan was set up to provide for those who, in the early years of the contributory system, would not be adequately provided for by that system. It was expected that the payments would rise for a number of years but that by this time—25 years later—payments would be greatly reduced. This has not been the case, due to the fact that in the early years of the system many groups were not covered and comparatively small benefits were paid to early retirees. Since 1950, however, the actual number of persons receiving old-age assistance has steadily declined and in 1959 the number on assistance represents only 15 percent of those over 65 compared with 23 percent in 1950. The amount of assistance payment, however, remains high—about $2 billion a year. It should be borne in mind, however, that if we did not have a contributory system, the current cost of an assistance program would probably be three or four times higher, with the Federal share coming out of general revenue.

The record of the States in regard to the administrative expense of the old-age assistance program has not been so good. Criticism has been directed particularly at the wide variation in the percentage of people over 65 qualifying for assistance and the variation in the provisions of the State laws. These defects are inherent in the system itself. While there is general agreement that the contributory insurance plan, with benefits paid as a matter of right, fits better into our whole system and philosophy than a means test plan, the assistance plan has been very useful in meeting the needs of those not adequately covered or not covered at all under the insurance plan.

CURRENT ISSUES AND FUTURE GOALS IN OLD-AGE INSURANCE

While we have made good progress with the old-age insurance system, it is well to look at the present situation as to the aged and goals for the future.

Thirteen and a half million persons are now receiving monthly benefits under the old age insurance system, including 3.7 million survivors. Current payments are at the rate of $10 billion per year. The balance in the old age insurance fund is now $20 billion and it is estimated that it will gradually increase from now on. Including other governmental plans, 94 percent of people reaching age 65 are eligible for benefits.

There are now 15 million people over 65, representing 8 percent of the population, compared with 5.4 percent in 1930. We have already experienced the sharpest increase in the proportion of the aged to the total population. It is estimated that by 1980 the proportion will increase to 10 percent of the population, but there will be 24½ million people 65 and over at that time.

Retirement age: It is estimated that in 1959, 76 percent of the people over 65 had retired, compared with 59 percent in 1930. Although the normal retirement age is 65, the average age of those retiring under the social security system is now 68. The question naturally arises whether in the future there should not be some change in the normal retirement age.

The improvement in the life expectancy, mentioned above, has been due, to a very large extent, to a sharp decline in the death rate in the younger groups. Of the 23 years gained in life expectancy at birth since 1900 only 4½ years have been added to the life of people who reach 45 years of age and only 2.2 years to those who reach 65.

It is to be expected that with all the medical research work now being conducted in chronic diseases, good progress will be made in the next few years in combating these diseases. We can therefore foresee an increase in life expectancy at age 65. This being the case, we would expect that some day the normal retirement age could be moved beyond 65. Sweden and Denmark recently changed the retirement age in their government plans from 65 to 67, but the life expectancy in these two countries is 3 or 4 years higher than our own. The change in retirement age would also depend to a large extent upon the general manpower situation in the future. Should the retirement age be moved to a later age, the cost of the system, of course, would be correspondingly reduced.

Retirement test: One of the most persistent criticisms of the present system is that retired workers are restricted in the income they can earn beyond $1,200 if they are to receive social security benefits. The proposal is made that we do away with the retirement test entirely and that all persons otherwise eligible would receive full benefits at age 65 on the ground that this is what their contributions bought. This, however, is not what they bought. They contributed toward a system under which benefits would be paid at age 65 to replace loss of income due to retirement. It is not an endowment policy payable at age 65.

The elimination of the retirement test would add considerably to the cost—estimated at about 1 percent of taxable payroll. An adjustment in the formula is probably necessary and further adjustments may prove necessary from time to time to meet changes in wage levels. Complete elimination of the test, however, would help only the more fortunate and not those who cannot work. One of the proposals recently submitted by the Social Security Administration to the Ways and Means Committee to provide a reduction of $1 of benefit for each $2 earned from $1,200 to $2,400 and $1 reduction for each dollar beyond that would seem to be an improvement over the present plan.

Later retirement: The suggestion has been made that the annuity should be increased for those who work beyond 65. This, of course, would add to the cost and taxes eventually would have to be increased or benefits reduced. It would seem more essential to give adequate benefits to those who are actually retiring at 65 rather than higher benefits to those who are fortunate enough to maintain their full income after 65.

Survivorship propection: As a result of an advisory council's recommendation in 1938, the system was greatly improved by the addition of survivorship protection for the families of those dying before retirement age. Benefit payments were paid in March 1960 to 1,800,000 children, 1,400,000 widows or widowers and 400,000 mothers. The pending bill contains some further improvements.

Coverage: The only major groups remaining outside the system are physicians and employees of the Federal Government covered under the civil service system. Both these groups will probably be covered eventually. It would be helpful to the large number of persons going back and forth between Government and industry if basic retirement and survivorship protection were provided for all Government workers by the social security system and supplementary benefits by the civil service system, following the practice in industry.

Level of benefits: Looking ahead to the future, one of the principal problems will be, as it has been in the past, the proper relationship between retirement benefits and the going rate of wages. Because benefits are based upon wages, there is, of course, an upward adjustment in benefits as the wage level increases. But there is a lag. It therefore is necessary from time to time to adjust benefits, as we have done in the past. While the level of benefits was behind during the war period, at present it seems to be in fairly good relationship to the level of wages. It is to be expected, however, that adjustments in the formula will have to be made in the future. If the wage base, for instance, is not increased as wages rise, we will find too high a percentage of people receiving the maximum benefits and thus lose much of the advantage of the contributory system, with benefits related to wages.

It has been suggested that benefits could be tied to the cost of living index. It is doubtful if this scheme would be feasible, nor would it be a sound Government policy to attempt to insure one group of people against inflation. The logical plan is to adjust the system periodically. This should be done, as in the past, through the use of advisory councils. The records of the advisory councils appointed in 1938 and 1948 were particularly good. The changes recommended by the councils were unanimous in almost all cases and Congress eventually adopted most of the recommendations. There is a provision in the pending bill to set up an advisory council to study and make recommendations for changes in all phases of the system immediately before the scheduled tax increases take effect. This is a very desirable move.

Thus, on the whole, the system providing protection against dependent old age is on a sound basis and if we continue to follow the basic principles of the present system there is no reason why it should not continue to be kept on a sound basis. These principles are:

It should be soundly financed, on a self-supporting basis, by the contributory system, with payroll taxes from employer and employee. Provision should be made for an adequate contingency reserve.

The coverage should be compulsory.

The benefits should be related to wages.

The benefits should be sufficient to prevent dependency but not high enough to discourage individual efforts and thrift.

The benefit rights should be defined by law, with no means test.

OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE

We could expect that there will continue to be a steady decline in the percentage of people over 65 receiving old-age assistance payments. There will, however, always be need for this system to take care of the relatively few who, for one reason or another, would not be covered by the contributory system and also to supplement those whose benefits are inadequate. The change in the system enacted last year corrects some of the defects and it would now seem to be on a good basis.

NEED FOR RESEARCH

In addition to the cost of old age assistance, amounting to about $2 billion, other assistance programs—aid to dependent children, to the blind, permanently and totally disabled, and general assistance—bring the total cost to almost $4 billion per year. The aid to dependent children has shown a steady increase in recent years. Altogether there were in March 1960 over 6 million persons receiving public assistance. Recently unemployment has been running close to 4 million persons.

To find out why we still have so many people dependent during a period of prosperity and what steps could be taken to restore many of them to a self-supporting basis, an amendment to the social security law was obtained in 1956 to set up a program of research and demonstration projects with an annual authorization of $5 million per year. Unfortunately, no appropriation has yet been obtained. A limited appropriation of $700,000 is now in the Senate bill. It is greatly to be hoped that at least this amount will be appropriated. In view of impressive results from research in other fields, we should expect monetary returns of many times the cost from research in this field, in addition to the humanitarian benefits to the persons restored to a self-supporting basis.

EXPERIENCE WITH UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Most of the years since the inauguration of the unemployment insurance system have been prosperous ones, but there have been several recessions. On the whole, the system has worked well in meeting the original objectives. The taxes have been more than adequate to pay the scheduled benefits. Under experience rating, taxes in most States have been well below the 3-percent maximum. In recent years the average for the country as a whole has varied between 1.2 percent and 1.7 percent. Prior to January 1, 1952, a fund of over $8 billion had been accumulated, with little change in the balance until 1958.

Due to the heavy withdrawals caused by the unemployment in 1958, the balance dropped to $6.7 billion on June 30, 1959. During the spring of 1958 the number of unemployed who exhausted their benefits increased quite rapidly, from a level of 100,000 to almost 300,000 in June. As a result, there was a call for action by the Federal Government to pay benefits for a period beyond that provided by the State laws. At first it was proposed that the Federal Government would pay these benefits out of general revenue. Fortunately for the sake of the State system, Congress enacted legislation to make Federal loans to the States to pay extended benefits if they so elected, the loans to be eventually repaid to the Federal Government. Twenty-two States participated in the plan, which worked out well. In September 1958, 670,000 persons were receiving extended benefits.

There has been good progress in improving the benefit structure during the past 2 years. The President for some time has indicated a goal of uniform duration of 26 weeks or more and he recommended that benefits should be raised so that the majority of covered workers would be eligible for payments equal to at least one-half of their regular earnings. The maximum duration has been increased in a number of States with the result that now all but 9 States pay benefits of 26 weeks or more to some workers and no State has a duration of less than 20 weeks. Only 8 States, however, provide for a uniform duration of 26 weeks.

During the past 2 years, a number of States have also enacted legislation to increase the maximum weekly benefit amount. Only a few States have so far provided for benefits of 50 percent of the average weekly covered wages.

Most of the State funds are now in good condition, although there is a wide variation in the percentage of annual payrolls covered in the different States. Looking ahead to the future, a study made in 1959 by the staff of the New York State Advisory Council indicates that if we should have a recession, say, in 1961 or 1962, there is likely to be a critical shortage of funds in 10 or more States. Some of these States in the past have levied taxes at a low rate relative to their cost. The answer, of course, is for these States to bring their taxes more nearly in line with their experience—as has already been done in certain cases.

While I have always been and still am a strong advocate for the experience-rating provisions of the State unemployment benefit plans, it would seem that some of the States have gone too far in providing very low or no minimum tax. It would seem that each employer, regardless of his employment record, should pay some tax, not only toward the administrative expense but toward the benefits in industries where it is impossible to stabilize.

A few States have enacted legislation to provide an automatic extension of benefits if unemployment should reach a stated percentage. In view of the experience during 1958, it would seem highly desirable for the other States to make plans for providing extension of benefits during a serious recession. The New York State Advisory Council suggests the extension of benefits to 39 weeks when unemployment over a stated period reaches 6 percent of the labor force and when the monthly number of exhaustions is 1 percent of the number insured.

Twelve States have adopted provisions for dependent allowances in addition to the regular unemployment benefit payments. Other States will probably enact such provisions when they consider further increases in the maximum weekly benefits. The system can be put on a more realistic basis by having one schedule of benefits for a single person and a higher schedule for those with dependents.

While there has been an increase in benefit amounts and in the duration of benefits, we still have a long way to go if all States reach the goals which the President indicated and which seem reasonable.

As far as the role of the Federal Government is concerned, additional appropriations should be made to the loan fund, which was set up some years ago but which was exhausted with loans made in 1958. If we are to maintain the integrity of the State systems, it would seem more desirable to use the loan fund rather than to set up a reinsurance plan, which would necessarily require Federal standards.

DISABILITY INSURANCE

In 1956 a total and permanent disability insurance plan was added to the Social Security Act and this seems to be working out satisfactorily. The indications are that the plan is being efficiently administered in accordance with the definitions of the act.

The pending bill would remove the age limitation. While the estimates indicate that this extension can be financed without any increase in tax, it is still too early to be sure whether the present tax is adequate and much depends upon the type of administration to be had.

Prior to 1950 four States had enacted legislation making it compulsory for employers to cover their employees for sick benefits for a stated period. The New York law, enacted in 1949, left it optional whether the plan should be self-insured, underwritten by an insurance company, or pooled in the State fund. The results in New York have been generally satisfactory and there have been very few complaints. Prior to enactment of the legislation, probably between 60 and 65 percent of the workers were already covered under private plans, generally with benefits in excess of the State's standards. Hence there was little if any additional cost to these employers, but the act did serve to extend these benefits to workers of other companies.

The first step in helping people to meet the cost of medical care should be to have the wages continued for a stated period while sick. This is generally one of the first benefit plans which employers adopt. It was expected in 1950 that other States would follow the New York example, but this has not been the case and there has been no further legislation since that time. This is clearly a field for State action and it would be very helpful if the 35 or 40 percent of employees not now covered had protection against loss of wages while sick.

Since most of the companies doing interstate business already have sick benefit plans, there is little basis for the argument that States requiring such plans would be at a disadvantage with other States.

HEALTH INSURANCE FOR THE AGED

It is only natural that the problem of health insurance for the aged should now be receiving attention, with 15 million persons in our population over 65 and the incidence of sickness in this group much higher than in younger groups. While many retired people now get along fairly well with their private savings, company pensions, and social security, a high percentage do have difficulty in meeting the high cost of medical care when they become sick.

Now that both political parties have come out with plans—both rather expensive—for meeting the situation, legislation undoubtedly will be enacted either this year or next. It is earnestly to be hoped that it will be a sound plan. Any reasonable plan for hospitalization insurance adopted by the Federal Government for covering people over 65 would enable the Blue Cross and the private insurance companies to reduce insurance premiums for those in lower ages.

If a sound program is developed by the Federal Government to provide basic health protection for those over 65, then there would be no good reason why voluntary private agencies could not continue to provide health insurance for those under 65 and supplemental protection for the aged. Under this arrangement, the Government would cooperate in providing protection for that part of the risk which is very difficult to handle on a private basis.

PRIVATE PLANS FOR SOCIAL SECURITY

Pension plans: With 20 million persons covered under 50,000 private pension plans approved by the Internal Revenue Service, it is obvious that we have made great headway in recent years. We still have a long way to go, however. It is to be expected that these plans will continue to increase rapidly over the years. Companies have found that it is sound business investment to have a supplemental pension plan. It improves the morale of the whole organization when people can look forward to a reasonable pension upon retirement and when those who are no longer producing efficiently can be retired.

As it is desirable for the Government plan to provide only the minimum protection to prevent dependency, companies have found it necessary to provide supplemental benefits to help the retired employee maintain more nearly the standard of living to which he has been accustomed.

It would still be up to the individual to save during his working lifetime so that he could have more comforts in his retirement. Many companies are now assisting the employee in accumulating savings on a matching basis.

Many of the company pension plans are now on a sound actuarial basis, with provisions being made for financing both the current and the accrued liability. Benefits are also on a more realistic basis. In recent years there has been a marked increase in investment in equities by trusteed pension funds. Forty percent of the market value of trusteed plan funds are represented by common stock. The reason, of course, is the desire on the part of the companies to take advantage of any rise in equity prices to lower the cost in the future and to meet the possibility of increased benefits due to inflation. To obtain such advantages it is, of course, necessary to let these funds accumulate over the years and not take advantage of any immediate appreciation in order to cut the current cost of the pensions.

So far, because of the practical difficulties involved, there has been little progress in the field of variable annuities, except in the case of teachers' annuity fund. There undoubtedly will be other experiments in this field in the future.

It has been found in practice that the best arrangement for a company plan is to have the company benefits paid as a supplement to social security benefits and not have the social security payments deducted from the company pension.

One of the criticisms of private pension plans is that many of them provide long vesting periods. There has been a trend in recent years toward reducing the period which, in the older plans was 20 to 25 years. While the shorter vesting period is desirable from the point of view of society as a whole, it does add appreciably to the cost. The cost can be kept within reasonable limits, however, if the vesting period is not too short and if the reduction is carried out over a period of years. The cost can also be reduced by limiting the vesting period for those who are 40 or 45 in age. It is to be expected that this trend toward shorter vesting periods will be continued. A few companies provide that persons reaching the normal retirement age of 65 will be entitled to a pension regardless of whether he has served the usual length of the vesting period. The great majority of companies, however, require the same vesting period at 65 as for those leaving at earlier years. It would seem highly desirable if there were more general use of the former practice, under which persons hired in their late forties or fifties could qualify for a pension. This provision and a shorter vesting period would be helpful to the older worker seeking employment.

Another problem to be faced is whether there should be a compulsory retirement age or not. Arguments can be given pro and con. The trend in recent years has been away from the compulsory retirement age, especially for the rank and file of workers. A strong case can be made for a plan under which the normal and expected retirement date is 65 but with the plan flexible in its application. Such a plan has been in effect at the Eastman Kodak Co. since 1928. You may be interested in the following experience for the 5-year period 1954 through 1958. During this time 1,750 male employees have retired. The ages at retirement were: under 65, 11 percent; 65, 67 percent; 66, 9 percent; 67, 5.5 percent; 68 and over, 7.5 percent. Thus, 92.5 percent retired before reaching 68. It was found that in recent years the proportion retiring between the ages 65 to 67 has steadily increased and that the number eligible to retire and not retiring has gone down sharply. People evidently want to retire if their income is adequate.

Companies are finding it wise to conduct preretirement programs to help their employees plan for their retirement. Such programs should be started well in advance of retirement age. I think the experience of companies which have had pension plans for a long time indicates that the adjustments are easier now than when pension plans were new, and easier than many writers indicate. It is my impression that the individual's main concern is whether his combined income from savings, social security, and the company pension plan is adequate to meet a standard of living somewhat close to that which he has been accustomed to, and whether he is protected against the increasing cost of illness.

While most plans have always had provisions for early retirement, the benefits have generally been on an actuarially discounted basis. Recently there has been a trend toward permitting early retirement without discount, say at 60, for those with long service. This makes it easier for people who want to shift residence and employment. More companies will probably adopt this plan. It is not very expensive.

Although the majority of plans are still contributory, the trend in new plans is toward the noncontributory. There are, of course, many advantages to a contributory system as larger benefits can be provided and it offers a good method for savings by an individual.

With the sharp increase in wages in recent years, it has been found necessary to make adjustments in the plans which are based on career wages. This has generally been done by having a minimum formula, based on wages for the last 3 or 5 years.

A highly desirable plan, adopted recently by a number of companies, is to provide for health insurance for the retired employees. In some plans the company and the employees continue to contribute toward the cost of the hospitalization, surgical, and major medical plans. In others, the company pays the entire cost. This is the ideal way to protect the retired worker. It is not overly expensive in relation to the total cost of coverage of wage earners of all ages.

The Eastman Kodak Co. has had very favorable response to a plan in which the company continues coverage of all three health insurance plans without cost to the retiree of 15 years' service. This program was exceedingly well received, not only by retirees but by the whole organization.

Supplemental unemployment benefits: A number of companies in certain industries have set up supplementary unemployment benefit plans in recent years. It is estimated that about 2 million workers are now covered. The plans are generally based on the State unemployment insurance laws and provide for additional weekly benefits and, in some cases, extra duration. There probably will be more widespread adoption of these plans in the next few years.

Private health insurance: Hospital room rates have more than doubled in the past 10 years and medical care costs in general have increased 56 percent. To help meet these increased costs of medical care, there has been a rapid increase in health insurance. It is estimated that in 1959, 127 million people were covered by hospital insurance, 117 million by surgical insurance, and 22 million by major illness medical plans. We still have a long way to go, however. I haven't figures for the country as a whole, but in New York State, which is well above the average of the rest of the country, 45 percent of the older people are without hospital insurance, 28 percent of the State's labor force are without surgical benefits, and 87 percent are without major medical benefits.

Much of this coverage is on a group basis, with the employer paying part of the cost for the employee and, in some cases, for his family also. Some companies pay the entire cost for the employee.

It is to be expected that coverage under these plans will continue to increase. The major medical plans have shown a very rapid rise since they were inaugurated only a few years ago. They should continue to show this rate of increase. Our goal in private health insurance should be complete coverage for hospitalization (including outpatient service and nursing homes), surgical, medical, and major illness but with such reasonable safeguards as would prevent abuse of these benefits.

SUMMARY

Physical output per man-hour has doubled in this country since 1930. The rise in the real income of the individual, resulting from this increase, has enabled him not only to improve his standard of living but to provide better protection for himself and his family against life's economic hazards. All forms of individual savings have shown substantial increases. Employers have assisted through the widespread adoption of employee benefit plans.

The social security system has proved to be very useful in serving as a strong underpinning in our efforts to prevent dependency arising from unemployment, disability or death of the breadwinner, and old age.

We still have, however, many people dependent upon relief, others unemployed, and many still with low incomes. If we as a nation are to continue our progress in achieving the desired goals of adequate protection against these economic hazards, further and continued action must be taken on all three fronts—the individual, the employer, and Government. Cooperative efforts must be made by all groups to continue to increase our productivity, with Government providing the proper climate for economic growth.

In the field of social security, the Federal Government should maintain the Old Age and Survivors Insurance System with the same basic principles as at present. Careful review should be made periodically by a representative advisory council to insure that the system is kept up to date with changing economic conditions and that it is kept on a sound financial basis. The old age assistance plan should be continued as a supplement to those not sufficiently covered by the insurance plan.

The Federal Government should inaugurate a research program, to find the cause of dependency and finding ways of restoring families and individuals on relief to a self-supporting basis. The Federal Government should restore the loan fund to protect the unemployment insurance funds against depletion in times of serious unemployment. It should develop a sound program of health insurance for the aged. Health insurance protection for all other age groups should continue to be handled by private voluntary agencies, as at present.

The State governments should continue to improve the administration of the old-age assistance systems. They should also continue to improve the benefit structure for the unemployment insurance laws, both as to weekly benefit payments and duration. Consideration should be given to adopting provisions for extending the duration of unemployment benefits during serious recessions. States should also give serious consideration to the adoption of temporary disability programs, such as adopted by New York State.

Employers with pension plans should continue to improve their benefits and actuarial soundness. Those without plans should give serious consideration to inaugurating sound plans as a supplement to the Government insurance system. Employers should make greater effort to stabilize production, not only in order to provide steady work for employees, but to reduce their unemployment insurance taxes. Employers not already doing so should contribute toward the cost of health insurance plans and adopt adequate plans for sickness allowance. Employers should also adopt plans to encourage savings by individual employees.

In our form of society, however, the prime responsibility rests with the individual to protect himself and his family against the economic hazards of unemployment, illness, premature death, and dependent old age. The Government's security programs can provide only the basic protection. The employer can also assist. But for the individual to obtain the protection he desires for himself and his family, to finance the education of his children, and to provide for reasonable comfort in his old age, he should have a plan of systematic savings. Fortunately, this philosophy has long been accepted by our people as evidenced by the substantial growth in the many forms of savings and insurance.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and request that the time required to obtain a quorum be charged to neither side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may require. I do not believe I will need in excess of 10 or 12 minutes. It seems desirable to place in the RECORD, briefly, the reasons why the committee is opposed to the amendment. So far as I know, only two members of the committee who signed the minority views are in favor of the amendment. All the Democratic members are opposed. These comments would have been made by the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] rather than by me, had he not lost his voice and been unable to address the Senate.

The principal arguments which have been made in support of the amendment can be summarized as follows:

The bill as presented would cause widespread unemployment. It would result in featherbedding and an increase in the public assistance rolls. It would worsen the position of the United States with respect to foreign competition. The definition which permits the bill to apply to enterprises which affect commerce is unwise and, indeed, unconstitutional. The price which farmers will have to pay for products they need for a reasonable standard of living will undoubtedly be increased.

In the opinion of the committee, each of these arguments is unsound.

Moreover, in the opinion of the Republican Secretary of Labor these arguments are unsound. I call the attention of Senators to excerpts from the report, which I should like to read into the RECORD. I read, first, from page 8:

> The committee has weighed the cost of increasing the minimum wage to the recommended level and is satisfied that the economy can safely absorb these increases without "curtailing employment or earning power" and without a perceptible increase in prices. In this respect the committee feels that a comparison of the proposed increases with the increase from 75 cents to the easily absorbed $1 an hour in 1955 is very instructive.

The committee proceeds to make that comparison and shows, I believe successfully, that the arguments with respect to the wage increase cost which would result from the enactment of the bill are not sound.

Further, on page 10, the committee sets forth the findings of a series of studies by the Department of Labor with respect to the economic effects of the $1 an hour minimum wage. The studies were conducted over a period of 3 years. I shall not read all the conclusions, but simply brief excerpts. The Department of Labor said:

> (a) Two general conclusions can now be drawn as to effects that the minimum wage did not have. First, the minimum wage increase had not, by December 1956, resulted in any substantial changes in the economic situation of the Nation as a whole, as measured in terms of trends in employment, unemployment, price levels, and other economic indicators. Second, it had not resulted in an increase in hourly earnings of high-paid employees proportionate to the increase in earnings of workers previously paid less than $1 an hour. ("Studies of the Economic Effects of the $1 Minimum Wage," March 1957, p. 4.)
> (b) None of the basic series summarized above [The Economic Indicators 1954–56, including trends in hours, earnings, employment, consumer prices, etc.] appears to have been affected substantially by the increased minimum wage. This does not mean that the minimum wage did not have any effect on trends in the various economic factors which are reflected in this series; rather, these effects were of too small a magnitude relative to overall economic activity to be discernible in the statistical series (idem, p. 14).
> (d) The effects of the minimum wage on unemployment "were not sufficiently large to be discernible in the overall estimates of unemployment" (p. 2).

The studies continue to describe the very careful analysis which has been made of each of these factors, and I believe justified the conclusion of the committee, which appears on page 13 and which reads as follows:

> The committee is confident that no serious adverse effects will follow the adoption of the minimum wage proposed in the bill. Whatever doubts existed on this matter should be dissipated by the bill's gradual approach in reaching the $1.25 minimum over a 3-year period. Rather, it seems to the committee that the consequences should be beneficial to the entire economy by providing needed purchasing power to millions of additional workers who will be directly affected by the bill, thereby relieving the burden on the community and its relief rolls and restoring a measure of self-sufficiency and dignity to these workers now employed at substandard wages. The enactment, by eliminating competition based on subminimum wages, should also be of assistance to the fairminded employers who desire to pay a higher minimum wage without incurring competitive disadvantages.

So both the committee and the Department of Labor are in accord that the bill in general will not have the adverse economic effects which its opponents have suggested. This amendment, would, if enacted, substantially remove from the provisions of the bill the extended coverage called for by the committee bill and, in effect, with a few minor exceptions, would leave the coverage exactly as it is now. In other words, the amendment, if adopted, would reduce the additional coverage from almost 5 million employees to less than 300,000.

I turn now to final argument made by the proponents of the amendment, namely, that which has to do with the constitutionality and desirability of including retail and service establishments within the extended coverage. I call the attention of Senators to page 30 of the committee report, from which I read:

> The committee has no doubt about the constitutionality or the propriety of this basis of coverage. Adequate precedents for this exist in other laws enacted by the Congress such as the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 (29 U.S.C. 151 et seq.); the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (29 U.S.C. 101 et seq.); and the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 (Public Law 86–257, 82d Cong., 1st sess.). In all these cases the Congress chose similar statutory language as the basis for coverage to assure the equal application of the law in the area in which it sought to legislate.

I have before me a series of Supreme Court decisions, with which I shall not burden the RECORD, but which sustain the constitutionality of the definition "affecting commerce," as it appears in each of these acts. I suggest to Senators that the analogy is pertinent and that the same constitutional result will inevitably follow if efforts are made to attack the constitutionality of the provisions in the bill, which the pending amendment seeks to strike out.

As to the wisdom of the bill, Senators must be their own judges. However, I believe there has been much of what the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] undertook to call, yesterday, the "bleeding heart" argument in support of the small retailer and the little drugstore and the small enterprise owned by a family. In my judgment—and this reflects the judgment of the committee—the adverse effects of the bill on that type of enterprise have been grossly exaggerated.

I recognize the sincerity of the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], who have eloquently argued to the contrary. I simply do not believe they are right. Nevertheless, the privilege of disagreeing with our colleagues is one of the privileges which we value most in the Senate, and I shall not undertake to argue that point further.

I suggest to Senators on the other side of the aisle that a vote in support of the Holland amendment is a clear violation of the platform of the Republican Party, on which the ink is hardly yet dry.

I suggest to Senators on this side of the aisle that a vote in support of the Holland amendment is a vote in opposition to the clear provisions of the Democratic platform, on which the ink is not much drier. To buttress that assertion, I read into the RECORD from the Republican national platform the following pledge:

> Upward revision in amount and extended coverage of the minimum wage to several million more workers.

I shall read to Senators on this side a similar provision in the Democratic national platform:

> We pledge to raise the minimum wage to $1.25 an hour and to extend the coverage to several million workers not now protected.

Mr. President, each Senator will, of course, be the judge of his own conscience. He will determine, with all candor, whether he desires to support the platform of his own party. He will make up his own mind whether he wants to support that platform in whole or in part.

However, I suggest that if the Holland amendment is adopted, the united press of the Nation will refer again to the cynicism which they believe to be rampant among everyone in public life, with practically no exceptions, and will point out that, on both sides of the aisle, Senators of the United States constituting a majority have seen fit to repudiate the platforms of both of their parties within a month of the time they were adopted.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I commend the Senator from Pennsylvania because he has pointed out the philosophy in the pending proposed legislation. Moreover, I should like to embrace the thinking that within the committee there was no disregard, rather, there was a very genuine regard, for the efficacy of including certain hardship cases which were considered by the committee. The problems of small business were carefully considered.

As the member of the committee who offered the so-called $1 million amendment, and considering the amendments which were offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], with respect to the theater industry and other industries, I may say that there was a very keen appreciation within the committee of the need for safeguarding small business.

Mr. CLARK. I conclude by reminding Senators again that if the amendment is adopted, instead of extending coverage to almost 5 million additional workers, as pledged in the platforms of both parties, the extended coverage will be reduced to less than 300,000. This would be an express violation of the recommendation of the President in connection with the 21 points which he sent to Congress and asked us to act upon, namely, "expansion of coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act."

So a vote in favor of the amendment will be a vote in favor of repudiation of the Republican platform, and will be a vote in favor of repudiation of the position taken by the President of the United States, and will be a vote in favor of repudiation of the Democratic platform, and will be a vote in favor of repudiation of the position taken by the Democratic Party's candidate for election to the Presidency and the position taken by its candidate for election to the Vice Presidency.

So, Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be rejected.

In accordance with my understanding with the Senator from Florida, unless some other Senator desires to use time now in opposition to the amendment, I am prepared to yield back all but 5 minutes of the time remaining under my control, with the understanding that the Senator from Florida will have the privilege of closing the debate, inasmuch as he is the proponent of the amendment.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I have listened with great attention and respect to the able address by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

I shall now make certain comments about it, in all good humor.

First, the pending bill does not even pretend to carry out the commitments of either the Democratic platform or the Republican platform, because the bill was drafted and was reported long before either of those platforms was drawn up. Furthermore, in so far as the Democratic platform is concerned, the bill does not go nearly as far as does the Democratic platform, which, among other things, proposes the inclusion of 2 million agricultural workers under wage-hour legislation—as to which no approach at all is made by means of the provisions of the pending bill.

Therefore, Mr. President, all this talk about party platforms is merely based on a desire to accomplish the platforms before the people have a chance to pass on them in the referendum in November. But I believe that all of us must agree that was not the purpose we in the Congress had when, by our own votes, we arranged for this session. The purpose of this session, as we then stated, was to pass on legislative proposals which already had been introduced and already had been passed on by the committees and already had been passed by either one House or the other.

So, Mr. President, although it is pleasant to contemplate the provisions of the platforms—which, by the way, were not unanimously agreed to, by any means, by the delegates of either party—all that is entirely beside the point in connection with this debate.

Mr. President, we are now trying to pass upon proposed legislation which was introduced last year, and was subjected to 15 months of committee hearings, and was reported by the committees before the party conventions, and, according to my understanding, at least, was to be one of the items on which we would act at this session.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. I thank the Senator from Florida for yielding.

In answer to the comments made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] about the party platforms, I should like to say that Senators on this side of the aisle who vote for the pending amendment need not be concerned about the party platform situation, because it is perfectly clear that the Dirksen amendment will be offered, and will provide for increased coverage in accordance with the Republican platform, if not the Democratic platform.

I intend to vote for the pending amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND]. But in any case there will be before the Senate the Dirksen amendment, which will provide for an increase in the amount of the minimum wage and substantially increased coverage of workers, as proposed in the Republican platform.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. President, let me say that on the first day of the debate we were asked to plow new ground, to go into an uncharted sea. And that is exactly what we shall be doing if we pass the bill in its present form and if it is enacted in that form.

Mr. President, what will be some of the results?

Judging by the report of the Department of Labor and its Bureau of Labor Statistics, and judging by the study made by the able Senator from Michigan, we must expect an increase in unemployment if the bill becomes law. Certainly, some of the people of the country would be adversely affected by this proposed law; there is no question about that.

Mr. President, what is another development which we may expect if the bill becomes law? In that event, we may expect more inflation, because prices will have to be raised in order to cover the added costs of operation, not only under the provisions of this bill, but also under the wage contracts which will be made, based on this bill as a floor, because both Mr. Meany and Mr. Greenberg in their testimony made it very clear that the minimum wage structure is the floor for wage contracts.

Third, Mr. President, if the bill as it now stands becomes law, there will be great uncertainty, which will affect thousands of businesses throughout the Nation, from one corner of the Nation to the other, as to what is their lot under this bill, until the Supreme Court has passed on the application and effect of the bill, although not necessarily upon a general field in which those businesses are operating or upon the specific facts of their operation, because hardly two businesses in the country operate in exactly the same way, as all Senators realize.

I have already read the extensive definition of the word "enterprise," as it is set forth in the bill. Certainly, all Senators realize that under the operation of the provisions of section 3(t)(4), there undoubtedly would be great uncertainty for years, before many independent merchants would know just what they were up against.

Let us consider the effect of the bill, as it now stands, upon local business. Is local business adapted to being dealt with by legislation of this class? The original sponsors of this act said, "No," and said, "Stay away from it." In 1949, Congress, by a substantial majority, said the same thing.

Mr. President, let us remind ourselves that at this time the retail and service establishments of the Nation are not adapted to the same sort of handling by law as are the manufacturing enterprises. If the manufacturing enterprises produce more than the market will take, they cease their operations, and they are able to do so. But merchants cannot operate it that way. Their level of trade fluctuates constantly during the day, during the week, and during the year. Furthermore, they are not able to stop operations when customers do not show up for a few hours.

In addition, Mr. President, let us remember that the local business relies more than does any other business upon the retention of good will among the people in the area it serves. This affords considerable assurance of fair treatment to its employees. A local business must operate in considerable part on the basis of good will. It must command good will, or else it cannot get the trade of the local people. It has for its personnel some of the very people it serves. It is under the watchful eye of the people of the community every day and every hour it operates, and it must deal fairly with its employees to retain the good will of the public it serves.

But no such conditions apply to manufacturing enterprises which manufacture goods to be shipped to the four corners of this great country, or perhaps even throughout the world. In short, local business is in a class by itself, and has always been regarded as such.

Next, Mr. President, I point to differences in the methods of operation, the differences in customs, hours, wages, and the kind of people employed. Those differences are so great throughout the States that in the 28 or 29 States where laws covering this field have been enacted, no two of them include exactly the same provisions.

In the very nature of things, Mr. President, local legislators, who must answer for their decisions every 2 years at local ballot boxes, are best adapted to dealing with local business. The people of a community are much better prepared to determine what wage and hour provisions should be applicable to the local activities.

Again let me refer briefly to the fact that under the term "enterprise," as used in the pending bill, many businesses and many persons working in businesses which do not produce $1 million a year gross business would be involved. There is no question about that. The report by the committee says so.

Further, Mr. President, the committee's report shows that the very definition of the word "enterprise," as used in the bill, is not highly definitized. No one knows how broadly it will extend. It is true that certain things are excluded. For instance, a group of businesses cannot be held to be covered by the bill because they join together in a joint purchasing arrangement.

But if they do other things in conjunction with that, the bill is silent; and until the court passes on the matter, it will be silent. The small grocers and druggists who are operating under such arrangements to help them meet competition of big business are the ones threatened by this particular provision. The "enterprise" definition of coverage, as distinguished from "establishment," is important.

Section 3(t)(4) covers many, many employees of businesses doing under $1 million. The report says that provision will bring 1 million workers under the act, in businesses grossing between $250,000 and $1 million per year and having one or more employees engaged in the interstate commerce portions of their businesses.

Mr. President, who knows how that provision is going to affect any of the businesses which have these 1 million workers who would be drawn under the act? Who knows how accurate this estimate of 1 million new workers who will be brought under the act may be under the uncertain knowledge we have? All we know is that those who say this bill affects only big business are as wrong as they can be, because both under the definition of "enterprises" and under 3(t)(4), many, many workers in small retail and service businesses are brought under the coverage of this act despite the $1 million limitation provided in the act.

I thought the remarks made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD]—one in particular—were so right that I want to repeat what he said. He said that, in his judgment, Senators who sponsored this act probably would make more enemies than friends. I think that is true because those fighting for the amendment are fighting for the interest of the general public and for great groups of merchants who always proceeded under the assumption that they were doing intrastate business and were free from the regimentation of the long arm of Uncle Sam reaching down from Washington.

All I can say is that, in the instance which I cited in the RECORD already, I am convinced that the defeat of a Senator of great ability and of great recognition throughout the Nation was accomplished in 1950 because of his sponsorship in 1949 of an act quite similar to this, because I saw what happened when the Main Street merchants, the hotel men, the restaurateurs, the automobile dealers, the laundry people, the agricultural equipment dealers, and all the others who were so vitally affected by this measure showed, in that race, their resentment at the effort to interfere with them and to overlook the fact that they had to operate, in their dealings with the citizens, in such a way as to command their respect and good will or they could not remain in business.

Mr. President, I have not said anything about the legal aspects of the matter. Let me say I know perfectly well the court has held as it has with respect to certain acts mentioned by the Senator from Pennsylvania, but each of those affected goods flowed into commerce which was going to be interfered with or affected by cessation of labor, lockouts, or some other such acts, and had much more application to interstate activities.

Mr. President, I reserve my 5 minutes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute.

The majority report clearly answers the argument of the Senator from Florida. I shall not reiterate it. Even if the Senator were right, and I cannot feel he is, the only heinous thing about this bill is that, effective 4 years from now, a minimum wage of $1.25 will be paid and overtime will be paid if they work overtime. It seems to be a very small price to pay for raising the standards of American labor.

I cannot agree with my friend with respect to his interpretation of the party platform. It is as clear to me as anything can be that a vote for the Holland amendment is a repudiation of the Democratic platform, a repudiation of the Republican platform, and a repudiation of the President of the United States.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for 1 minute?

Mr. CLARK. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I think the issue before the Senate in this critical legislative hour can be reduced to this premise: We are going to vote now on whether or not we believe in doing social or economic justice to those fellow Americans who at the present time are being required to work for less than a minimum decent wage.

Mr. President, the free enterprise system does not mean freedom to exploit workers. The free enterprise system, as I see it as a constitutional liberal, places upon us the responsibility of doing those things necessary, legislatively, to help increase the purchasing power of millions of people in this country who have to have a higher purchasing power, in order to expand a free enterprise, because the hope of the perpetuation of a free economy depends upon its being constantly expanded; and we cannot socially or economically justify exploiting workers and asking them to subsidize the employers who refuse to pay a decent wage.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of our time.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, in closing the debate, let me say, first of all, with respect and much affection to the Senator from Oregon, that I think none of us is surprised at his attitude. He has been very frank. In the last session of Congress he introduced a bill in this field going much further than the pending measure. My recollection is he included within its four corners many agricultural workers who are prohibited by this bill from being covered. So my friend from Oregon would have no difficulty in swallowing the Democratic platform which calls for 2 million agricultural workers coming under the provisions of the labor law.

We do not have that provision before us now. What we are trying to do is deal with this particular act, and I am simply saying, in my humble judgment, some Senators overlook the fact that we are asked here to pass a frontier beyond which we cannot look at all, that we do not know what is going to be the result of our action, and that thousands of businesses, some of them now struggling, do not know how that action will affect them. I think that is an important thing for us to remember, particularly under the hectic time situation which exists here.

It seems to me so clear that we are being asked to overlook the standing and stature and classification of the independent businesses in the local communities during all the years of this Nation, and particularly of those years since 1938, when President Roosevelt recommended that this type of business be excluded, when Senator Black, who handled the matter in the Senate, insisted it be excluded, when Representative CELLER, who handled the matter in the House, insisted it be excluded; and then we are asked to overlook the fact that in 1949 we debated this measure in great detail and found that a great majority of the Congress, as then constituted, liked the experience we had had under the act and wanted a clear declaration of the exact exemption which is sought to be renewed by the amendment I offer now.

Mr. President, several Senators who have not been present through much of the debate asked me this morning exactly what the amendment covers. I shall be glad to repeat my statement. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to correct me on any particular one which I may be forgetful.

Mr. President, the amendment would add only one thing, which is the inclusion of the application of the Administrative Procedure Act. That was included in the Senate committee bill. All I could find out about it was that it seemed to be the consensus of the committee that it would improve the legislation. That is the only thing which would be added.

The other features would simply extend, renew, and reiterate, in exactly the form they are now, the exemptions written into the law in 1938, as stated by Senator Black and Congressman CELLER, and the exemptions guaranteed and assured in 1949 when the exemption provision was better written. I do not understand that there has been any difference of opinion as to the effectiveness of that 1949 exemption provision.

Mr. President, I have submitted the amendment to learned counsel—the Senate Legislative Counsel, counsel for the committee and others—and have received the same answer from all. What is intended by my amendment and what I believe it would do is to renew identically the same exemptions as those now prevailing under the present law. That is my intention. That I believe would be the operation of the amendment.

Mr. CLARK rose.

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not true that the Senator's amendment would remove from the committee bill over 4 million employees presently covered by the committee bill?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is correct. The amendment would effectively remove from the bill those who are within the present exemption of retail dealers and service establishments. It would remove them and would leave in the bill four different classes of new employees; seamen on American-flag vessels, those in fish processing, telephone operators at all exchanges having more than 750 telephones, and employees of local transit systems. The total would be nearly 300,000. The amendment would not affect the proposed increase in the amount of the minimum wage, nor any other provision of the bill.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. How would the amendment affect the exemption for small garages and filling stations?

Mr. HOLLAND. It would renew that exemption specifically.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired. All time for debate has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARK. I believe the yeas and nays were ordered earlier.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON]. If present and voting, the Senator from Missouri would vote "nay," and the Senator from Kentucky would vote "yea."

I further announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE], if present and voting, would each vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

On this vote, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS]. If present and voting, the Senator from Kentucky would vote "yea," and the Senator from Missouri would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 56, as follows:

NOT VOTING—5

Hennings	Martin	Muskie
Kefauver	Morton

So Mr. HOLLAND'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I propose to offer a substitute for the pending bill. I may say, for the information of the Senate, that the substitute is substantially the House bill liberalized for additional coverage. I do not wish to offer it and have it tabled, because I can discuss it at considerable length, for the information of the Senate. But if an effort is made to develop some limitation on time, certainly I would be quite agreeable to that arrangement, because it is not our position to continue this debate interminably, since we believe a workable bill should be contrived, consonant with good discussion of the issue that is involved, and developed as expeditiously as it can be.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator is very fair in stating the situation that confronts us. I have discussed with him his amendment. It is an amendment that is favored by a good many Senators, and they would like to address themselves to it following the rollcall votes on the two treaties.

I ask unanimous consent that it be in order for the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] to be recognized in order to call up his substitute, and that there be not to exceed 3 hours' debate on the substitute and all amendments thereto, to be divided equally between the proponent, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], and the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLLAND. I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I wonder if I could modify the request in order to meet the objection of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HOLLAND. I have not had an opportunity to read the amendment. After I have read and studied it, I may be agreeable to a limitation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the Senator have a suggestion as to when we might renew the request? There are two votes pending. I should like to be able to notify Senators as to when we are to have another vote, if we can do so.

I have been following the leadership of the Senator from Florida. I want to be helpful. But we have a long bill with 35 proposed amendments to consider. I do hope the Senator will be cooperative.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Florida always tries to be cooperative with the leadership. He is not ready to announce his intention on something which he has not even seen, and does not know the desires of others who, like himself, have not studied it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If we should double the time requested, would that satisfy the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator may not require more time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator can yield back whatever time remains.

Mr. HOLLAND. If I may have the courtesy of being permitted to read the amendment, then I shall be glad to talk with the majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I hope the Senator will do so, because two rollcall votes are pending, and I should like Senators to know whether we shall have any further votes this evening. During the period we are having the rollcall votes, perhaps the Senator can confer with his colleagues.

Mr. HOLLAND. I will see what can be done.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest that the distinguished Senator from Florida be given an opportunity to examine the substitute. Meanwhile we could proceed with the executive business which the majority leader has in mind. I would then like to be recognized after the treaties have been disposed of so that this subject can be discussed.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Is there agreement that the Senator from Illinois will be recognized after the vote on the treaties?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes; I have no objection to that.

Mr. President, before the Senate votes on the treaties, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] be permitted to offer his amendment and that 3 hours be allotted to discuss the amendment, 1 hour and a half to be controlled by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and the other hour and one-half to be controlled by the majority leader, the proposal to cover all amendments thereto, and the agreement to be in the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The unanimous-consent agreement, reduced to writing, is as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. DIRKSEN be recognized to offer a substitute amendment for the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage of employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes, that debate on said amendment and all amendments thereto be limited to 3 hours to be equally divided and controlled by Mr. DIRKSEN and the majority leader: Provided, That no amendment that is not germane to the provisions of the said amendment shall be received.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

CONVENTION OF PARIS FOR THE PROTECTION OF INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY TREATY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of Executive D, 86th Congress, 2d session, the Convention of Paris for the Protection of Industrial Property, signed at Lisbon on October 31, 1958.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the Convention.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on Executive D.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification of Executive D, 86th Congress, 2d session, Convention of Paris for the Protection of Industrial Property, signed at Lisbon on October 31, 1958, which will be read.

The resolution of ratification was read as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive D, 86th Congress, 2d session, the Convention of Paris for the Protection of Industrial Property of March 20, 1883, as revised at Brussels, December 14, 1900; at Washington, June 2, 1911; at The Hague, November 6, 1925; at London, June 2, 1934; and at Lisbon, October 31, 1958.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that if present and voting, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE] would each vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] is necessarily absent and, if present and voting, would vote "yea."

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 95, nays 0, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein, the resolution of ratification is agreed to.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the resolution of ratification of Executive D was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP AND COMMERCE WITH PAKISTAN AND THE CONVENTION OF ESTABLISHMENT WITH FRANCE

The Senate in executive session resumed the consideration of Executive F, 86th Congress, 2d session, a Treaty of Friendship and Commerce Between the United States of America and Pakistan, signed at Washington on November 12, 1959; and Executive G, 86th Congress, 2d session, a Convention of Establishment Between the United States of America and France, signed at Paris on November 25, 1959.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the next two treaties, Executive F and Executive G, which will be voted upon en bloc.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions of ratification of Executive F and Executive G will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

EXECUTIVE F

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive F, 86th Congress, 2d session, a Treaty of Friendship and Commerce Between the United States of America and Pakistan, together with a protocol relating thereto, signed at Washington on November 12, 1959.

EXECUTIVE G

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive G, 86th Congress, 2d session, the Convention of Establishment Between the United States of America and France, together with a protocol and a joint declaration relating thereto, signed at Paris on November 25, 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing, en bloc, to the resolutions of ratification of Executive F and Executive G. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the treaties? If the explanation has been made, the Senate was in such a state of disorder that it could not be heard.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I may say that I made a statement earlier, but not many Senators were on the floor. I shall read the formal statement, if the Senator from Mississippi wishes me to do so, and if we may have order.

These are commercial treaties with France and Pakistan to insure nondiscriminatory treatment of our businessmen in those countries. Of course, we guarantee that the businessmen of France and Pakistan will be treated equally with our own people.

We have had much difficulty, for many years, trying to conclude a treaty with France. France has insisted upon special privileges with regard to her own people versus any allies in a foreign country. However, we have finally agreed to a treaty which provides equal treatment for our businessmen in all respects, and we make the same agreement with France.

These are treaties of a commercial nature. They are designed to insure better conditions for our people to do business.

This is the first such treaty we have had with Pakistan.

The committee knows of no opposition to the treaties. All the businessmen we have heard favor them. Neither the committee nor the Department of State has heard any opposition to the treaties.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator from Arkansas. Do I correctly assume that the treaties are substantially the same?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. They are.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. Do the treaties have any termination date?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Ten years, I believe. They may be terminated after 10 years. They may also be extended.

Mr. RUSSELL. May they be terminated at the desire of either party signatory after 10 years?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I read from article XXIV of Executive F:

> The treaty shall remain in force for 10 years and shall continue in force thereafter until terminated as provided herein.

Mr. RUSSELL. How is the question to be determined?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Article XXIV of Executive F provides:

> Either party may, by giving 1 year's written notice to the other party, terminate the present treaty at the end of the initial 10-year period or at any time thereafter.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. THURMOND. I believe that both treaties—Executive F and Executive G—have provisions to the effect that any dispute between the contracting parties as to the interpretation or the application of the treaties which is not satisfactorily adjusted shall be submitted to the International Court of Justice. Is that correct?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is correct. That provision is contained in article XVI of Executive G and in article XXIII of Executive F. I shall read the provision if the Senator desires.

Mr. THURMOND. In other words, the dispute would be referred to the International Court of Justice, and any party signatory to the treaty would not have the right to use its own judgment if it saw fit.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I shall read paragraph 2 of article XVI of Executive G:

> Any dispute between the High Contracting Parties as to the interpretation or application of the present convention, not satisfactorily adjusted by diplomacy, shall be submitted to the International Court of Justice, unless the High Contracting Parties agree to settlement by some other pacific means.

Mr. THURMOND. So the parties would be bound by the decision of the International Court of Justice. A country could not make its own decision, under this convention, if it failed to settle a dispute by normal diplomatic means.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The parties are bound, under the convention, to submit the dispute to the International Court of Justice.

Mr. THURMOND. Does that apply to both treaties?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It does. It did not apply, I may say, to the previous treaty.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Would not the Senator agree that there is no case on record of a settlement of a dispute by the International Court of Justice, but that all differences have been settled amicably by the parties?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. There has not been a case under these treaties. We have entered into about 21 treaties, not between these parties, having similar provisions, and there have been no problems.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. What about the Connally amendment? Does it apply to these treaties?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It would apply except that the provision I have just read makes disputes arising under the treaty subject to adjustment by the International Court of Justice. In other words, disputes in this limited field would be referred to the International Court of Justice.

These treaties do not repeal the Connally amendment generally, but under them the parties signatory are exempt from the provisions of the Connally amendment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. These treaties in no way affect the Connally proposal, nor do they repeal it.

Mr. CHAVEZ. They do not repeal the Connally amendment; neither are they affected by it.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Disputes or other matters arising under these particular treaties between these parties are exempt from the operation of the Connally amendment. That is all.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. TALMADGE. As the able Senator from Arkansas knows, in the textile areas a great many persons are being thrown out of work by the importations of textile products. Many of our mills have been forced out of business, and many of those workers are now unemployed.

Many of us have been seeking action through the Tariff Commission, as well as by Congress, to remedy the situation, by putting tariffs or quotas, or both of them, on the importations of textile products.

As the Senator knows, Pakistan ships a great many textile products into the United States. Would anything in the treaty prohibit either the Congress or the Tariff Commission from taking action in that regard?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Nothing in the treaty has any effect upon tariffs or quotas or any regulations. That would be handled, if at all, entirely by a different committee and entirely by legislation. These treaties do not undertake to deal in any manner with those subjects.

Mr. TALMADGE. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the respective resolutions of ratification. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that if present and voting, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE] would each vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] is necessarily absent. If present and voting, he would vote "yea."

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is absent, by leave of the Senate, on official business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Tom Killefer, of California, to be First Vice President of the Export-Import Bank of Washington; and Byron D. Woodside, of Virginia, to be a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

MODIFICATION OF CONVENTION WITH JAPAN FOR AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION, AND SO FORTH—REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, there was transmitted to the Senate today by the President of the United States, Executive K, 86th Congress, 2d session, a protocol modifying and supplementing the convention between the United States of America and Japan for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on income, signed at Tokyo, on May 7, 1960, supplementing the protocol signed at Washington on April 16, 1954. I ask unanimous consent that the injunction of secrecy be removed from the protocol, and that the protocol, together with the President's message, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that the President's message be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The message from the President is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith the protocol between the United States of America and Japan, signed at Tokyo on May 7, 1960, modifying and supplementing the convention of April 16, 1954, for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on income.

I transmit also for the information of the Senate the report by the Secretary of State with respect to the protocol.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 17, 1960.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

HOUSTON PRESS SAYS 99 PERCENT OF TEXANS FAVOR PADRE ISLAND PARK NOW

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor, I shall be glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH].

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, in a recent statement to the Senate I estimated that 90 percent of Texans who have heard of the proposed Padre Island National Seashore Park question are in favor of the project.

Today I wish to inform the Senate that I have been corrected on my estimate of support by one of Texas' most outspoken daily newspapers, and I might add that I am glad to accept the correction.

In an editorial Monday, August 15, 1960, the Houston Press noted my report that 90 percent of Texans favor the project, and observed:

Make it 99 percent, Senator, and you still might be short. And count us twice, please. We fervently hope you can find the key to action even though this session's remaining days appear due to be crammed with other matters.

Mr. President, in the name of governmental good business, I again emphasize that the Congress should establish Padre Island National Seashore Park this year.

Recent substantial property transactions on Padre Island in the past few weeks have tended to drive up property valuations, and costs of securing the land needed for the park area will go higher each year. It is an economy move to establish this badly needed seashore recreation area this year.

I commend Secretary of the Interior Seaton, because he has recommended that Congress pass this measure. He says if Congress does, he will allocate $8 million to be spent on Padre Island in the next 5 years on this 90-mile stretch of seashore.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in the RECORD the editorial to which I have referred, entitled "Keep Plugging, Padre," from the Houston Press of Monday, August 15, 1960.
